Were there only one magnetic pole, there could not be any magnetic equator, because the influence of such pole would extend over the whole surface of the globe. There being actually two magnetic poles, moving constantly, the one eastward and the other westward, round or under the relative end of the earth's axis, every situation, equally distant from the position of each magnetic pole, will have the dip of the needle neutralized; that is, there will be no dip, as the north-west and south-east poles will act equally on the magnetic needle, rendering it horizontal, or devoid of dip to either pole. It is evident, that a line drawn through a number of such points of neutralization, may be termed a magnetic equator in the torrid zone, common to both poles. This equator cannot be permanent; because the constant movement of the poles, will occasion a constant change of position of the points of neutralization. There can be only two places, 180° from each other, and in the plane of the two poles, where these poles act in one and the same straight line. In all other situations on this equator (if such be admissible) the attractions will be more or less oblique; and may bear a proportion to the sine of the angle formed with the meridian of the place of observation.

We may approximate to the law of intensity of magnetic action, by means of varied experiments with magnets acting on a needle; but as four poles must be acting by repulsion and attraction on each extremity of the needle, no result can be unexceptionably conclusive. There are, however, good grounds for thinking that the magnetic poles act on the needle, in the inverse ratio of the square of the distance.

When the precise site of the N.W. pole becomes clearly ascertained, the truth of this approximated magnetic rule may be brought to a test. In that case, let a true meridian be laid off on the real meridian of the pole. If the south-east pole had no influence on the south extremity of the needle, it would lie truly in the meridian of the north-west pole. But it will be found, that the north end of the needle will incline a little westward; because the south end will be attracted somewhat by the distant south-east pole. Let the same experiment be made similarly, on the same meridian, but thirty degrees further south, and a much greater inclination westward will be found. It is expected that, on a comparison of the relative deflections from the true meridian, the result will be a verification of a law now given only theoretically. The time is approaching when the variation will be accurately calculated in any known situation; and this must depend on ascertaining the precise situation of the two magnetic poles. This is of infinitely greater importance to navigation and commerce than an useless north-west passage, of the existence of which there is no doubt.

RUSSIAN INFLUENCE IN THE EAST.

[Extract of a Letter from St. Petersburg, received by a Gentleman in London.]

"WHATEVER may be thought of our growing influence with the governments of central Asia, you may rely on it that it is very small. In China we have none; and are too happy to be allowed to keep up our mission at Peking, and our commercial intercourse at Kiakhta, for the Chinese are too wary to allow us to acquire any political influence among them, and the least approach to it would eject us at once.

"In Persia we have certainly a larger or rather a more open field for action or intrigue; and there is no doubt that during the civil broils which are likely to ensue at the death of the old Shah, we shall endeavour to get a slice of the country for ourselves; but for the present, the English are too much on the alert for us to make any progress in that quarter.

"You have, of course, heard of our various embassies to Kliwa, Bukhara, &c.; but they have had little or no result. the barbarity and religious fanaticism of the people, and perhaps, too, their jealousy of our power, render them intractable. But even if they were inclined to form alliances with us, our commercial relations with them would be exceedingly limited, owing to the predatory habits of our nominal subjects, the Kirghese, through whose country we have to pass, and who are ever on the alert for booty, either in men, goods, or cattle. Indeed our trade in that quarter had been quite at a stand till the emperor, during his late visit at Orenburg, ordered that in future the caravans proceeding through the Kirghese steppes should be attended by a numerous escort of caissons and light artillery. The prospect of security which is thereby attained, will no doubt induce the merchants to try some new adventures; but their profits must be immense, if, with such an expensive mode of conveyance, any great benefit to the state accrues from it. It is, indeed, now said that the Kirghese are rather more afraid of our power, and more cautious in their depredations; but this renders the situation of the poor Russians, whom they ~~robbed~~ in stealing sometimes in their desert, but very frequently also from within our own immediate frontier, more wretched. For, from fear of detection, they no longer keep their captives among them, as they used to do; but immediately sell them to the Bukharians or Kliwese, at a few ducats a head; and if they ever attempt to escape from their new masters, through their country, the Kirghese will rather murder them, than allow them to return to the Russian possessions, for fear of being betrayed by them. The unfortunate slaves are treated most barbarously. They are made to work in the gardens; and if they are taken ill, they are often beaten so unmercifully for their supposed idleness, that that they sometimes die under the lash; the killing of a slave being perfectly legal.

"Moreover, they are constantly tormented for the purpose of making them adopt the Mohammedan religion; and the most unmerciful treatment generally follows a refusal of this kind. Several of our countrymen have actually died martyrs to their faith. Among these, was a young man who served the late sultan in the capacity of a locksmith. Promises and menaces having failed with him, his fanatical master ordered him to be led to execution. At the moment when the fatal knife was raised, a pardon was offered to him, if he would adopt the new religion. But the Russian replied: "No, I will die a Christian; do your worst!" upon which he had his throat cut, and was hung. There are, in the city of Bukhara, no less than thirty-four Russian slaves, seven of whom are females. Of these, several have adopted Mohammedanism, to appearance, whilst in their hearts they remain Christians. They often assemble at the house of one Andrei Rodikow, an old man of seventy, whom these poor exiled Christians consider as their chief, where they comfort each other in prayer, and endearing conversations about their home and kindred. Sometimes they lock themselves up in R.'s little chamber, where he, assisted by a man who was formerly a sexton at Orenburg, reads mass for the edification of his fellow-prisoners. This Rodikow had been a Russian corporal, and was taken prisoner forty years ago by some Kirghese, near Orenburg, and sold into Bukhara. There he attended the Khan, in his different campaigns against the Persians, Afghans and Khivese, and was finally made Tiptsheebashur, or master of the ordnance. With this office, he, of course, obtained his freedom, and the permission of keeping a petty shop in the metropolis. But nevertheless, I am credibly informed by a merchant who has seen him there, that the poor old man still rights to return to his own country, in order to be able again to profess openly the sacred religion which he now practises in secret; and you may think how trivial our influence must be in that country, when I tell you that notwithstanding the efforts of our agent at the court of Mir-hider, the present Khan, and the hypocritical promise of that prince, that in future no Russians should be purchased in his dominions, we have not been able to obtain the release of a single captive."

DECCAN PRIZE MONEY.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR. To withhold a debt justly due, is to inflict a manifest injury. On this principle, what must be the general feeling, in reflecting upon the injustice done to the Deccan army of 1817, who have not yet received a single fraction on account of the immense property captured there in that year, and the beginning of 1818; though the revenue of the East-India Company was increased four millions a year by their sweat and blood! Some man, or set of men, must have defeated the ends for which the generous kings of England resigned their power over prize-money. But surely the Government of India ought to have taken care that the reward of toil and duty was not converted into a subject of complaint and regret.

Eight years have now elapsed since we performed the services to which I have ventured to draw your attention. Many, very many, of the brave spirits, who then thirsted for fame, and panted beneath the burning sun, now lie unconscious of the debt due to them. Some of these have terminated life with their own hands, under the pressure of poverty and the destitution of half-pay. If the Deccan prize-money had been issued in due course, all these would still be busy and brave members of the community; as well as those who have sunk, pining in solitude, under disappointment and blighted expectation. The injury cannot now be remedied; but what is possible may be done immediately. The first payment may be made, as a small recompense for the detention of the whole, and the deprivation of its use for a period in which interest would nearly equal principal.

I do not know any medium through which this subject can be pressed more properly than the pages of your Journal, devoted, as it usefully is, to topics connected with the British empire in the east. I trust it is one which also merits your particular attention; and that you will not cease to revive it until public justice shall have been done to the suffering parties, of whom, Sir, I am

AN INDIVIDUAL.

London, 12 March, 1825.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: The subject of the prize-money due to the victorious army of the Deccan has, I am happy to observe, at length attracted public attention. Various representations have been made in the newspapers respecting it, but they are much at variance, and we are yet without any explanation that appears to emanate from authority. If the Government of this country, or the East-India Company (for it is uncertain upon which party the blame of delay rests), were sensible of the injury the delay has already produced, and the necessity of tranquillizing the minds of the claimants, in this country and in India, some explanation would, I think, ere this have been published.

With the hope that this letter may meet the eyes of those who are able to accelerate the business, I beg leave to request its insertion in your Journal.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

E. T.

We are glad of an opportunity to make a few remarks upon this painful subject.

The facts of the case (which has been much misrepresented) are these: The army of the Deccan, in 1817 and 1818, captured treasure, guns, stores, and other booty, to the amount, it is said, of five millions sterling. This property was at the disposal of the crown; and his Majesty appointed trustees (one of whom was the Duke of Wellington) to receive the prize property from the servants of the Company, whose controul over it instantly ceased; to realize it, and distribute it amongst the captors. But an obstacle arose out of the conflicting claims of the Marquess of Hastings and Sir Thos. Hislop, which were referred to the consideration of the Lords of the Treasury, by whom the question has but recently been determined. Another question likewise occurred, as to what property was to be deemed prize; a large proportion of the captures being, we understand, liable to litigation on this ground. This question, we believe, is still undecided by the Treasury.

That delay in such circumstances is unavoidable, must be apparent: a delay of seven years is, however, far too long; and a fault, we think, must be imputable somewhere. It has been asserted that the Company have admitted only a small portion of the claims, and have paid nothing; but if this were the fact, would the Crown hesitate to enforce payment, especially as the King's regiments are, equally with the Company's troops, debarred of their prize-money? As the Crown has assumed the controul over this property, transferred it to its own servants, referred all matters in dispute to its own Board of Treasury, and has ample power to enforce obedience to its decrees, it appears to us that even if the Company were so impolitic and unjust as to procrastinate payment, the charge of delay ought still to rest elsewhere.

We sincerely commiserate our correspondents and their fellow-sufferers; and we hope the money will speedily be paid, or that a very satisfactory reason will be assigned for withholding it.

Burmese War.

Copies of the Official Despatches which have appeared in the London Gazette from the Commencement of the War.

(The documents are arranged in consecutive order, with references to the Gazettes from whence they are taken.)

Extract letter from Gov. Gen. in Council to Secret Committee of Court of Directors, dated Fort William, 21st Nov. 1823.

On the 20th of Sept., Mr. Warner reported to us by an express, that a Burmese force of about one thousand men had actually attacked and taken the island of Shaputtee, on the 24th, killing three sepoy, and wounding three others. [Gaz. 25 Nov.]

Extract letter from Capt. Hay, commanding the Chittagong battalion, to the Secy. to Gov. in the Mlr. Deps, dated Chittagong, Oct. 1824.

I beg to inform you, that on the evening of the 2d Sept., the immediate party of this corps, stationed on the Island of Shaputtee, was attacked by a body of Burmese, of about a thousand, from Arracan, and after some struggle, driven off the island, with the loss of three sepoy killed, and three more wounded, two of whom are since dead. [Gaz. 25 Nov.]

Extract letter from the Gov. Gen. in Council to Secret Committee of Court of Directors, dated Fort William, 9th Jan. 1825.

Wishing to inform your hon. Committee, that the detachment sent by sea from hence to occupy the island of Shaputtee, at the mouth of the Naga's river, and to reinforce the post on the southern part of the Chittagong district, did not, owing to the unsoundable and tempestuous state of the weather, at the head of the bay of Bengal, reach the island until 21st of Nov.; no symptoms of further hostile designs, or preparations, were visible on the part of the Burmans at the period of their arrival; and two companies of the detachment accordingly took possession of Shaputtee, without the slightest opposition being offered. [Gaz. 25 Nov.]

Extract letter from Lieut. Col. Shapland to Major Patrickson, depar. g. gen. of army, dated Shaputtee, 22d Nov. 1824.

I have the honour to acquaint you, for the information of government, that in consequence of the difficulty which the larger vessels of the detachment under my command, experienced in entering the Naga river, they did not anchor off Tak Nant, until the forenoon of the 20th instant, when three companies of the 2d battalion 20th regiment, were disembarked at that place; in the ensuing night two vessels, the Flora and Planet, dropped down to Shaputtee, and the two companies on board of them were landed on the island without delay; an eligible spot for the erection of a stockade was then chosen, and the Mugs, with the detachment, are now employed in clearing the ground, and making preparations for the construction of one. [Gaz. 25 Nov.]

Extract letter from Gov. Gen. in Council to Secret Committee of Court of Directors, dated Fort William, 23d Feb. 1825.

On the 30th Jan., we learnt that an affair had taken place between our party of observation on the Syllhet frontier, commanded by Major Newton, and one of the bodies of invaders coming from Assam; your hon. Committee will learn from the correspondence which took place on that occasion that, disregarding the intimation which they had received of the determination of the British government to resist the occupation of Cachar by the forces of a foreign power, and anxious only to effect their object of concentrating a large force on our immediate frontier, the parties on the northward and eastward hurried on, in a total defiance of our repeated remonstrances and warnings, to the point where the generals proposed to unite their forces. On the 16th, Major Newton finding that a body of about four thousand Burmese and Assamese had crossed into the plains of Cachar, at the foot of the Borthenka Pass, and were stockading themselves at Blikrampore; also that the force to the eastward had defeated the Mumpore Chief, Rajah Gumbhur Sing's troops; and that a third division were crossing into Jynta, immediately north of the station of Syllhet, he resolved, under circumstances so threatening to his force, to concentrate his detachment at Juttrapore, a Chutcher village, about five miles beyond the boundary of the Syllhet district, and move from thence due northward against the invading party from Assam, before they could have time to strengthen their position. The Burmese position was discovered early in the morning of the 17th of Jan., and hostilities commenced by the discharge of two shots from then stockade at the British advanced guard; an attack was then made by the British force under Major Newton, in two divisions, which was completely successful, though a party of Burmahs in the stockade, variously estimated at from two to five hundred, made a brave resistance, and were not overpowered without the loss of six of our sepoy killed, and eighteen wounded; about one hundred and seventy five of the Burmah force were destroyed, the remainder fled towards the hills. [Gaz. 25 Nov.]

Cop. of Despatch from Major Newton to the Adj. Gen. of army, dated Budgepore, 16th Jan. 1824.

Sur: In consequence of intelligence which I received on the evening of the 16th inst., that a body of about a thousand Burmese and Assamese had crossed into the plains at the foot of the Borthenka Pass, and were stockading themselves at the village of Blikrampore; also that a force to the eastward had defeated Rajah Gumbhur Sing's troops, and that a third division were crossing the Montanore pass into Jynta, to the north west, I resolved, under circumstances so threatening to my force, to concentrate my detachment at Juttrapore, and move from thence with the whole due north, and attack the enemy before they could have time to strengthen their position: I accordingly ordered Capt. Johnston to join me from Pityan, leaving his camp standing. At two a.m. of the 17th, we moved off; at six a.m. just beyond an almost impenetrable grass and reed jungle, which we with considerable difficulty passed, we came into a comparatively plain country, where the situation of the enemy was discovered by the discharge of two shots at our advanced guard: their position extended along a ridge of hills, at the foot of the hills, they were covered by the hills, bushes, &c. in a close and difficult country, and on their right they had a stockade on the banks of a steep nullah, occupied by about two hundred men; the attack was made in two divisions; the southern face of the stockade being assaulted by Capt. Johnston, with part of the 23d N.L., and Budgepore R. Inf.; and the enemy's line in the N.L.s being attacked by Capt. Howe, with part of the 10th N.L., the whole under my direction; this last was immediately successful, the greater part of the enemy, supposed to be Assamese, flying to the hills at the first fire; Capt. Howe then wheeled his force at the attack of the stockade which was making a brave resistance against Capt. Johnston, and in a short time it was carried by assault by the united exertions of both parties.

I cannot in too strong terms bring to your notice, for the information of his Excy. the Commander in Chief, the exertions of the troops on this occasion, the officers and men were equally conspicuous in their zealous endeavours; I cannot therefore particularize individuals, when all who were engaged claim an equal share of praise; but in justice to the merit of the European officers, and staff general and medical, I do myself the honour to annex a list of their names, and an account of the killed and wounded on both sides.

General Staff—Lieut. T. Fisher, D. A. Q. Master General.

Return of killed and wounded in a detachment under the command of Major Newton, during operations against the Burmese, near Bickerpore, on the 17th Jan. 1824.
 1st Bat. 10th Regt. Nat. Inf.—1 sepoy killed; 1 wounded.

2d Bat. 25th Regt. Nat. Inf.—3 sepoy killed; 1 malk, and 6 sepoy wounded.

Rungpore L.L. Inf.—1 sepoy killed; 1 malk, 1 drummer, and 4 sepoy (one of whom is since dead) wounded, 1 elephant wounded. [See 25 Nov.]

Copy of letter from Capt. Johnston, commanding a detachment of the 23d regt. N.L., to the Dep. Adj. Gen. of the army, dated Bunderpore, 15th Feb. 1825.

Sir, The command of this post has now devolved upon me, in the absence of Major Newton. I have the honour to acquaint you, for the information of his Excy. the Commandeur en-Chief, that the Burmese advanced yesterday morning in very great force to within one thousand yards of this post, on the north bank of the Soemnah river, and commenced upon the destruction of five separate stockades in our advanced ground.

Having obtained the sanction of Mr. Scott, the Governor-General's agent, for dislodging them from positions which, if permitted to be finished, would form a serious hindrance to our future plans, and inevitably cause the sacrifice of many lives in their reduction, I was determined, if possible, to drive the enemy from thence in their unfinished state, and with this view directed Capt. Howe, with part of the left wing 1st bat. 10th regt., a detachment of the 2d bat. 25d N.L., and a party of the Rungpore L.L., to cross the Soemnah, whilst I proceeded, accompanied by Mr. Scott's interpreter, up the river, in order to induce them to desist from throwing up these fortifications; but seeing no probability of their acquiescence, and that they were rather waiting for further reinforcements, I thought proper to direct the advance of the column.

On reaching the first stockade, the enemy fired upon the leading sections, we ascended the height and instantly drove the enemy with the bayonet from the stockade, and rapidly followed them up without giving them time to fly, till a very stockade was carried in the same gallant manner and left in our possession: my instructions from Mr. Scott being not to commence a fruitless and much resistance was made, prevented the enemy's loss from being as great as they otherwise would have sustained: with the stockade, the enemy abandoned a number of muskets and muskets, and the whole of their ammunition.

I am sorry to add, that the success on our part was not obtained without the loss of a member of the 1st bat. 10th regt., and a number of men wounded, principally by spikes and bows set in the ground to impede the advance of the detachment.

I cannot close this despatch without bringing to his Excy's notice the gallant conduct of Capt. Howe, who commanded the column of attack, and that of Lieut. Ellis, who commanded the detachment 2d bat. 23d N.L., and of whom Capt. Howe makes particular mention: indeed the whole of the detachment behaved with the utmost steadiness and bravery throughout.

I have, &c.

J. JOHNSTON, Capt. 23d regt.

Return of killed and wounded of a detachment under the command of Capt. W. Howe, in an action with the Burmese, on the 14th of Feb. 1824.

1st Bat. 10th Regt.—1 jemadar killed; 1 quartermaster sergeant, 1 subadar, 7 malks, 1 drummer, 26 sepoy, wounded.

Copy of despatch from Lieut. Col. Bowen to David Scott, Esq., Pol. Agent on the Bengal Eastern frontier, dated Camp, near Tiloyen, 19th Feb. 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to acquaint you, that agreeably to your requisition, the whole of the detachment at Bunderpore embarked on board the boats in which the right wing, 1st bat. 10th regt. arrived under my command from Baccra, and proceeded up the Soemnah river towards Juttipore on the 14th inst. The same morning I detached Major Newton to the latter place by land, with two hundred men, for the purpose of occupying the stockades at that place, should it be found that the enemy had quitted them, as was supposed to be the case. About half way towards Juttipore four stockades, which had been deserted by the enemy, were destroyed, and I had the satisfaction to learn, on the 16th, that Major Newton had taken possession of Juttipore, where we arrived on the 17th. It appears that the enemy had abandoned those very strong and extensive stockades on the evening of the 14th, after having been driven from those opposite Bunderpore, by the detachment at that place; and that a considerable number of them had retired to the foot of the Betteoka pass, in the range of hills to the north east of Juttipore.

Having left Major Newton with a detachment of about 200 hundred men at Juttipore, to protect the stockade, and to prevent the enemy from returning in that direction and occupying them; and it being ascertained that several of the Burmese chiefs had concentrated their forces and taken up their position under the Betteoka pass, the detachment continued its route in the boats to the mouth of the Chinghy river, where it disembarked at nine o'clock on the morning of the 18th, and moved in the last order towards the enemy's position, where we arrived about 11 a.m. and found them strongly posted in two stockades on the left bank of the river, the passage of which, at the only place where it was supposed to be fordable, was completely commanded by one of them. Their position was naturally very strong, and had been made by the enemy and the hills are so full of traps, so difficult is to appear almost impracticable to human men. Having reconnoitred the river both above and below, and all my endeavours to discover a more eligible passage having failed, in consequence of the depth and rapidity of the stream, and no boats being procurable, the only expedient left to me was to endeavour to get the men across on the backs of the elephants, which accompanied me, under cover of the fire of the right wing 1st bat. 10th regt. and a party of the Rungpore L.L. Inf.

Having, in this manner succeeded, after some little delay and much difficulty, in crossing nearly the whole of the 1st bat. 10th regt., detachment 2d bat. 23d, I directed an attack upon the stockades along the banks of the river; but having ascertained that there was a river at that direction which was more safe, I was compelled to order the attack through the much higher up the bank. In this attempt the difficulties opposed to us by the rough and muddy road were of an almost insuperable nature; but the detachment having at length arrived at the northeast corner of the stockade, bravely formed and rushed it with the bayonet, the enemy dispersing and flying in all directions, pursued by our detachment towards another strong and extensive stockade under the hills, where it was necessary for the same object to offer a determined resistance; they however merely passed through it in their way to the hills, and the detachment advanced, took possession, and passed the night in it.

From all these accounts which have reached me, and from the number and extent of the stockades they had constructed, I cannot estimate the number of the enemy in this affair at less than five thousand, of whom the greater part are supposed to be Assamese, and the remainder Burmese; their dispersion and flight towards the hills (to the greatest disorder and confusion) and passes into Assam, the capture of all the standards, gongs, and eight ghil chattris, are the fruits of this affair.

It is impossible for me to close this report without endeavouring to do justice to the good conduct of Captains Johnston and Howe, who led the attack at the head of the grenadiers 1st bat. 10th regt., Lieut. McLaren, deputy quartermaster, and Lieut. Ellis, 23d regt. N.L. Inf. The last of the same order met a most noble example in descending into the muth and fighting it neck high, followed by such of the troops as had not passed on elephants, which mainly contributed to our success.

I am happy to say that this service has been performed with little or no loss, only two men being wounded.

Copy of Report from Lieut. Col. Bowen to Mr. Scott, Post Agent on the Bengal eastern frontier, dated Jutputore, 22d Feb. 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to acquaint you, that agreeably to your regulation, the detachment under my command again disembarked yesterday morning at eight o'clock, and after a march of two hours, fell in with the enemy's stockades at Doodpattee.

Several spirited attacks were made upon the enemy under cover of a heavy fire from three six-panders, all of which, I am sorry to say, failed, and after a most severe action, which lasted from ten o'clock a. m. till evening, I was compelled to draw off the detachment, and return to Jutputore, leaving two European officers and one hundred and fifty men (between the enemy and our present position) at the strong post of Tiloy, as a measure of observation and safety.

I regret to say, that our loss has been severe: a return of the killed and wounded is herewith transmitted; the enemy's force may be fairly computed at two thousand Burmahs, including cavalry, and they fought with a bravery and obstinacy which I have never witnessed in any troops. It is impossible to estimate their loss; but it must be very severe.

As you personally witnessed this action, it will not escape your observation, that the troops opposed to us at Doodpattee, are a very different description from those who fought at Bickrampore and Burcolah, the former being wholly Burmese, and at the latter two places chiefly Assamese.

I have, &c. H. BOWEN, Lieut. Col. Com. in Sylhet. [Enc. 26th Nov.]

Copy of Despatch from Lieut. Col. Bowen, Com. in Cachar, to the Dep. Adj. Gen., dated Camp, near Jutputore, 25th Feb. 1824.

Sir: I regret to have to report to you, that Lieut. B. Armstrong, of the 1st bat. 10th regt. N.I., was killed in action with the Burmese on the 21st inst., at Doodpattee. This valuable officer was shot at the head of the jemadar's, among the stakes and spring guns, which were planted all around the enemy's stockades outside, for a distance of from twenty to thirty yards, concealed for the most part in long grass.

It is my painful duty to mention by this opportunity, that Capt. Johnston, of the 23d regt. N.I., and Ensign Barberie, of the 10th regt. N.I., are in a very dangerous state: the former was shot through the thigh bone, and the latter had his leg shattered to pieces, which has since been amputated. I trust it will not be considered presumptuous in me to express my hope, that something may be done for these two officers in the event of their recovery, and in consideration of their brave and gallant conduct in the actions of the 13th, 18th, and 21st inst.

Capt. Johnston has been twenty years in the army, has seen much actual service, has never been absent from his corps during all that time (except on sick certificate for four months), and has rendered me the greatest assistance throughout.

I cannot close this letter without deeply lamenting our failure at Doodpattee, and the loss we have sustained, and I sincerely hope his Exc. the Commander-in-Chief will concur in opinion with Mr. Scott, the Governor-General's agent, and myself, that we were justified in following up our former rapid successes in our attack at Doodpattee, in order to prevent the junction of the Assamese and Burmese armies, and the invasion of our own territories, which they had repeatedly threatened by letter; since (notwithstanding our failure) it has caused the enemy to evacuate their strong stockades at and around Doodpattee, and to proceed in disorder in the direction of Munnipore and Assam, of which authentic accounts reached me yesterday.

It has now been ascertained by people sent to examine the evacuated stockades at Doodpattee, that the enemy had between four and five hundred men killed and wounded; they were wholly composed of Burmese, and they fought desperately, reserving their fire to the last moment, and seldom missing their object.

I beg leave to supply an omission in my report of this affair under date the 22d inst., and to state that Major Newton, with an hundred and fifty men of the detachment, left to protect the stockades at Jutputore, joined me by order on the evening of the 26th near Doodpattee.

I have, &c. H. BOWEN, Lieut. Col. Com. [Enc. 26 Nov.]

Extract letter from Gov. Gen. in Council to the Secret Committee of Court of Directors, dated Fort William, 26th April 1824:—

We have much satisfaction in reporting the success which has attended our operations against Assam. After considerable delays, occasioned by the difficulty in procuring boats and supplies, Brigadier M'Morine moved forward with the force under his command, consisting of the Bangalore light infantry, Channarayn ditto, and Dinapore local battalion, with the flotilla of gun-boats, on the 22d ult., and reached Gowahati, the capital of Camroop, on the western division of Assam, on the 26th ult., without experiencing the slightest resistance, notwithstanding the strength of several of the enemy's positions, and the natural difficulty of the country. The native chiefs of Assam have waited upon Brigadier M'Morine, and have manifested the most friendly disposition, but have not as yet afforded any effectual assistance. The Burmese, after evacuating several strong stockades in succession, without firing a shot, appear to be in full retreat towards Ava. They have committed several atrocious and sanguinary murders; and we regret to say, that there is little chance of our troops overtaking them, as the advanced state of the season, and other unavoidable circumstances, have prevented our further forward movement.

The agent to the Governor-General, Mr. Scott, on hearing of the occupation of Gowahati by our troops, proceeded across the hilly tract which intervenes between Sylhet and Assam, to join Brigadier M'Morine, with an escort of three companies of the 23d N.I.; and private accounts have been received from Sylhet, by which it appears that he had arrived in the neighbourhood of Gowahati on the 13th instant, without experiencing any difficulties or loss by the way. Copy Report from Capt. Noton to the Major of Brigade at Chittagong, dated Camp, Ramoo, 11th May 1824.

Sir: On the 9th instant, a naik, from the Rutnapulling stockade, came in with a Bengalee villager, stating that the latter had seen the enemy advancing upon Rutnapulling, with four chiefs and about 150 men, wishing to negotiate, which the naik also stated to be the case.

Conceiving this to be some design of the enemy to put the jemadar off his guard, and thereby more easily gain possession of the stockade, I determined upon moving with the whole of my disposable force to ascertain what their intentions were, leaving the convalescents of the 23d, the whole of the provincials, and one hundred mung, to protect the cantonment and sick, in case the enemy might detach a party to outflank me.

I moved off about five p. m., the detachment 23d N.I. leading. On our arriving near to the stockade (about half a mile), a heavy fire was opened upon us from the hills on the left of the road, which the enemy had taken possession of in numbers and force; their larger guns were fired from the further hill, and the smaller ones from the lower, thereby completely commanding the road. The naik of the provincial battalion, who had come to give the report with the Bengalee in the first instance, told me that we were very near the plain where the stockade was; I consequently pushed on with the detachment of the 23d, and reached the plain. I then returned with a few men to bring on the guns, directing Ensign Campbell to follow, should I not join him in a short time. It was then to my disappointment that I found that two of the elephants had thrown their loads and blocked up the road. This, Capt. Pringle reported to me, was the fault of the malouts.

To extricate the gun, which, together with the gear, was hanging to the elephant, we were obliged to cut the ropes, but from the inexperience of Lieut. Scott (having never seen guns carried on elephants before), and none of the polanduns being present, after many trials, and failing in all, I was obliged to leave it, and take steps for carrying away the ammunition.

Shortly after this (our rear being now undefended) Capt. Norton ordered a retreat, which was effected in good order for about half a mile, the two six-pounders being from necessity abandoned; the the enemy's cavalry, however, pressing hard upon the rear of the column, a square was ordered to be formed; but in consequence of the excessive fatigue and deprivation which the troops had previously undergone, which rendered them absolutely incapable of offering any effectual resistance to the overpowering masses of the enemy pouring in upon them on every side, the utmost exertions of the officers to preserve discipline were unavailing, and on our arrival at the river, the sepoy's dispersed in every direction, and individual safety became the primary object of each. Under these lamentable circumstances, Ensigns (Edgington and Campbell, having seen the other officers cut to pieces by the enemy, together with the greater part of the detachment, and deeming all further chance of resistance hopeless, escaped, the former closely pursued, to Com's Bazar, and thence by water to Chittagong, and the latter, who was slightly wounded, by a circuitous route through the hills to the same place.

We have, &c.
J. W. SCOTT, Lieut. Artillery.

Extract letter from Gov. Gen. in Council to Secret Committee of Court of Directors, dated Fort William, 24 June 1824.

We avail ourselves of the immediate departure of a ship for England, to transmit to your Hon. Committee copies of despatches received this day from Brig. Gen. Sir Arch. Campbell, announcing the capture of Rangoon on the 11th ult., and beg leave to offer to your Hon. Committee our congratulations on this highly interesting and important event.

We are happy to inform your Hon. Committee that, by the latest accounts from Chittagong, it appears that the Burmese troops had not ventured to advance from the intrenchments thrown up by them at Ramoo, after the defeat of our detachment at that place; that the temporary alarm occasioned by that disaster was rapidly subsiding, and that the reinforcements approaching Chittagong would speedily place the garrison at that station in a condition to undertake offensive operations against the enemy, should the season still admit of our advance to the southward. More than one half of the sepoy's of the Ramoo detachment, reported to have been cut off in the action of the 10th, had returned to Chittagong unhurt, but we regret to say, that of the six officers stated to have been killed, no hope remains that any of them survive. ADMIRALTY OFFICE, DEC. 11.

A letter has been received from Commodore Grant, C.B., commanding H.M.'s ships in the East-Indies, addressed to John Wilson Croker, Esq., and dated on board H.M.'s ship Liffey, off Rangoon, the 30th of May last, in which the Commodore reports the occupation of that place by the land forces under the command of Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, and the proceedings of a detachment sent up the river from the Liffey, under the orders of Lieut. James Wilkinson, of that ship, accompanied by 100 men of the grenadier company of the 38th regt., under Capt. Beach (Birch), for the purpose of destroying some stockades formed by the enemy on the banks of the river.

This service was effectually performed, the detachment landing on one instance immediately in face of the principal stockade: the enemy was dislodged from the several positions, the stockade destroyed, and the village burnt; and the Commodore expresses his sense of the zeal and gallantry displayed by the officers and men employed on the occasion.

The following is a return of the persons wounded in the performance of the above service: Lieut. James Wilkinson; Wm. Austin, seaman (since dead); Robert Sim, ditto; Thos. Jones (1), ditto; Wm. Ferguson, ditto, slightly; W. Johnstone, ditto; Henry Brown, ditto; John Bartley, ditto; Walter Galway, armourer's mate, ditto. [loc. 11 Dec.]

Copy report from Lieut. Stedman to the officer commanding 2d bat. 17th regt., dated on board the Heroine, 18th May 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to report that, agreeably to orders of yesterday's date, I crossed the river, and landed with the three companies detailed to accompany me, at about three o'clock, and within three quarters of a mile of the enemy, whose appearance before reaching the shore left me little doubt as to their intentions of opposing our approach beyond the spot, on which it was evident they had strongly stockaded themselves. The day was too far advanced to expect any reinforcement under Capt. Ogilvie, and as our situation, from not knowing the strength of the Burmese, did not ensure success against them, I determined to detain the boats that brought us, in case it might be necessary to retreat to the ships, at the same time ordering the companies (all of whom landed nearly at the same moment), to follow the advanced guard at the distance of fifty paces. We had proceeded but a short space, when I observed the guard in advance to halt, and I received intimation that they were already close under a breast-work of the enemy, surmounted with guns, which the thick jungle along the beach had prevented my observing, or indeed any of the party in advance till very close to it. Delay, however, under any circumstances, was to be avoided, and as I had made up my mind to return their fire the instant they commenced it, I pushed on, desiring the advance to join their companies, and having loaded, returned their first shot from cannon and small arms, with a volley, which was followed up by a charge and an incessant fire on them from the rear companies for the space of ten minutes, when the breast-work, with guns complete, was ours, and all our attention was directed to the stockade itself, in which, at this period, at least 500 armed men were observable. Provisionally for us, an opening to the right of the stockade from the breast-work had not been completed, into which we continued to pour our fire with such success, that the enemy were observed to decamp with the greatest precipitation, saving us their cannon, and indeed every thing they were possessed of; a list of which, with a return of killed and wounded, will be found in the margin.* I cannot conclude this report without expressing my entire approbation of the conduct of all concerned on this occasion, for to all I feel my best acknowledgments are due, though, were I to particularize, the services of Lieuts. Lindsey, Haig, and Hutchings, were such as to entitle them to praise more valuable than mine. Our loss is so trifling, when I consider the means the enemy had of annoying us, that it can only be attributed to their fire being directed too high.

I have, &c.

Extract letter from Gov. Gen. in Council to the Secret Committee of Court of Directors, dated Fort William, July 14, 1824.

Subsequent to the fall of Rangoon, the force under the command of Brig. Gen. Sir Archibald Campbell has been engaged in repeated affairs with the enemy, who, favoured by the nature of the country, and their own particular mode of warfare, hover around our outposts, and maintain a desultory, barbarous, and unrelaxing struggle without affording any opportunity of coming to a general action—unvariable success, however, has attended our numerous assaults of their stockades and fortified

* List of killed and wounded, with a detachment of the 2d bat. 17th regt., or C.I.L., under the command of Lieut. Stedman:—1 jemadar, 1 sepoy, killed; 2 natives, 3 sepoy's wounded.

List of stores taken and destroyed by a detachment of the 2d bat. 17th regt., or C.I.L., under the command of Lieut. Stedman:—10 pieces of ordnance, of different calibres; between 50 and 60 loads, containing rice and military stores.

fortified positions, and several brilliant and striking scenes have been exhibited of British science, valour, and intrepidity, during the course of these harassing operations, as your hon. Committee will observe on reference to the despatches from Sir Archibald Campbell. The enemy have already lost several of their best troops, whilst the casualties on our part have been comparatively trifling, though we have to regret the loss of two brave young officers (Lieut. Kerr, of H.M.'s 38th, and Lieut. A. Howard, of the 11th), and the severe wounds sustained by the officers mentioned in the margin.*

From the last accounts we learn that the enemy, after having been repeatedly dlogled from their stockades, and compelled to retire, had again collected in great force at a stockaded post near the village of Kemandyne, three miles north of Rangoon. Sir Archibald Campbell proceeded to attack this position with a force of three thousand men, heavy battering guns and mortars, on the 11th and 11th ult. The result of these operations seems at last to have produced some decisive effect, and to have struck terror in the enemy, who had retired to a distance from the front of the British position.

Your hon. Committee will bear in mind that when Sir Archibald Campbell sailed from Port Cornwallis, the place of general rendezvous, he detached two expeditions from the main body of his force, the one against the island of Cheduba, on the Arracan coast, commanded by Brigadier M^r Leach, and the other against Negrais Isle, at the mouth of the Irrawaddy, and eventually Bawun, or Patungin, under Major Wahab, of the Madras N^y, and the H.C.'s cruiser Mercury.

The attack upon Cheduba was skilfully managed by Brigadier M^r Leach, and succeeded in all its parts, with trifling loss on our part. The Rajah, or Governor, was made prisoner, and the island, which is described as very fertile and productive, is now garisoned by several companies of the 4th N^y, under Lieut. Col. Hampton, supported by a vessel of war, reinforcements are likewise on their way to Cheduba from Chittagong.

The operations against Negrais were likewise conducted in a reputable and satisfactory style, and afforded to a detachment of the 17th Madras I^y, under Lieut. Stedman, an opportunity of distinguishing itself, by the gallant and successful assault of a strong stockade, garrisoned by a large force of the enemy, but the island itself proved to be not worth holding, and a failure of provisions, combined with other considerations, induced Major Wahab to relinquish the design of proceeding up the river to attack Bawun.

We shall now return to the state of affairs, and the progress of events on our eastern frontiers.

The only proceedings of any consequence taken by the Burman general since the action of Bawun, have been the capture of the stockade of Tek Naaf, garrisoned by about one hundred and fifty provincials, under a cooladar, with a gun, and an attempt to cut off the H.C.'s cruiser Vestal with her gun boats in the Naaf. The former object they accomplished without any loss, owing to the treacherous and mutinous conduct of the provincials, who refused to fight, and went over to the enemy in a body, delivering up the whole of the ammunition in the hope of making good terms for themselves. The other two objects were completely foiled, and received a severe and memorable chastisement from the Vestal and her gun boats, whose fire destroyed several of their war boats in the Naaf, and committed terrible havoc among the crews and the troops who lined either shore, expecting to find the vessels an easy prey. The cruiser and gun-boats immediately after made sail for Chittagong, where they arrived in safety on the 7th ult.

In Assam, the progress of our troops has secured the important objects of depriving the enemy of nearly two-thirds of that territory, of destroying a considerable portion of their force there, and, as we hope, of placing serious obstacles in the way of any attempt which the Burmese might be disposed to make to invade Bengal, by the route of the Burmahpoorer.

After two or three successful affairs with the enemy, in which a detachment of the 4th, under Capt. Hornsbury, and two companies of irregular horse, particularly distinguished themselves, operations had necessarily come to a stand, by the last accounts, owing to the state of the weather. [Gen. 23d Feb.]

Sir, Herewith I have the honour of transmitting you a return of the ordnance captured at this place on the 11th ult., including ten small pieces brought from Negrais. The strength of the enemy in this arm, so far exceeding any thing reported, is now I conceive very much crippled, as in the different encounters we have since had, nothing larger than muskets, or small pieces, have been found with them.

Copy despatch from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., to Gen. Swinton, Esq., Sec. to the Bengal Gov., dated Rangoon, 1st June 1884.

Sir, Since I last had the honour of addressing you, the detachment sent against Negrais has returned to head quarters. The reports of the officers commanding, relative to the operations against that part of the enemy's coast, I beg herewith to enclose, and under all the circumstances therein stated, I hope Major Wahab's evacuation of a place so little calculated for a military post may be approved of. Indeed I am fully of opinion that the object which the right hon. the Governor General in Council had in view has been accomplished, by reports of the simultaneous attacks upon Rangoon, Negrais, and (I make no doubt) Cheduba, reaching the Court of Ava at the same time; and it will appear by Lieut. Stedman's report, that the enemy again experienced the valour of the British arms.

Here little change has taken place in our situation.

Copy of Report from Capt. Goodridge, commanding the cruiser Mercury, to Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., dated off Rangoon, 27th May 1884.

Sir: I have the honour to report the arrival at this anchorage, of the H.C.'s cruiser Mercury, under my command, to wait your further orders, and to acquaint you, in compliance with the instructions received from Commodore Grant, of H.M.'s R.N.,

N.N., I effected the purpose, on the 18th May, p.m., for which I was directed to accompany Maj. Wahab, of the 17th Madras N.A., to the island of Negrais, on which a party was landed by Major Wahab, and the British flag hoisted, without opposition.

On the 16th our attention was called to a collection of men and boats on the opposite side of the river, a party was sent, accompanied by the Mercury, which produced a letter from the Governor of Basma.

On the 17th a stockade was perceived, of some extent and strength, on the N.W. we weighed anchor in company with a party of troops. At half past four anchored off the stockade, the party having previously landed from all the boats procurable. At five p.m. the Birmahs opened an indifferent fire on the stock, when I commenced a long range shot, and after firing a few rounds from our long guns, the troops marched into the stockade without further opposition, on which at dusk I have to report the capture of twenty-eight boats (all of which were destroyed), and fourteen pieces of small cannon.

The island of Negrais is confined to about six miles in circumference, extending N.E. and S.W. On the S.W. end, there is a plain of some extent, covered with grass, on which I saw a number of cattle and enclosures for a very small quantity of rice. The hills and other parts are quite woody, no run of water was discovered but confined to wells, they are capable of producing a great deal with a little attention.

The entrance into Negrais has here I considered difficult and only to be effected with great precaution, the channel being extremely narrow, it is quite secure from all winds; the river beyond that to Basma is, from my own observations, and what I have since collected, clear and safe from the island to Basma.

I have, &c.

R. GOODRIDGE, Capt. H.C.C. Mercury.

Extract Despatch from Brig Gen Sir A. Campbell, dated 4th June 1884.

On the 2d Inst I received information that the enemy had assembled in great force, and were stockading themselves at Kemmendine, intending to attack our lines, and that the messenger who had been sent to me, as I suspected, was therefore ordered two strong columns of reconnaissance from the Madras division to move on the following morning upon two roads leading from the Great Dagon Pagoda to the village of Kemmendine, the right column under the command of Lieut. Col. Hodgson, the other under the command of Lieut. Col. Smith, proceeding myself up the Pagoda river with two of the 11th, a cruiser and three companies of the 41st regt., for the purpose of observing the enemy's force, and making a diversion in favour of any attack which might be made by land. In the course of two hours we were abreast of the enemy's encampment. The troops landed and burnt every hut to the ground, brought away our war boats and destroyed another, carried off an eighteen pound carronade, all without the least opposition from the enemy, who either fled into the jungle or retired into a very large stockade, which I observed close by, and from which some guns were fired, killing and wounding a few men.

In the course of the morning the two columns, coming down from the Great Dagon Pagoda, met close to the stockade of Kemmendine, just alluded to, and an assault was made to enter it, which I have no doubt would have succeeded, but for the occurrence of some mistake, and as the attack was never in any way persevered in, I do not much regret the result, as it will tend to lull our crafty foe into a security that may soon prove fatal to him. I am anxiously employed in preparing transport for the future progress of the expedition. We have already captured fifty or sixty large cargo boats, which are getting cut down and made more manageable, and are calculated, on an average, to carry a complement of sixty men each.

The second embarkation from Madras, consisting of H.M.'s 80th regt., and two battalions of native infantry, has arrived in the river.

Extract Despatch from Brig Gen Sir A. Campbell to Lieut. Gen. Swinton, F.C.S., Sec. to the Bengal Gov., dated 10th June 1884.

Since I last did myself the honour of addressing you, Brigadier McCreagh and the European part of the detachment sent against Cheduba have returned to head-quarters, having fully executed the orders given by me, agreeably to the instructions I had received from the right hon. the Governor-General in Council. The able and satisfactory manner in which Brigadier McCreagh carried on the operations entrusted to him, will appear by the enclosed report, and the result has been such as might have been expected from the judicious arrangements of that experienced officer.

Having completed my arrangements for striking a blow upon the enemy's force assembled there, on the morning of the 10th Inst., although the weather continued so moist and unpropitious, we ordered a force of most unwarlike and unwarlike men, with about 1,000 men, four 18-pounders, four mortars, and some field pieces, sending two divisions of vessels up the river to prevent the enemy from escaping on that side. It was my intention not to lose a man if it could be avoided. The enemy had already frequently experienced the irresistible influence of the British bayonet, and I ordered them to wish they should also know that we had still other, and perhaps more dreadful means of exterminating them in every stockade they might be found in the country, and roads rendered the undertaking extremely arduous, but not beyond the inexhaustible spirit of such soldiers as I command. About two miles from town, the head of the column was stopped by a stockade, apparently very strong and full of men. I ordered two heavy guns and some field pieces to open upon it, while the troops surrounded it on three sides; but the jungle was so very thick and close as to prevent the possibility of altogether cutting off the garrison. In less than half an hour a considerable gap was made in the outer defence of the work, and the defenders, not daring, any where to show themselves, I ordered a party of the Madras European regt., supported by part of the 41st regt., to charge, and the work was immediately carried, with a trifling loss on our part, the enemy leaving one hundred and fifty men dead on the ground. Major Chalmers, leading the supporter of the 41st regt., and one of the first men in the breach, received a wound in the face from a spear, which I am happy to say is not dangerous. While this was going on under my own eye, a very spirited and successful attack was made on the other side of the stockade by the advanced companies of the 11th and 41st regts., who, by assisting each other up to the face of the stockade (at least ten feet high), entered about the same time as the party by the breach, putting every man to death who opposed their entrance, and it affords me pleasure to state that the first man who appeared on the top of the work, was, I believe, Major McCreagh, of the 11th N.I. Inf.

Thus point gained, the column again moved forward nearly a mile, where our left was posted, communicating with the flotilla on the river about half a mile, under a great stockade and fortified camp the head of the column moving up to the right with great toil and labour, through the thick and tenacious jungle, for the purpose of gaining the river above the stockade, and thus completely investing the enemy's great stronghold. In this I was partly disappointed, the enemy having thrown up other works above the stockade, which would have exposed my right to certain loss, and not being able to invest the whole of the enemy's extensive fortifications, I was under the necessity of leaving about one hundred yards, between our right and the river, unoccupied, but as the principal work appeared full of men animating each other with loud and bellowing cheering, I still hoped they would remain till the Impregnable I intended had been made. At four p.m. my troops were in position in many places within a hundred yards of the place, but in all parts with a very thick jungle in front, extending to the very bottom of the stockade. The night passed in erecting batteries, and making preparations for opening the guns at day light next morning, the enemy continuing loud and incessant cheering till after day-light in the morning. The moment we had sufficient light on the following day, a heavy and well-directed fire was opened from our breaching and mortar batteries, which was kept up for nearly two hours, when a party advancing to observe the breach, found the enemy, during the cannonade, had evacuated the place, carrying off their dead and wounded. The chain of posts occupied by the enemy rendered flight at all times easy, and the thickness of the jungle necessarily prevented our observing when it took place.

The stockade is one of great strength, had capable of being obstinately defended. It was gar-

ing across with the horsemen to the river, succeeded in cutting off the retreat of about two hundred; some escaped by swimming, about forty were killed by the sewars, a number were drowned, and several sabred or shot in the water. The picket, which had marched along the banks of the river, got up in time to kill several in the water, several of the enemy on horseback attempted to escape by swimming their horses, but were thrown from their saddles in the middle of the river, their horses or tatoes swimming back, fell into our hands. We captured about seven dittoos, about eighteen jin gals, two very good brass drums, and a number of old muskets, &c., and several of the jingals were loaded, and contained seven balls.

I am happy to say we have suffered no loss among the sewars, either killed or wounded.

I am, however, sorry to say that a duffidar of Gilbert's horse was shot through the body, and is since dead, three horses only were wounded.

Lieut. Jones on this occasion acted with a great deal of credit to himself, and, but for his exertions, the enemy would have got back to their stockade with a trifling loss indeed. I fear, however, about three hundred of the enemy regained their stockade.

Having received some interesting despatches from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell and the Political Agent, since the despatch of our last address to your hon. Committee of the 12th ult. * and the ship Greenock being still in the river, and on the eve of sailing, we have the honour to transmit copies of the despatches above adverted to, and other papers of importance relating to the Burmese war for the immediate information of your hon. It is with sentiments of sincere sorrow that we announce to your hon. Committee the demise of Major Manning at this residence, on the morning of the 2d inst. This valuable officer had been compelled to leave Rangoon from indisposition and he was the more induced to seek a climate for change of air, as he conceived that his presence here at this time would be of material service, in affording us information on many points connected with the further prosecution of the war.

Campbell's despatches of the 6th June and 11th July, reporting the particulars of the brilliant actions in which our troops have been engaged, but request leave to refer you to the despatches themselves.

"Your hon. Committee will not fail to remark with the highest satisfaction the gallant behaviour of the native troops who on several occasions have emulated the examples of integrity and valour set them by the Europeans. We have when fled to Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell and Mr. Bean our highest approbation of all their proceedings, and have requested them to convey to the several officers, whose services have been particularly adverted to, our thanks and acknowledgments for their gallant exertions.

In the affair of the 10th June, against the fortified ramp and stockades at Kammein, the flight of the enemy alone presented the complete success of Sir A. Campbell's judicious and well concerted measures for striking a most impressive blow, by the destruction, which must have inevitably ensued, of the whole or the main part of their force, had they ventured to alight the assault. But still a great point was gained by that and the previous attacks on the several fortified positions of the Burmese. It being evident, from the subsequent abandonment of all the stockades in the neighbourhood of our army, that the enemy was now convinced these strong holds were no security against the British bayonet, or the force of our artillery. The result of the operations on the 8th ult. was peculiarly decisive and brilliant on that day the stockades were carried at the point of the bayonet, thirty eight pieces of artillery, forty six mules and muskets captured, an important loss of the enemy's best troops, including some chiefs, left dead upon the ground.

"From the despatches referred to your hon. Committee will also learn that on the 1st of July an attempt was made by the enemy under positive orders from the Court of Ava to make a general attack upon our line and drive us once out of the country and that this military attack was repulsed by three weeks' continuance of sewars and two pieces of artillery. I trust some prisoners will be taken on this occasion. Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell learnt that the enemy's force on this occasion consisted of 10,000 men.

"On our north eastern frontier few events of any consequence have occurred since the date of our last address. In Assam the officer commanding has fallen back, and concentrated his force at Cowahatti. The detachment on the frontier of Sylhet has taken up its quarters at Baidupore and the neighbourhood after an unsuccessful attempt to shell the enemy out of their fortified position on the hill of Floyon. The particulars of this affair are contained in letters, copies of which are number in the packet.

Extract Letter from Lieut. Col. James, C. B., commanding the Sylhet frontier, to Lieut. Col. Nicolson, Adj. Gen. of the army, dated on the river before Floyon 6th July 1824.

I have the honour to report that a battery was opened on the stockaded position of Floyon this morning at six o'clock.

The shells from both howitzers and six-pounds were thrown with the greatest precision but the round shot from the latter, I regret to say, had scarcely any effect on the strong garrison, nor on the works, the palisades in question being heavy trunks of trees. I regret also to add that the carcasses when thrown from the howitzers went wide of the mark and consequently the firing of the guns on the sides and summit of the hill which I expected, has not been accomplished. The guns are now posted on a rising ground about six hundred yards to the south west of the stockade but I purpose to move now carrying six pounders to a small hill directly south of the enemy's position.

Extract Letter from Lieut. Col. James to the Adj. General, dated before Floyon 7th July 1824.

In continuation of my last despatch I have the honour, for the information of his Excellency the Commander in Chief, to report that on the afternoon of yesterday, about five o'clock, the enemy made an attempt to turn the right of my position, by occupying a high hill in the rear of a swamp ground, where a work party was employed in clearing the jungle, for the purpose of enabling me to place my guns in battery on it this morning. I directed the Rajah Gumbher Singh, whose local knowledge is excellent, with a body of his infantry, to take the enemy in rear, and at the same time three forward strong detachments to support the working party after a short skirmish the enemy were driven from their position, and I succeeded in routing them, the spot I had fixed on for the guns during the night a breast work was thrown up, and this morning at day break the guns opened from it at the distance of four hundred yards.

Three pieces of Artillery, which this morning made the enemy's position very uncomfortable, were then brought forward, and the shells took very considerable ble, though the, a team themselves in a somewhat from the severity of the fire by hurrying to the ground.

The only casualties consequent to the skirmish of yesterday were one man killed and three wounded, of the 11th Rajah Gumbhbeer Singh's Infantry, and one recruit, of the 10th or Sylhet local battalion, wounded.

Although the artillery has been playing on the enemy's works with the greatest steadiness during the day, the fire has not had the desired effect, and the enemy still continue in possession of the place, many of them have been killed, and many more wounded; but till further reinforcements join me, to enable me to extend my operations, I am not sanguine in my hopes of carrying the position.

Extract Letter from Lieut. Col. Innes, to the Adj. General, dated on the Barak river, off Juttapore, 6th July 1884.

I have the honour to acquaint you, for the information of his Excy. the Commander in Chief, that on the morning of yesterday, a little after day light, the enemy, in great numbers, made a sudden and unexpected attack on the height immediately in the rear of the battery, which had been occupied by Gumbhbeer Singh's followers, and succeeded in driving them from it. I immediately sent off a party to endeavour to get on the hills on their flank, but, I regret to say, this attempt failed, as it was discovered, on upon finding, that the enemy had occupied the whole line of hills in immense numbers, and that there was no prospect of attacking them with any chance of success. The party was therefore recalled, and the battery being no longer usable, it being so entirely commanded by the heights now in the occupation of the enemy, I was under the necessity of drawing off the guns. I have, however, to observe, that this measure was determined on before, in consequence of the howitzers having become unserviceable, and the exhausted state both of the artillery and infantry of my detachment, the former having been in the batteries from the morning of the 6th, till the 10th inst. I think it my duty to bring to the notice of his Excy. the very zealous exertions of this arm of the service, the practice was beyond praise, and the shot and shells were thrown with a precision which could not be surpassed, but the six-pounder shot were found to have no effect on the enemy's works, although the shells must have done considerable execution.

The carcasses, from being damp, did not, as I before reported, ignite, and consequently were useless.

I feel myself much indebted to Capt. Smith for his great exertions during the three days the battery was open, and to Lieut. Huthwaite, who, though labouring under a severe fever, rendered me the most essential service.

I regret to say, that from the commanding position of the height, the guns were not withdrawn from the battery without some slight loss on our part, and which, from the advantages possessed by the enemy, might have been much greater, had they not been kept in check by the steadiness of the troops in the battery, under the command of Capt. Cowles, of the 5th regt., whose conduct was particularly conspicuous.

I deemed it advisable to re-embark my detachment yesterday afternoon, and to fall back upon Juttapore, where I have taken up an eligible position on both sides of the Barak river, and within two miles of the enemy's works, where I shall remain till re-inforced, and then act as circumstances may require.

Enclosed, I have the honour to forward a return of the killed and wounded of the detachment under my command on the affair of yesterday.

Return of killed and wounded of troops employed on the Sylhet and Cachar frontier, under the command of Lieut. Col. W. Innes, C.B., in the affair with the Burmese on the heights near Tilayan, on the 8th July 1884.

Off Juttapore, 8th July 1884.
Killed—2 sepoy.
Wounded—1 sirdadar, 1 havildar, 1 naick, 14 sepoy.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Saturday, March 5.

The Society met at the usual hour; H. T. Colebrooke, Esq., the Director, in the chair.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

A curious Burmese manuscript was presented to the Society by James Alexander, Esq.

The reading of Mr. Lachlan's paper on the Brahmaputra and Assam rivers finished this day.

James Ansley, Esq.; — McTaggart, Esq.; and General Noble, were elected Resident Members, and his Excellency Prince Polignac, a Foreign Member of the Society.

Tuesday, March 15.

This was the anniversary meeting of the Society. H. T. Colebrooke, Esq., took the chair at one o'clock.

A report of the state of the Society's funds was read by Col. Dbyle. It contained the most gratifying details, and excited general satisfaction. It announced that, considering the short period since its formation, the state of the Society was most prosperous. Its funded property amounted to £2,085; besides which, there remained a balance of £313 14s. 7d. in the hands of the treasurer.

treasurer. The annual income of the Society now amounts to £800, whilst its expenditure is only £600, leaving an annual surplus of £200, in addition to the other property belonging to the Society, consisting of furniture, books, &c.

The election of officers, &c., for the ensuing year took place (see p. 273); and thanks were voted to the officers, members of council, treasurer, and honorary secretary.

Saturday, March 19.

The Society met at three o'clock; H. T. Colebrooke, Esq., the Director, in the chair.

The minutes of the two preceding meetings were read and confirmed.

The following donations were reported: by the Rev. S. Weston, Persian Recreations, &c., also specimens of Cufic writing, prior to the first Cufic coins from the mint of Damascus, in the King of Sweden's collection.

The Secretary (pro tem.) then read a letter from Sir Geo. Staunton, accompanying and explaining a communication from J. F. Davis, Esq., of Canton, consisting of translations of some curious articles in recent Pekin Gazettes. The first was a report from a Chinese military commander to the court of Peking, respecting the state of the frontier bordering on the Burmese empire; and shows that the Chinese Government are neither ignorant of, nor indifferent to, our hostilities with the kingdom of Ava. The officer referred to had been deputed to examine the proper situations for establishing military posts and watch-towers.

The second was an official article respecting the depreciation of the inferior metallic currency of China, in some of the provinces, and the expedients requisite to correct it. According to the statement in the Gazette, it appears that the base metal coin, denominated tchen, have fallen considerably in their relative value, compared with silver: a serious evil, since the troops are paid in that currency, at the rate of 1,000 tchen to the tael, whilst in the market, the tael would purchase 1,240 or 1,260. The article represents the amount in one province at 43,200 strings of tchen, of 1,000 each; or 43,200,000 tchen. The official report assigns, as the cause of this depreciation, the practice of the provincial traders, who, after disposing of their merchandize, in order to avoid the troublesome carriage of the base currency, exchange it for silver, whereby the latter is diminished, and the former increased in quantity. It suggests the propriety of stopping the coinage of tchen until the relative value of this coin reaches its proper proportion to silver: which was approved and ordered by the court.

Thanks were voted to Sir Geo. Staunton and to Mr. Davis for this communication.

The Secretary then commenced the reading of an essay on the Life and History of Firdousi, by James Ross, Esq.,* the conclusion of which was deferred.

Adjourned till Saturday, April 16.

* See some criticisms on, and versions of, Firdousi, by this gentleman, under the signature of Gulchin, in this Journal, vol. x i., p. 106; vol. xiii., p. 119.

VARIETIES;

PHILOSOPHICAL, SCIENTIFIC, AND LITERARY.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

Monday, 6 Sep.—A meeting of the Society was held at the Society's apartments, Chouringhee, this evening, —J. H. Harrington, Esq. President in the chair.

Lieut. Gordon was elected a member.

The Babylonian brick, transmitted by the hon. Capt. Keppel, for the museum, was submitted to the meeting.

A kusu naturam was presented by F. P. Strong, Esq. together with several images of Boodh from Rangoon.

Two large Boudha images, also from Rangoon, were presented by Dr. Thomas, through Mr. Gibbon.

A copy of the Bhagavat Gita, printed in the original Sanscrit at Bonn, with a Latin translation, by A. W. Schlegel, was presented to the Society by the author.

Copies of the prospectus for publishing the text and translation of the Ramayana, and the 4th number of the Indische Bibliothek, were presented by the same gentleman.

Two pamphlets on the zodiac of Dendera, were presented by Mons. De Paravey, of Paris, with a note from the author suggesting to the Society to transmit a Chinese work, the Thou-chou-men-ky to Europe, as a work not to be found in the libraries of London or Paris, and of great historical value, containing a complete chronological list of the ancient sovereigns of China. It was accordingly resolved that inquiry should be made for the work in question.

The 2d part of the 5th volume of the transactions of the Horticultural Society; the report of the Garden Committee, and a list of the members, were presented by that Society.

The 2d volume of the Archæological Researches for 1823; the 2d part of the Philosophical Transactions for 1823, and the last volume of the Transactions of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Sciences, &c. were presented by the respective Societies.

A letter was read from H. T. Colebrooke, Esq. forwarding a supply of Books for the Society's library.

A volume of drawings, by a native artist, under the superintendence of Mons. Casanova, from the models of native implements constructed by the late Miss Tyler, was submitted to the meeting by the secretary.

An analytical summary of the contents of the Vishnu Purana, by the secretary, was read by him at this meeting.

The collective works, called the Puranas, hold an eminent place in the religion and literature of the Hindoos. Interior in sanctity only to the Vedas, and like them possessing the credit of an inspired origin, they exercise a much more practical influence upon the Hindoo community. They regulate their ritual, direct their faith, and supply, in popular legendary tales, materials for their credulity. To European scholars they are recommended on other accounts, and have been reputed to contain not only the picturesque and mythological part of the superstitions of India, but to preserve extensive and valuable remains of history, whose data approach at least closely to the era of the deluge.

The Puranas are of two classes; principal and subordinate. There are eighteen in each line; the latter, or Upo Puranas, are variously enumerated, and very little known. The former are all attributed to the sage Krishna Dwaipayana; the 28th Vyasa, or compiler of them, and of the Vedas. The eighteen great Puranas are said to contain 400,000 slokas, which in our mode of computing verse would be 1,600,000 lines.

The actual operation of these works upon the minds of a vast portion of mankind, and the reputation they bear of high antiquity and historical wealth, entitle them to a full and candid investigation. A plan has been accordingly devised for submitting the whole of them to analysis, and the result of the process, as applied to one of the most famous of the number, was submitted to the meeting. The Vishnu Purana, it appears from this account, is a work of a sectarian character, inculcating the preferential adoration of Vishnu. The legendary portion, although considerable, is less extensive and extravagant than in most of the Puranas, and the genealogical and historical sections contain much curious and valuable matter. Mr. Wilson does not consider this Purana to be older than the middle of the 10th century, but it is avowedly compiled from older materials, and refers the historical portion to ancient and apparently traditionary memorials. Upon the whole it is considered to be perhaps the most rational and valuable of the class of works to which it appertains.

Wednesday, 3 Nov.—A meeting of the Society was held this evening at the Society's apartments, when the Vice-Presidents and Committee of papers were re-elected for the ensuing year.

Mr. E. Sirling was elected a member.

A work entitled a Solution of Three Enigmas by I. F. Newton, Esq., presented by the author; and an account of the result of an Expedition fitted out from the Madras observatory for ascertaining the length of the Pendulum at the Equator, presented by the Government of Fort St. George, were laid before the Society.

The expedition to the Equator was set on foot by Mr. Goldingham, under the encouragement of Sir Thomas Munro, and Sir Stamford Raffles, in 1821. In 1822 the party under Capt. Crisp arrived at Bencoelen, and after some time occupied in searching for an eligible spot, stationed themselves on a small Island named Gaunah Lout in January 1824. The latitude of the island was $0^{\circ} 1' 48'' 78$. The observations and the experiments were continued till the end of March, and were very numerous and laborious. The details form the bulk of the report, a folio of 268 pages, including, however, a series of observations to determine the geographical position of a number of places in the vicinity; the result, affecting the main object of the expedition, giving the length of the Pendulum at Gaunah Lout, was inches 39.02125991.

Lieut. Gerard forwarded some alterations and additions to his paper on the range of the thermometer at Kotguth, which was noticed in our last report. The additions chiefly relate to some of the agricultural productions of that climate, particularly opium and hemp. Of the former Lieut. Gerard observes that the intoxicating qualities are greater than of the opium produced in the Sikh states between the hills, and the hill opium is therefore in great demand in the Punjab. The poppy is reared also in the hills at less expense and with less labour than in the plains, never requiring irrigation, which in the latter situation is indispensable. The seed is sown in October, and the young plant, after reaching the height of a few inches, is buried for several months beneath the snow. As soon as the snow melts the plant sprouts up rapidly and comes to perfection in April and May. The milky exudation is collected usually on the morning after the incision is made, but sometimes not till the second day. The people of the hills are much addicted to the use of this drug, and not unfrequently employ it to put an end to their existence, when they have been offended or disappointed.

Two kinds of bhanga, or hemp, are reared in the hills. The plants are vigorous and the hemp of good quality. In the mountainous parts of Gerwhal it is a staple article of commerce. The seeds are partly expressed for oil, and partly eaten. An intoxicating extract is prepared from the leaves by merely rubbing them between the hands. This is called chur-rus. It is very extensively used by mixing and smoking it with tobacco, and is largely exported.

Other articles, the production of these regions, are enumerated by Lieut. Gerard, of considerable interest to agriculture and trade; as oats, various sorts of grain and pulse—various fruits, as the apple, peach, filbert, walnut, &c. roots, as ginger and turmeric; and resinous extracts, as turpentine and pitch.

A notice of a Christian community in Persia, which seems to have escaped the observation of European travellers, was communicated by the Rev. Mr. Mill. These Christians are said to occupy a small town near Inbreex, called Khosrawan, but have churches and bishops at Jerusalem, Diarbeker, and Mousel. They are distinguished from other oriental Christians by their professing to be of Jewish descent, and by their forming an independent community, regulated by a patriarch and bishops unconnected with any other establishments. It is possible also, that there may be amongst them, other characteristic peculiarities of doctrine, or ritual, but the information yet received is of an imperfect nature, and it was chiefly with a view to call attention to the subject and excite further inquiry, that the notice was communicated to the Society.

A memoir of the late Monsieur Du Vaucel was read to the meeting by Monsieur Du Bois de Beauchêne. This enterprising naturalist was probably known to many of our readers as he had been several years in this part of India, and had always been remarkable for his intelligence and zeal.

ASIAN SOCIETY OF PARIS.

The following persons were admitted members.

L'Abbe Dubois, formerly missionary in India.

Capt. Lachin, member of the Asiatic Society of Calcutta.

M. Othman Hank transmitted from Wurzburg his thanks for the title conferred upon him of corresponding associate, and he also announced the approaching publication of the third part of his Chrestomathie Sanscritte.

M. St. Martin concluded the reading of the notes of oriental manuscripts, transmitted to the society by Lord Kingsborough.

M. Klaproth gave an account of the progress made in printing the Georgian vocabulary.

M. E. Coquebert de Monbret communicated the translation of two chapters, taken from the historical Prolegomena of Ibn Khaledoun.

M. Amédée Jaquet read an account of a Turkish MS. in Ouzgour characters, transmitted from Vienna, by M. de Hamme.

M. Baron Coquebert de Monbret read a note upon a passage in Ibn-el Oudi, relative to a volcanic mountain, situated to the eastward of the Caspian Sea; and another note upon a Danish translation of the the Thousand and one Nights, by Macdonald.

ORNITHOLOGY.

The following anecdote appears in the Bengal Hurkaru, as a communication from Pundit Cavillit Vancata Ramiswami. If it has any foundation, it affords a curious fact in natural history; if it be a fable, it shows the extent of Hindoo credulity.

"In the year 1804, I accompanied my worthy protector, the late Lieut. Col. Mackenzie, to Garisoppah from the range of Saugor hills in the Mysore country.

"I was obliged to proceed to Garisoppah village, situated on the high ground, with a number of scattered houses at a little distance from the salt-water river, by which people go to Mirjan, Gocurnum, Raja Mahandra Gur, in the Indian caroes, some time in April; the colonel proposed to take the stations on the large precipices of Jogey hills, which are situated north at 12 co-s from Garisoppah Ghaut; I accompanied him there, to interpret to the natives while on the survey of that district, as well as to his assistant surveyors. We passed through the dreary woods which extend to a good distance, and reached the Jogihully village, towards the evening. We were informed by the village sathing (accountant) that there were some curiosities to be seen; but as the day was far advanced, we were unable to inspect these curiosities till the next morning. We lodged in a stone-hall for that night, and the next day we went to the eastern rock of that range, where we found ten large dens about 50 feet in length, each filled up with great quantity of various sorts of grains, which we suppose could not have contained less than two hundred khandies of paddy, &c. We were surprised to find so large a quantity of grain collected there, and inquired of the inhabitants of the district respecting it; they informed us, that various flocks of birds, arrive from Uncola, Mirjan, Sadaswa Gur, Narani Basava, Raja Durg, Murdeswerum, and Dhanaswerum, in cold weather, and pick up different kind of grains from the field, and in the latter end of this season, they all come together and deposit their stores into the caves; where they continue for some time. In the beginning of the hot weather, they fly away, and come again in the beginning of the monsoon, and collect and deposit the grain as before, and realize until the next cold season. Thus twice a year they come and deposit the grain in separate heaps, in store against seasons of scarcity, which occasionally occur in the country about the western coast. Those birds, we did accumulate large heaps of grain, and, as we were informed, merely for the sustenance of the inhabitants of Canara Coast. In the time of Hyder Ali, a famine once happened in the country, and the grain was very scarce then; the people went to the caverns on the hills, and begged the birds to spare them the grain, and save them from destruction; the birds assented to their petition by a sign or motion of the head, and as much grain as was required, was taken from those heaps, and distributed among the people of the province. The succeeding season was favourable, and the rain fell abundantly throughout the provinces, so that a plentiful supply of grain was produced throughout the country. In their prosperity, the people of the province did not think of returning the grain they had borrowed from the birds; consequently the people suffered greatly by indispensation. In their affliction they recollected their debt of gratitude to the birds, and collected by subscription as much grain as they had received from the caverns and replenished the heaps again. Having done this their affliction was removed and they were once more restored to happiness and peace. Since that time, whenever the people found there was a scarcity of grain in the country, they borrowed from the heaps of the birds, and returned an equal quantity when they obtained a plentiful crop. That custom is still continued. There are almost every sort of grain to be found on the hill, in separate heaps, and tradition says, it has been so for the last two or three hundred years. The Jogi range of the hill is about 300 miles west of Seringapatam. The birds are called Hakis in the Canara language, and the range is called Hakicotta Jogi hills."

SPECIMENS OF VENUS.

The following singular property of the plain mirror is new, it is believed, to the philosophical world. It was accidentally discovered by a gentleman a few mornings since, and as the subject may excite much speculation, we give his account of it in his own words. "Sitting this morning about gun-fire, with my back to the east, the window being open, and Venus shining brightly into the room, I was surprised to observe two Satellites close to that planet reflected in the mirror which the bearer was holding before me. I turned round immediately and looked at Venus, steadily, with the naked eye, but could not discern them. Again I looked into the mirror, with the same success. I then tried another mirror, supposing that the appearance arose from some defect in the glass; but still the two luminous specks, like stars of the 6th magnitude, were distinctly visible.

If the existence of this extraordinary property of the plain mirror, rivaling in its powers of magnifying, nay surpassing, the finest instruments in the hands of the great Herschel himself, be confirmed by the experiments of other and more able observer, observers than myself, it is difficult to say what wonderful discoveries may not shortly be made. The satellites of the inferior planets have long been a desideratum in astronomy, and if the honour of their discovery be reserved for our new Calcutta observatory, I shall sincerely rejoice that I have been the humble means, in the hands of Providence, of pointing out the path. There is one thing that puzzles me to account for, unless we have recourse to a new and not improbable theory of optics. I allude to the circumstance of Venus not exhibiting, in the mirror, her present gibbous appearance, which a very ordinary telescope will show while the two satellites are distinctly represented in the speculum, though invisible to the most powerful instrument hitherto made. I am who am acquainted with the distinction between the rays of sensible and the rays of radiant heat will be no less to conceive to what I allude. We are as yet but in the infancy of optical science, and light may have many properties which we are not on the eve perhaps of discovering. — The Bull

EGYPTIAN SARCOPHAGUS.

The Egyptian sarcophagus, mentioned as having been exhibited at Marseilles, has been purchased by the French government, and is now on its way to the capital. This tomb weighs 19,000 lbs., and its height 11 ft 0 in. It is eight feet long, four feet broad, and four and a half high. It is marked both on the inside and the outside, with hieroglyphic characters, the whole in an excellent state of preservation. — [French paper]

ILLUSTRATION OF SCRIPTURE.

It is generally believed that our Saviour, in his comparison of the lily of the valley to Solomon in all his glory, referred to the amaryllis lutea, whose golden liliaceous flowers, in autumn, afford one of the most brilliant and gorgeous objects in nature. If this conjecture be correct, it furnishes, as Sir J. E. Smith observes, a remarkable evidence respecting the season of the year when the sermon on the mount was delivered.

FINCE.

The Hindus hold fince in such a high repute, that Yama, a legislator supposed to be judge of departed spirits, declares that those who eat mushrooms, whether springing from the ground or growing on a tree, fully equal in merit the Jajars of Brahmans and the most devout of all devoutly sum.

Chief, the establishment of two Field Hospitals is authorized on the eastern frontier, at such points and from such dates as his Excellency may please to direct.

A central medical depôt will also be formed at Dacca.

MAJOR W. DICKSON.

Fort William, Sept. 23, 1824.—Major William Dickson, of the 6th regt. L.C., is suspended from the service until the orders of the hon. the Court of Directors shall be received.

In announcing this decision, the Government think proper to publish the causes which have imperatively forced them thus to uphold the discipline of the army.

Major Dickson, on the 22d of May last, even before the promulgation of the new arrangements had reached the station, where he was on duty, addressed a memorial to his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, impugning the justice and impartiality of those measures and of the Indian government; deprecating the injury that would ensue to himself and to the cavalry officers at large, from the expected organization; and in highly disrespectful tone thought proper to constitute himself the medium for vindicating their, in his opinion, infringed right, also making statements unfounded in fact, tending to excite discontent, and presuming "to infer that the irregular cavalry may be kept up as much for the convenience of private patronage as for public expediency."

Immediately on this document being submitted to government, a reply was returned, the 15th July, through the Adj. Gen. of the army, disapproving by reference to facts all Maj. Dickson's mis-statements: his Lordship in Council, however, conceiving that officer to have erred only through a want of judgment, he was merely reprehended for the tone of violence and disrespect which characterized his memorial, and assured that it should be forwarded to the hon. the Court of Directors by an early despatch.

Maj. Dickson, nevertheless, after a lapse of nearly three months, repeated the offence in a long letter addressed to the Adj. Gen. of the army, dated 15th August, even before he had received the reply to his first memorial. This second address was only distinguished from the former by an awkwardly flattering appeal to the Commander-in-Chief, against the measures of the government, of which his Excellency is a member, or rather against those of the authorities in England from whom the regulations emanated.

The government would have been willing to give Major Dickson credit for the feelings which may have induced the apology he has since offered, had not the offence been a deliberate repetition of unfounded assertions and insubordinate insinuations, which, in the opinion of the Governor-General in Council, demanded his immediate suspension.

FORMATION OF THE 69th REGT.

These corps are to be formed one in Rohilkund, or in the Meerut district, and one on the western frontier, at such points as his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief may direct.—The European and native staff and establishments to each, will be exactly on the same scale and in the same proportion as in the other regts. of local cavalry.

Lieut.

On the receipt of a report to this effect, by the Commander-in-Chief, his Excellency immediately adopted the necessary measures to bring those misguided men to a sense of their duty. He instantly proceeded to Barrackpore, and, on the following morning, having made a disposition of the other troops at the station, and those which had arrived during the night, the Adj. Gen. and Quarter-Master Gen. of the army, with his Excellency's Persian interpreter, and the officer commanding the 47th nat. regt., were deputed to make a last effort to induce the mutineers, drawn up, loaded, and in regular parade order, to lay down their arms, but without effect.

Nothing then remained, but to inflict the punishment so justly merited. The Commander-in-Chief gave the preconcerted signal for an attack by a part of the force, the mutineers instantly broke, and betook themselves to flight, under the fire of the troops who attacked them; and such an example was made on the spot, as the necessity of the case, and the infamy of the regt. merited; the most guilty of those who were made prisoners, having been subsequently executed by the sentence of a general court-martial.

That a transaction so unusual in, and disgraceful to this army, could have been planned and carried into execution, without the knowledge, not to say, participation of the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the corps, is not for a moment to be credited, composed as the Nat. Regts. are in Bengal; connected by relationship, and living as the native officers and sepoy do, almost under the same roofs, it is not to be believed for a moment, that the grossest neglect of the duty the former owed to the state, has not been shown by the parties in question; the Governor-General in Council consequently considers the 47th regt. Nat. Inf., including its native commissioned and non-commissioned officers to be disgraced; directs that No. 47 be struck out of the army list, the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers to be instantly discharged the service, as totally unworthy of the confidence of government, or the name of soldiers, and that a new regt. to be numbered 69, to which the European officers of the late 47th will be appointed, be immediately raised in its stead, for general service, agreeably with the detail as laid down in general orders of the 11th July 1825, No. 65.

To the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the Bengal army, the Governor-General in Council now more particularly desires to address himself. He is perfectly satisfied that no instance of insubordination can take place in a corps without such coming to their nearly knowledge. He hereby demands from them a rigid execution of their duty, and observes that even on the removal of any discontent in a corps, it is their particular duty to communicate it instantly to their European officers, and to exert their utmost endeavours to put down in the first instance any appearance of combination; his Lordship in Council further desires it to be distinctly understood, that in failure of that line of conduct, which is expected from the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the army, they will be held personally and collectively responsible for any misbehaviour of the men, who are more immediately under their eye and command in the lines, than they can be under that of the European officers; and that the most prompt dismissal from the service will be the inevitable consequence of any want of exertion and zeal, or any abandonment of duty: in short, he warns them to profit by the example of the 47th, who have drawn down on themselves a punishment they most justly merited.

The Governor-General in Council, in order to make known the sentiments of government to the native army as fully and correctly as possible, is pleased to direct that this order shall be translated into the Hindoostanee language, and printed in the Nagree character, for the purpose of transmission to corps respectively, through the Adj. Gen. of the army, under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief, who will be pleased to issue such subsidiary orders as his Excellency may consider necessary, drafting the privates of the late 47th, whose fidelity remained unshaken, into such regts. as may appear most expedient.

WM. CANNING, Lieut. Col.

Sec. to Govt. Mil. Dept.

The Bengal Harkur gives a more detailed account of the affair, which it assures its readers is perfectly correct and authentic. The following is an abridgement of it:

The 26th, 47th, and 62d regts. had been under marching orders for some time past, and on the 1st inst., the second named corps was to have proceeded upon its route. For several days before that, symptoms of discontent had been displayed by it, but not of a nature that was thought likely to end in a serious manner. On Sunday 31st ult. a parade was directed, in marching order, that the commanding officer might inspect the knapsacks, accoutrements, &c. to see that all is in good order for general service. On going to the parade it was officially reported to Lieut. Col. Cartwright, that a great number of his men had positively refused to put on their knapsacks, on hearing which, he forthwith proceeded to the right grenadier company, and ordered them to go immediately and put them on, expressing at the same time his displeasure at their conduct. He went down all the companies, and in about two hours a good number of the men had got their their intentions, and arranged them in a line, pointing out the criminality of their conduct, its injustice towards government, and the absolute ruin which a perseverant in it would speedily bring upon themselves. Notwithstanding, a considerable number declared they would not march, and eventually a parade was ordered for the following morning. Colonel Cartwright still hoping that when the time for moving came, the orders would be obeyed. He made the proper reports to Gen Dalzell, who intimated his intention of going in person to the parade the next morning at day break. When that hour arrived they found only between 900 and 400 men (including commissioned and non-commissioned native officers) on parade; the rest remained behind the bell of arms, with their accoutrements on, and their muskets loaded. On seeing this the General rode up to them, whereupon they immediately charged and drove him back to the punde, and followed the act by rushing upon those who had already paraded, and driving them back into the line, all but the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers, who joined Col. Cartwright, and were sent to his house as a place of safety so far with the 47th for that day. After gun fire in the evening (of Monday) a body of the 62d regt suddenly rose, in number about 150, rushed to the quarter guard, seized the colours, and carried them to a distance of a hundred yards, to the front. Capt. Ashe and Ensign Boyd, being the nearest to the spot, hastened to this place (the commanding officer, Major Roope and the rest of the officers exerting themselves to preserve order in other parts of the corps), and the former expostulated with the men upon the madness of their conduct, and reminded them of their former good name. He had hopes of persuading them to abandon their project, until a sepoy rushed from beside the colours and told him to be gone, or his life should be taken. Capt. Ashe declared his resolution not to leave the colours, whereupon the sepoy struck him twice, and sought for a bayonet to assail him. Upon this some of the other men held the ruffian, and said they would not suffer him to touch their officer whom they entreated to go away, saying they were mad, and knew not what they were about. Between pushing and jostling they drove him and Ensign Boyd away, and immediately proceeded with the colours and joined the 47th. Much about the same time a small number (about twenty) of the 29th regt, seized upon one colour, and likewise joined the original numbers, notwithstanding all the endeavours of Lieut. Col. D'Aguiar to prevent them. By that time the Royals, the King's 47th, and the artillery, had arrived, as well as the Commander-in-Chief, and daylight was present, and the troops were in position, the army was in line of their own assembly as respects the river. Gen. Dalzell was next to order them to lay down their arms, and to hold out the immediate consequences of refusal. They replied they had entered into no order, and they therefore would not. When being reported to his Excellency, the signal guns were fired (the gallies of the body guard), and, agreeably to previous orders, the artillery under Capt. Webb opened on them from the river. We believe they returned this fire in an irregular way, and then immediately fled, receiving a volley from the Royals, who afterwards pursued, and continued sniping all the morning the mutineers threw off their accoutrements as quickly as possible, and endeavoured to conceal themselves in every direction. The number of killed it is therefore impossible to ascertain, but it probably did not exceed 100, including those who were drowned in attempting to cross the river. Two of the body guard were unfortunately killed by a shot from the artillery, supposed to have glanced off a tree, or some other substance, which changed its direction. At ten o'clock a court-martial was convened, before which forty men of the 47th were arraigned, found guilty, and adjudged to suffer death; in consequence of which six of the number of them were hanged on Thursday morning, and the remainder of them sent in boats to Fort William. Since then about seventy more from the different regts have been taken and tried, of whom five more were executed on Saturday, and the remainder sent to Fort William to be hereafter dealt with as the Commander-in-Chief shall think fit. The above is a correct account, as far as it goes, but into any of the registered causes of the mutiny we of course cannot enter. Suffice it therefore to say, that it is completely eradicated, and that the several corps are anxious to be sent on service in order to wipe off the (we trust) temporary disgrace which they now feel they incurred.—(Beng. Hurk., Dec. 8.)

Of the forty who were sentenced to death in the first instance, we mentioned that six of the most notorious were hanged on Thursday morning. The remainder were subsequently pardoned (as to this we have no information) by the Commander-in-Chief, and adjudged to hard labour in front of the public works for the term of fourteen years. We suppose, though we have not yet heard, that upon the remaining convicts not hanged will be inflicted a like appropriate, and certainly not a pardonable punishment. On Saturday the sepoy was taken who commanded the mutineers on Monday leading, and on Thursday morning, when with arms in their hands they attacked the orders of the Commander-in-Chief.

 He acknowledged his guilt; and, as if mutiny could be palliated, his case possessed not a single circumstance that could qualify, however slightly, its deep atrocity.
 He was therefore hanged this morning, in pursuance of his sentence, and subsequently gibbeted as near as possible to the place where the mutineers had been in the habit of assembling, for a few days previously to the one on which they committed the first overt act of mutiny. Another man, a nirk of the 47th N.I., is likewise in custody, charged with having commanded the party which joined from the 62d, and with other acts of atrocious and unmitigable rautiny. He is the only non-commissioned officer who is as yet known to have adopted an active and open line of mutinous conduct; but we regret to say that the whole of the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers appear to have been guilty of the grossest neglect of duty, if not connivance, throughout the whole business.
 Pending his Excellency's promulgated decision respecting them, however, the above are all we feel ourselves at liberty to say on that particular subject.—[Ibid

The following additional Despatches are extracted from the Calcutta Gazette.

Copies and Extracts of Despatches from Brig Gen
Sir A. Campbell to Gov Sec and Pol Depy Sec, &c. Fort William.

Sir The enemy's main body still remains as far as I can ascertain, in the neighbourhood of Doo-nough, quite disheartened and their commander unable to form any plan for our farther annoyance leaving us in undisputed possession of the surrounding country. Even the trifling repulse of their corps of warriors from the great pagoda, on the night of the 30th July has had its full effect upon the minds of men, already damped by fear and constant disappointment and who in the employment of these invincibles are led by the confident predictions of their best astrologers appeared to anticipate the intervention of my maternal power, in overcoming difficulties they had so often found insurmountable. The heroes themselves instead of returning to join the prince of Sarawaddy after their defeat have fled to conceal themselves in the hills to the eastward and all accounts agree in representing the country to be in a most agitated and distracted state.

Last week we were joined by the native regt ment from Madras five hundred mug boatmen from Chittagong have also arrived under the charge of Capt Wiggins who the night before of Chittagong requested might remain in charge till the pleasure of the right hon the Governor General was known but who is so ill as to require his return to Bengal in the transport he arrived in. I have therefore appointed Major Jackson deputy quartermaster gen-to the charge of the muggs who with the Chinese and Malays formerly under him amount to about 800 men.

The monsoon is evidently at a close and although the country still remains completely under water I am very generally assured that it must retire out of the district at dry and possible before the end of the tober, when I trust I shall be able to undertake some movements I have long anxiously enter-prised and it is indeed in obtaining such a supply of cattle, as the accounts of the country lead me to expect, I shall consider the chief barrier to our progress is removed.

To Gen Swinton Esq Sec to Gov Sec and Pol

Depy Sec &c Sec

Sir Since I lost did myself the honour of addressing you, a movement has been made upon Pawling where I had been informed the enemy had established a post and was busily employed in constructing combustible rafts and boats for the destruction of our shipping.

In consequence of this information I on the 14th ult., directed Brig Gen Fraser with a strong detachment to proceed to Pawling for the purpose of putting a stop to any preparations for our annoyance and destroying the rafts from his post.

The detachment fell in with several stockades and breastworks, which the enemy instantly evacuated on the first approach of the women and troops without in any one instance showing a disposition to come to close quarters as will appear by the brigadier general's report to me of the operations of his expedition, which I here with beg to enclose.—No fire rafts were seen.

Head Quarters, Rangoon 1st Oct 1824

On 15th Rangoon 7th Sept 1824

Sir I have the honour to report, that in continuity to your orders of the 14th inst the party detached in the muggs embarked on the morning of the 1st inst and anchored off Kuumundala the same evening.

It proceeded on the 2nd and about two miles to a high island fell in with five stockades three on the right hand side and two on the left.

The stockade on the left was steam worked and on approaching these stockades a heavy fire was opened on both sides from musketry and cannon, which was returned by the ships and by the troops on the decks and tops of the stockade. Arrangements were immediately made to disembark a proportion of the troops. On their approach to the stockades the enemy after a slight resistance quitted their position and fled the jungle leaving several men killed in the right stockade, as reported by Major Sak. H M 14th Inf, who led this party.

One large gun was found burst, and four others were brought off with several jingals and other arms.

On the 2nd the flotilla continued to advance without meeting with any obstacle distance estimated between twelve and fifteen miles.

On the 24th continued our route up the river about five miles, and in the afternoon fell in with three stockades which were bombarded for a short time previous to the landing of the troops, who found the different stockades evacuated.

On the 25th several boats filled with troops, went in pursuit of some war boats stated to be near, but did not succeed in overtaking them.

During this time the pioneers were employed in destroying the different stockades, which being completed,

* First Division 1 captain 1 subaltern, 2 serjeants and 60 rank and file from each of the European regiments in the force under a field officer.

Second Division 1 captain 4 subalterns, and 220 rank and file from native corps.

completed, the flotilla commenced its return to Rangoon, at the recommendation of the naval commander.

The destruction of the different stockades taken on the 2nd was completed during our passage down the river.

I am happy to add, that no casualties occurred amongst our troops during these operations, but, I understand, two or three sailors were wounded.

The ordnance was taken possession of by the naval commander, with the exception of one gun burst, and another sunk in the river.

No regular return of the ordnance was taken in consequence of the hurried nature of the operations, and the necessity of taking advantage of the tide to reach the anchoring ground, but the number of all calibres, is estimated by the naval commander at fifteen pieces.

The country on both sides of the river was generally woody, and the few open spots, which evidently had been cleared for the purpose of cultivation, are now overgrown with high grass, and covered with a considerable depth of water. Few villages were seen, and the population appeared inconsiderable. Some herds of buffaloes were discovered, but no other cattle.

My best thanks are due to Capt. J. C. Biddle, of H.M.S. ship Arachne, for the cordial co-operation and assistance I received from him during the whole of the operations; and I cannot omit to notice the zeal and alacrity with which Lieut. Krele and Mr. Lett, master of H.M.S. ship Arachne, Lieut. Bazely, and Mr. Hudson, of H.M.S. ship Scylla, performed different duties assigned to them by Capt. Biddle.

Major Sale, and all the officers and men, both Europeans and natives, evinced the utmost zeal and spirit in the performance of every duty required from them, and endured their fatigues with the utmost cheerfulness.

The native troops, I beg particularly to notice, who for the space of four days had few opportunities of dressing any of their wounds.

I have much pleasure in stating that I received every assistance I could possibly wish from the different staff officers who accompanied me, viz. Lieut. Capt. Ketson, Major, Capt. Steel, assistant quarter master general, and Lieut. Lake, superintending engineer, who performed their respective duties in a manner highly creditable to themselves.

I have, &c.

To Gen. Swinton, Esq. Sec. to Gov. Sec. and Pol. Dep., &c. &c. Fort William.

Sir: Being informed that a part of the enemy's force, formerly stated as having concentrated in the vicinity of Pagan, had advanced in the direction and taken up a position, about six miles from hence, in the neighbourhood of Anauban, and the Pagoda of Keykion, I ordered out a reconnaissance party on the morning of the 26th inst., consisting of British and five from the Madras Detachment of native L. Inf., under the command of Lieut. Col. Com. Smith, C.B., accompanied by two cannon howitzers, and a complete number of pioneers, with scaling ladders, &c. &c. with orders to advance upon the enemy's position, and to attack him as often as he might consider his force and means adequate to do with effect.

I afterwards reinforced the above detachment with the rank and file, from the 25th and 30th regts. of Madras N. Inf., and two native camel howitzers, and with this combined force Col. Smith arrived at the enemy's stockaded position at Anauban and Keykion on the evening of the 28th inst.

For a detail of the operations of this force, during the period of its absence from quarters, I beg leave to refer you to the accompanying report.

That their close was very different in result from the promising commencement made at Rodogheer, is to me a most painful task to notice; but it forms a pleasant part of my duty to observe that Lieut. Col. Smith's orders for the attack at Anauban were judicious, and the coolness and bravery, and conduct of himself and every British officer present, in endeavouring to support discipline through the reverse, and afterwards to re-establish order and regularity among the troops, were highly conspicuous.

Unpleasant as the circumstances detailed in Lieut. Col. Smith's report must be, the right hon. the Governor-General in Council is to be assured that the enemy shall not long be left to stultify in his present triumph.

(Signed) A. CAMPBELL, Brig. Gen.
To the Dep. Adj. Gen. of Forces.

Sir: Conformably to the instructions conveyed to me by the Dep. Quar. Mast. Gen., I marched on the morning of the 26th inst., with a detachment of the Madras native Light Brigade, consisting of 600 rank and file, two 48-inch howitzers, and 40 pioneers, by the route pointed out by the guides, the first part of which was low and marshy, and in many places one or two feet under water; but on clearing an extensive swamp, over which is thrown a wooden bridge requiring some repairs, the road became good, and lay through a large stockade in ruins. At 10 o'clock I arrived at Tadagheer, and finding the troops much exhausted from the exerting heat, I halted a few hours to refresh; during our halt the rain fell plentifully.

At two o'clock the detachment moved on, and in reality, against the head of the column was obstructed by a deep nullah effected by the clouds; but by the assistance of a temporary sally, which I had caused to be put together prior to leaving the camp, I pushed over the advanced guard, which had no sooner crossed than it received a line of fire from the enemy.

The leading company of the 3d L. Inf., under Lieut. Sherman, was quickly pushed on, and proceeded fifty or sixty yards under cover of trees and brush wood, till he reached an open spot, where a party of the enemy had taken post to annoy us in covering the nullah; these he quickly dispersed, and in pursuing the fugitives a stockade was discovered directly facing the new road, a plan being dropped at on the right, it left much ground exposed in angle.

After commencing the pursuit I directed Lieut. Sherman to make a rapid movement to a certain point, and then wait until the howitzers and other divisions could be brought up. Capt. Williamson, commanding the leading division, soon joined with two scaling ladders brought up by Lieut. Campbell, this promising young officer, I lament to say, received a serious wound shortly after, and left to gather with some men of the 3d Light Inf. First and shouting were at this time distinctly heard in the jungle on our left, and Capt. Williamson was directed to detach a party to cutback and keep in check any body of the enemy that might appear in that quarter, as well as to ascertain whether any other works had been thrown up to flank them on front of us.

In the mean time the howitzers came up, were placed in position, and opened a fire upon the stockade, while Lieut. B. B. of the 3d, who commanded the detachment, gave them a flanking fire, and forced the enemy's stockade I had conceived from the cross fire, effected in that direction. Capt. Williamson upon this signal moved forward to clear the jungle to reach the enemy's works, which was effected in a most judicious style by the pioneers, supported by Lieut. Sherman, and the other officers and men of the 3d L. Inf. Lieut. B. B. then advanced to the front of the stockade, and the 3d, supported by the 25th and 30th, commenced the assault upon the stockade, which was effected by the capture of the works. At the enemy's fire, Lieut. B. B. and a number of his horse were with him.

The new stockade being now attacked by the troops, which I had sent Lieut. Mass. Chilton's horse was not detached. Partial fire was also ordered upon the troops from the front and left flank some time after.

A prisoner was taken along with an English musket. From this man I obtained information which led me to suppose that the enemy was in considerable force in the neighbourhood with gun, and a party of art. in a very strongly stockaded. These were reported as a full and complete description of soldiers to these men, had I the opportunity. I was induced, in consequence, to suppose that I might be furnished with accurate intelligence. The responsibility of this was subsequently to that, and in the event of death, the commander of the troops became a great loss.

On the reinforcement of the rank and file of the 3d L. Inf. with two more 48-inch howitzers joining the detachment, I thought it necessary to forward the detachment, I was induced, in consequence, to suppose that I might be furnished with accurate intelligence. The responsibility of this was subsequently to that, and in the event of death, the commander of the troops became a great loss.

parties employed in the operations against the enemy.

At two o'clock the detachment marched, Major Wahab leading the first division, from which was detached an advanced guard of a subaltern's party, under Lieut. M'C Allan.

Prior to moving, I directed Major Wahab in the event of a shot being fired from the enemy, to return it and push on without retarding the progress of the force. The same instructions regarded breastworks and other obstacles of that nature.

In a short time a few shots were fired from a distance, and on the advanced party coming into the plain a small body of horse and foot were seen about 400 yards in front. Lieut. M'C Allan continued his course steadily, and on nearing the enemy the horse showed a disposition to threaten our flank. Our advance formed line and supported by Major Wahab, actually drove at them, and the horse, on seeing this movement, pulled up and retreated precipitately. Immediately after this a brace of work was observed, from which several shots were fired. Major Wahab pushed on without a moment's delay and carried it in great style, with a trifling loss on our side.

A succession of breastworks on our route were stormed and carried in the same rapid and gallant way, by the bravery evinced by Major Wahab and the officers of that corps. In short, the spirit that animated both officers and men was such as to ensure success in any undertaking, but I regret to say, that the taking of these breastworks retarded our progress, and the detachment consequently did not arrive in the vicinity of Keykoo till five o'clock. It was about this time the guides affected to be ignorant of the direct route to the stockade, although they pointed in the direction it was erected. As the road we were in appeared to be correct and leading direct upon a pagoda, which was a reward to lay on the left of the stockade, we pursued it.

Shortly after, Capt. Williamson, with the second division, was directed to diverge from the column of march to the right and push through the jungle, and attack the enemy's works in that quarter, while Major Wahab should assail it on the left, intending that the 4th, or Major Ogilvie's division should be available for any other service it might have been required for.

The necessary reconnaissance has not been made, which the enemy allowed us to complete unobscured, and the extensive silence that had hitherto prevailed induced me to believe that the post had been abandoned, but notwithstanding as the lateness of the evening would not allow of any further examination of the enemy's position, arrangements were made for assaulting the place, and Major Wahab was directed to move forward in double quick, with ladders to ascend. This gallant officer gave the cheering signal, and the first division, with spirit and animation I never saw surpassed, and with shouts of hurra, and denser and rushed forward to the attack. This was only answered by a round of cannon from the pagoda, which, until now, I was led by the guides to believe was undefended. The enemy in the stockade still observed a sullen silence, not a shot was fired until the division of the 4th and Indians had got well in front of the works. It was then that volleys of grape and musketry were discharged upon the party at the distance of 20 or 30 yards, with an effect and regularity hitherto unequalled in this country. Several of the pioneers, with ladders, were at this moment knocked down, together with the other officers, and the men, consequently from the awful and destructive fire that fell among them, and the loss of the command and leading officers, were seized with panic, and lay down to secure themselves from its further effects.

The lateness of the evening rendered this first check irreparable, or otherwise I might have brought up the second or supporting division to renew the attack, but to satisfy myself more thoroughly at this momentous crisis of our actual situation, I proceeded to the head of the attacking column and there I learnt from I saw, that the 4th and Indians, who, in the ardor of zeal, had moved forward with some of the men that Major Wahab had retired, his wound, and that they were still remaining any longer in a vain and fruitless effort, I ordered the enemy's works, and saw it I quickly ordered the enemy's a continued sheet of grape and musketry which blazed incessantly. I had no other means of stopping them, I must either bring up the third division and renew the attack, to the moment has not yet arrived, certainly of losing all, or saving what remained by speedily retrograding. Of the two evils, I instantly chose the least, and directed Lieut. Whist to draw away the rear without noise or confusion. As soon after as possible I sounded the retreat, and the several parties, and such of the wounded men as could walk, assembled on the ground from which the previous resistance was taken in the first instance. The firing from the enemy was still kept up from these positions.

On the discharge of the first cannon shot from the pagoda I directed Capt. Bell, with 100 men of 25th regt., to move round by the left and make an effort to seize it, and overcome any other obstacles that might meet on the way. This promising officer, seconded by Lieut. Gamble, executed their instructions as far as their means would admit of it, with a spirit and bravery that does them honour. The pagoda, contrary to report and expectation, was found to be strongly stockaded and not assailable without ladders, and I sent Briggs, who had previously volunteered his services to conduct the party, in returning to secure the orders, was attacked by thirty or forty of the Hurdoes, who rushed upon him with drawn knives, and from whom he only escaped by jumping down a deep ravine.

Order, regularity and discipline, which had been strictly observed until about this period, vanished, and the whole of the corps, crowded indiscriminately into one general mass retired to the plain, which I had pointed out.

On reaching the bottom of the hill I fortunately fell in with Capt. Williamson's division, which had just then emerged from the jungle on the right. From his report I found the guides had again deceived us, for by their count the jungle in that direction was extremely limited, and on clearing it I had reason to suppose Capt. Williamson would have come upon a plain, from which the guides declared a part of the stockade was to be seen. This was not the case, and Capt. Williamson, after innumerable difficulties, could not penetrate beyond a certain distance, and hearing the retreat sounded, thought it advisable to desist from any farther attempt and returned accordingly.

Our meeting at this spot was truly deplorable, for I immediately directed him to form up 200 men to the right and left of the road fronting the enemy, to cover the retreating column. This arrangement, I was happy to find, he had in great measure anticipated. My next object was directed to forming the men as they came out on the plain. This duty was entrusted to Major Ogilvie, whose utmost exertions were used to restore regularity and confidence amongst the troops.

The wounded artillery, and such of the baggage, as was recovered, was shortly afterwards collected by a party, and the line under which Major Ogilvie, followed slowly and when it had retired to a sufficient distance, I formed such parts of Capt. Williamson's covering division as I judged necessary into rear guard, with directions for its following the line, and in the event of a rally being made from the stockade to halt, showing as large a front to the enemy as circumstances and the nature of the ground would admit of. This duty was ably executed by that cool and steady officer, aided by the zealous exertions of Capt. Williams, of the 25th regt.

The detachment I am happy to say, arrived at Tokagee, at 11 o'clock p.m., without meeting any annoyance on the route. The wounded were immediately collected, and, through the indefatigable exertions of the medical officers of the 4th, 25th and 28th regts. and the zealous aid of Capt. Milne of the pioneers, in procuring the means of relief for such men as could not be provided with doctors, I was enabled to move again at 2 o'clock in the morning, an hour previous to which we had been disturbed by a few shots from an advanced party of the enemy.

Capt. Murray and Lieut. Aldritt, of the Madras artillery, were from the first zealous and indefatigable in their exertions, in bringing their howitzers to the position fixed upon, and the steadiness and alacrity evinced by them and their men, while a galling fire, was such as has on all occasions distinguished that corps.

I have deemed it advisable to make this unusually long report, in order to put the commander of the forces in possession of the most minute events that occurred in the prosecution of this service, and, in concluding, I beg leave to add that the gallantry and good conduct of Major Wahab was particularly conspicuous on all occasions, as likewise that of the officers officers of his corps and division. To Capt. Williamson and officers of the 3d Lt. B., I am equally indebted for their cool and steady demeanour under all the trying circumstances the detachment encountered. I cannot appreciate too highly the services of Major Ogilvie and Capt. Biffin, whose judgment, bravery and steadiness I had frequent opportunities of witnessing. In short to all the officers and men composing the detachment, praise is due, but to Capt. Kyd, Brig. Major, Lieut. Brigs of the 4th, Mas. Gen.'s Depart., and to Lieut. Trant of His Majesty's 80th, the latter of whom volunteered to convey orders, I am particularly indebted for the able assistance they afforded me, and for the cool, steady courage they manifested in all times of danger and difficulty.

I have the honour to forward paper, No. 2, list of killed and wounded, and have deeply to lament the severity of the loss sustained, particular in the death of Capt. Allan, who after having received two wounds, persisted in leading on his men, when a second shot terminated his gallant career.

F. S. TIDY, Lieut. Col. Dep. Adj. Gen., Camp, Rangoon, 9th Oct., 1824.

To Geo. Swinton, Esq., Sec. to Gov. Sec. and Pol. Dep., &c. &c. Sir, Fort William.

Sir: On the return to the quarters of the column under the command of Lieut. Col. Smith, C. B., under the circumstances stated in my despatch of the 11th inst., I lost no time in sending out another force of the strength mentioned in the margin,* under the command of Brig. McCreagh, C. B., in the hope that the enemy might be so far elated with his success as to await his arrival in their position at Keykloo, in that, however, I have been disappointed, as will appear by the accompanying report to me from the Brigadier.

Head-Quarters, Rangoon, 14th Oct., 1824.

To Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K. C. B. Com. the forces, Rangoon.

Sir: In obedience to the instructions I received from you on the 8th of this month to dislodge the enemy from his position at Keykloo, I have the honour to report that I marched from this at five o'clock in the afternoon of that day, with three pieces of artillery and the detachments, Europeans and natives, which you have placed under my orders, and arrived at the Todaghee stockades at seven in the morning of the 10th, where I halted to rest and refresh the troops. I marched again at two in the afternoon of that day, leaving the detachment of the 3d Madras N. I., (one hundred and fifty men) to occupy the stockades as a post of communication and reached a tolerably favourable piece of ground within about a mile of the enemy's position at sunset, where we passed the night.

However revolting to humanity and to the customs of civilized nations, it is my duty to report to you that during this latter march a considerable portion of the road presented to us the horrid spectacle of the bodies of the sepoy and pioneers, who had been lost in the unsuccessful attack of the 7th inst., fastened to the trunks of trees on the road.

* 430 Rank and file from H. M.'s regts; 300 N. I. from the 38th and 30th Madras regts; 770 rank and file; 1 32-inch mortar; 1 24-inch howitzer; 1 6-pounder field piece.

ade, mangled and mutilated in every manner that savage cruelty could devise, and the feelings of the troops under my command were obviously raised to a very high pitch of indignation at the sight—twenty-three bodies were counted.

At break of day on the 11th, I put the column in march with the intention of immediately attacking.

A pagoda situated upon an eminence and slightly fortified, appeared to be the key to their position as it commanded and overlooked both their stockades within very effective musket range, and would in fact render them untenable. The stockades were of a very poor description, the defences low and faced with smoked and irregular timber, and as to be very easily scaled at any point even without ladders; appearances, however, led me while reconnoitring to believe the works altogether unoccupied, and on bringing forward a company from our advance to carry the pagoda, we had the mortification to find that the enemy had entirely evacuated the position.

In the course of the morning I learned from a few Burmese stragglers caught in the neighbourhood that the Mayhoom, with his people (about three thousand, including all descriptions) had retreated the preceding afternoon to a large village, called Keykloo, where he had a reserve of one thousand people and a much stronger stockade. This intelligence raised a hope that his better position, combined with exultation in his late successful defence, might perhaps induce him to await my attack there; I consequently decided that it would be right under such circumstances to go beyond the instructions you had given me, and leaving a detachment of the 50th Madras N. I., (one hundred and eighty men) as a post of communication, I marched with remainder of my force (the artillery, and about six hundred), at two in the morning of the 12th. We found the road as usual embarrassed with felled trees, and in some places strong breastworks thrown across it, but our movements were perhaps too unexpected and rapid for the enemy to take advantage of these defences, and their outposts successively fled before us without firing a shot. At length circumstances began to indicate pretty clearly that they were in complete and disorderly route, and directing our advanced guard to hasten forward at once to the stockade, I found it entirely evacuated, the barracks within it burning, and the enemy were seen flying in all directions, through the neighbouring jungle.

We instantly moved on to the village, which was extremely large and calculated to contain many thousands of inhabitants, but altogether deserted, and burning rapidly, having been set on fire by them in a great number of places.

Vexatious as was this second disappointment, it is in some degree satisfactory to report to you that the information we received from some aged and infirm Burmese in it, perfectly agreed in proving that their force is in a state of utter dispersion and panic; the Mayhoom himself having fled across the country almost unattended.

Here also we found five more of the sepoy and pioneers, victims to the deliberate cruelty of this barbarian, in the same manner as those before described.

The stockade was built of straight spars and rather lofty, but somewhat unfinished, and like those at Keykloo, no barriers at the entrances. We were fortunate enough to procure two or three buffaloes, which served to refresh the troops, and at three in the afternoon after injuring the stockade and burning the barracks around it, I turned towards Keykloo, where we arrived at about seven, resumed our march at three in the morning of the 13th, after burning all the huts in and round the works, and arrived at Todaghee, early in the day, moved from thence at half-past one this morning, and reached our lines, here between seven and eight o'clock, and I am happy to add that no individual of any description is missing.

Fruitless as were our efforts to overtake and bring them to action, it would still be an injustice to omit reporting to you that the active and hearty exertions manifested in every department of the force, was exemplary, while the spirit and steady obedience of the officers and men gave ample token that could we have closed with the enemy no one would have enquired his numbers. The manner in which the Bengal artillery was forced over the most unfavourable ground and various difficult obstacles, reflects high credit on Lieut. Lawrence and his detachment, and the effective exertions of the the Madras provinces under Capt. Milne, attracted the notice of every one.

To Major Sale of H. M.'s 13th Lt. Inf., who acted as my second in command, my best thanks are due, and I rested on this as on other occasions, very valuable assistance from Capt. Aiken of that corps, who has for some months acted as my aide-de-camp.

Head Quarters, 1st Division, 14th Oct., 1824.

To Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., Sec. and Pol. Depy. Gen. &c. &c. Port William.

Sir: I sometimes have received information, that the police of Sarawaddy had pushed forward a part of his force to Martaban upon the Syng river, which joins the Rangoon river, above Kennaumene, and is noted in the maps as possible from Rangoon to the Irrawaddy during the rains.

As far back as the month of July last, I was aware that the enemy had erected very strong stockades in the neighbourhood of Martaban, but since the defeat, they experienced on the 18th of that month, until very lately, being merely occupied in a post of observation, I deemed them unworthy of notice, but having now become the headquarters of the Kee Woongee, and the Lykin Woongees (first and second divisions of the state) already in the head of a considerable force, and receiving daily reinforcements, and fresh supplies of military stores, for the first experience of this army in the operation, I considered it high time to interrupt their previous mode, and as a last column was moving upon Lykin on the 15th instant, in the hope that mutual advantage might be derived from a simultaneous movement, I, on the same morning, directed Major Fenton of H. M.'s 20th regt., to embark with 200 guns, and five of his own regt., and ten N. I. from the 13th Madras regt., with orders to attack the enemy, wherever he might find him placed on the river, and could do so with every prospect of success.

The naval part of the expedition was prepared and led by that valiant and excellent officer Captain Chads of H. M.'s ship Arachne, the senior naval officer on the station.

How well my orders have been executed, by these gallant officers, and the brave men under their command, the accompanying detail of operations will show.

That their well earned reputation and unblemished conduct, should have ensured them an easy victory over a numerous enemy, strongly posted, and acting under the immediate eye of the two first men in the state is to me most gratifying and satisfactory.

Rangoon Heights, 11th October, 1824.

To Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., and K. C.B., commander of the forces.

Sir: In obedience to orders, I had the honour of receiving from you, to feel the strength and disposition of the enemy upon the Syng river, and to attack him as often as opportunities might offer of displaying the discipline and valour of the troops under my command: on the morning of the 3th instant, I embarked with 200 men of H. M.'s 20th regt., the rank and file of the 13th Madras Infantry, and a detachment of Bengal Artillery under Captain Timbrell, on board a squadron of gun-boats, flotilla, &c. &c. &c. under the immediate command of Captain Chads of H. M.'s ship Arachne, and the first day's operations as high as Pagoda point above Kennaumene, at the junction of the Syng and Paulang rivers. Having been joined by the armed transport Satellite, at two p. m. next day the squadron proceeded up the Syng river, with a flowing tide. Parties of the enemy were seen moving up the right bank of the river, and numerous war boats lowered in our front, and kept up a continued but distant fire from cannon, with which they were all provided. After the flotilla anchor'd, the light boats in advance under Lieut. Kellet of H. M.'s ship Arachne, pursued the enemy's war boats, and having closed with one carrying a gun and full complement of men, boarded, and took her in the handsomest style, the Burmese jumping overboard to save themselves. On the 7th, after proceeding about four miles, I observed two stockades, which were taken possession of without loss, and we reached with this tide, within a short distance of the large works and fortified village of Martaban, having in the course of the day destroyed seven of the newly constructed war boats. On reconnoitring the village of Martaban, I found it was defended by three long breastworks, with a very extensive stockade, constructed of large teak beams, and fourteen large war boats, each mounting a gun, were anchored so as to defend the approach to it.

Having consulted Captain Kellet, we advanced to the south, the steam boat with the Satellite and Bomb Ketch in tow, and the troops in their boats ready to land when ordered. In passing the breastworks, received a smart running fire from jingals and musketry, which was returned with showers of grape from the Satellite, and observing the enemy evidently in confusion, I directed the troops and scaling ladders to be immediately landed, and in a few minutes every work about the place was in our possession. During this night, some fire rafts of a most formidable appearance, were floated down the river, but very fortunately, passed without touching any of the vessels.

At six o'clock next morning, we again moved with the tide, and in passing a narrow neck of land, at the junction of two rivers, were received with a brisk discharge of musketry from a long line of breastworks, and a cannonade from a very large stockade on our right. The fire of the latter was soon silenced by the well pointed guns of the Satellite.

The troops and pioneers were ordered then to land, and this fortification stockade was carried by assault without loss. It is without exception, the strongest work of the kind I have ever seen, the length of the breastwork being 200 yards, and that of the faces being 10, built of the solid timber, in contact with a platform inside, of round five feet broad and eight feet from the ground, upon this platform were a number of iron spikes and piles of single and double headed wooden shot and many pig staves, and below we found, and saw pieces of iron and brass ordnance. In front, the stockade is strengthened by breast work, and regular demi-lunes, and would contain within a space 2000 men. In the centre of this strong hold, we found the magnificent Bungalow of the Kee Woongee, who, I presume, fled early in the day, although we found the house was partitioned below in many places, and the rooms on the first and out blood. I cannot doubt but the enemy's loss must have been severe, but we only found a few scattered dead bodies, which they had not time to carry off.

The advanced boats having pushed up the river some miles, without seeing any other works, I considered the objects you had in view fully accomplished, and we accordingly began to move back to Rangoon. Had not the most marked respect for the British arms been shown, during our whole progress up the river, I should have regretted that the enemy afforded me no opportunity of bringing my troops into regular contact with them, but the reduction of the most formidable stockades I have ever seen, fully garrisoned by men, as far as I could see, all armed with muskets, and animated with the presence of the two ministers of state, Kee Woongee and Lykin Woongees, sufficiently denotes the terror inspired, and leaves me the satisfaction to report, that not one man was lost to the service during the operations above detailed. I cannot adequately acknowledge my obligations to Capt. Chads for his valour, judicious and cordial co-operation, and the spirited conduct of Lieut. Kellet in command of the advanced boats, attracted the notice of every one. To Capt. Timbrell, Bengal artillery, who volunteered his services and Capt. Waterman, assistant dep. quar. master, who accompanied me, my best thanks are due, and I need scarcely add that every officer and man evinced on all occasions that cheerful readiness and determined valor you have so often witnessed.

I cannot close my report without mentioning the very meritorious services of Brev. Capt. Wheeler and the detachment of pioneers that accompanied me, their prompt and ready zeal in situations of difficulty and danger was not less conspicuous than their indefatigable exertions in performing other parts of their laborious duty, and the very gallant style in which they repeatedly landed forces with scaling ladders, was as honourable to themselves as it was a gratifying mark of faith and confidence in the troops they employ.

Camp Rangoon, 11th Oct., 1824.

Extract dispatch from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K. C. B., dated 16th Oct., 1824.

If I can trust the information I receive, I may conclude that the united strength of the Burmese empire is now collecting in my front. I have not a doubt that part of the Bundoole's army was present at all the late affairs, but their presence does not appear to have yet given any additional confidence to the troops, who were in the habit of overestimating, although it is certain they are now very generally armed with muskets.

The Bundoole, all the prisoners say, has arrived at Dagonbow, with unlimited powers, and is to make a general attack upon our position early in the ensuing moon. Preparatory orders from him, had been received at those posts nearest our line, to cut quantities of bamboos of a certain length, and collect all the earth oil and cotton the country could supply. These materials were on a large scale intended for the construction of fire rafts, but Major Evans's party having destroyed all the earth oil collected, that part of the General's plan is so far disarranged.

The court of Ava has already made great exertions in supplying their army in this quarter with such materials as the country and capital contain, all, or great part of which has been successfully captured by the troops under my command. What farther exertions in that respect, they may be capable of making I cannot judge, but if any assistance can be drawn from the wooden pikes, double and single-headed wooden shot lately found in their stockades, and the rude lumps of ragged iron used as shot, I should conclude, their arsenal department must now be at a very low ebb.

Since last I had the honour of addressing you, 180 bullocks have arrived from Matras, and more are daily expected; they are the best cast of draft cattle on that coast, and will be highly useful.

To George Swinton, Esq., Sec. to Gov. Secret and Political Department, &c. &c. &c. Calcutta.

Sir: Herewith I have the honour to transmit you Lieut. Col. Miles's, C. B., report to me of the subjection to the British arms, of the enemy's seaport towns of Tavoy and Mergui, and the May-hooms (governors) and a few more of the head men of each of those provinces are prisoners of war. I trust the poor inhabitants will be left in the enjoyment of tranquillity, and consequently our protection.

Head-Quarters, Rangoon, Oct. 23, 1824.

To Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K. C. B., &c. &c.
Sir: I do myself the honour of reporting to you, that the force placed under my order for the reduction of the enemy's possessions on the coast of Tenasserim, sailed from the Rangoon river on the 24th ultimo, and arrived at the mouth of that leading to Tavoy on the evening of the 1st instant, with the exceptions named the margin,* and which vessel quitted the squadron the day after we sailed. Having advanced with the large ships as far as the depth of the water would allow, I found it necessary to distribute the troops embarked on the hon. Company's cruiser Teignmouth, and transports Argyle, Indian Oak, and Marianne, among the smaller vessels and boats of the fleet, myself and staff proceeding in the hon. Company's Penang cruiser Jessy, which, drawing the least water, was appointed to lead. These arrangements having been effected, on the 1st instant we advanced, but from the difficulty of the navigation of the river, full of shoals, and in many parts only to be passed at the top of high water, together with the obstacles by which the enemy attempted to impede our progress by sinking their largest boats in shallow places, and attacking it across one of the narrow channels, it was not till the 12th about noon that we anchored within three miles of the fort: I had, prior to this, dispatched a summons for its unconditional surrender, and no reply having at that time been received, I proceeded with Capt. Hardy and my staff to make a reconnaissance within a short distance of the works. The object had just been accomplished when it was perceived that three war boats, full of men, were pulling along shore apparently for the purpose of cutting us off; in this they, however, failed, and on our reaching the Jessy I directed two guns to be fired, and they instantly retired with great precipitation. The tide ebbing in the evening, the whole fleet arrived within gun shot of the place about ten o'clock at night, when two or three shots were fired from the fort at our headmost ship, the hon. Company's cruiser Prince of Wales, but without effect. At an early hour in the morning of the 13th, two Burmese came on board, and bore to me a communication from the second in command, stating his readiness to cease or to destroy the wayboon, or governor of the province, or to obey such orders as I might dictate. I immediately on receipt of this, an answer was returned to say, I was on the eve of advancing, and that he was to be taken and confined until my arrival, which was to about two hours after. All was as directed; and at one o'clock, p. m., we were in possession of the fort, pettah, and all the defence of the place, without opposition. The population is very great, and from the strength and extent of the works (all built of brick and very much out of repair) must have been very great, had any defence been attempted. The enclosed copy of my order, issued on the 11th instant, the sketch of the fort and pettah, herewith sent, together with the return of ordnance, ammunition, and military stores, will, I trust, give you some idea of the importance of our acquisition. The capture of the mayhoom, his brother and family, with his principal adherents, completely weakens the enemy, and places us in an advantageous situation to exert any exertions in this quarter.

When every thing has been so happily accomplished, I have but to add my sincere and heartfelt thanks to Capt. Hardy, of the Hon. Company's marine, who commands the naval branch of the expedition, for his cordial co-operation and the unceasing labour and fatigue he experienced in sounding the river, and directing the movements of the ships; whose officers and crews exerted themselves to the utmost.

The patient endurance of a heavy and incessant rain, for five days, of the troops who were on board the boats, deserves my warmest commendation; and the cheerfulness and alacrity of every grade was peculiarly grateful to me. I cannot finally conclude without bringing to your notice the able assistance afforded me by my Brig.-major, Capt. P. Young, of H. M.'s 12th regt., and the Deputy-assistant-quarter-master, Capt. Spicer, of the 12th regt. Mad. N. I., in carrying my wishes and orders into effect, and whose incessant labour and fatigue, after landing and in making the necessary arrangements for the future objects of the expedition, called forth my warmest acknowledgments; and I beg most earnestly to recommend these officers to your protection. I have, &c.

To Brig.-Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., &c. &c. &c.

SIR:—My despatch of the 27th ultimo will have placed you in possession of the movements of the force under my command, up to that period. Having left the detail named in the margin* for the temporary protection of Tavoy, the remainder proceeded for the accomplishment of the ulterior object of the expedition on this coast; and I have now the honour to announce to you, the fall of this place, by storm, on the 6th instant, the day we arrived before it. My first care was to send a summons to the town for its unconditional surrender; but, instead of a reply, at half-past eleven o'clock, their guns opened a heavy fire upon the H. C.'s cruisers, who had previously taken their position in front of the enemy's batteries, mounting thirty-three pieces of heavy ordnance. The practice on our part was so good, that in about one hour the whole were silenced: during this period, as many troops had been assembled in the boats of the fleet as they could contain, and I directed a landing to be effected to the right of the town. This movement was immediately followed up by the advance of a party of H. M.'s 80th regt. to the gate of the stockade, under a heavy and well-directed fire from the enemy; and it was at this spot the greater loss was sustained. The ground, for some distance between the river and the stockade, was deep mud and water; and from the moment the disembarkation commenced, the rain poured down in torrents. Under these disadvantages, the troops maintained their ground with the greatest steadiness; and as soon as it was possible to bring up the batteries, an assault was ordered, and carried promptly and most gallantly into effect by H. M.'s 80th regt. From this instant the enemy gave way; their loss is said to be about five hundred men. The Rajah remained till we were actually in the town, and then withdrew with about three hundred of his followers on the opposite side. More than common attention had been paid in arranging the defence of the place, and the natural strength of the ground gave the greatest advantage to them. Their batteries were placed on the brows of the different hills, commanding the shipping. From the best information I have been able to collect, the enemy had three thousand five hundred men in arms. On our first gaining possession, the whole population fled; but in the course of that night and the following morning, great numbers came in, and are now following their several avocations. About one hundred men, belonging to Tenasserim, I have detained in confinement; and as that place has lost all its former consequence, and is at present nothing beyond a fishing village, this body forms half its force.

A copy of my orders issued on this occasion, and the return of killed, wounded, and missing, as also of the ordnance, ammunition, and stores, are here-with transmitted.

The whole of this affair has proved so decisive, and the gallant and exemplary conduct of every individual so prominent, that I feel at a loss how to bring individual instances of merit forward. I, however, have much pleasure in recording the names of Lieut.-col. Commandant McDowall, of the 7th regt. Madras N.I., Maj. Baden, commanding H. M.'s 80th regt., Capt. Russell, commanding detachment Bombay Artillery, serving on board the Hon. Company's cruiser Thetis, and Lieut. Cotton, of the engineers, to the whole of whom I feel most obliged. The attention of Mr. Staff surgeon Smart was unwearied in his department.

To my own staff, Capt. Young, of H. M.'s 80th regt., brig-major, and Capt. Spicer, of the 13th regt. Madras N.I., dep.-assist. quart.-mast.-gen., I am much indebted for their assistance; and the promptitude with which they performed and executed every wish of mine, not on this occasion alone, but in all situations in which they have been employed under my command; and I beg leave to recommend them, in the strongest manner, to your favourable notice and protection.

There being many points which it is necessary to communicate to you, I have felt the necessity of sending my Brig.-major, Capt. Young, with this despatch, who, possessing my full confidence, will develop to you personally every transaction that has occurred, and the views I have taken of the state of these conquests.

I have, &c.

Extract from a letter from Lieut.-col. Innes, C.B., commanding the Sylhet Frontier, to Lieut.-col. Nicol, adjt.-gen. of the army, dated on the River near Panchgoun, the 9th October 1884:—

"I have the honour to report, for the information of his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, that I proceeded up the Barak river on the morning of the 26th, towards the posts lately occupied by the Burmese force at Tiloayn and Hloodpalee. The first named place is occupied by a detachment of the 52d regt., under Capt. Lister, and I have instructed that officer to have the outward defences destroyed, the palisades on the summit renewed, and the hill itself rendered untenable by a small body of men: the stockades on the heights to the south of Tiloayn have been directed to be destroyed also.

"The Burmese position at Hloodpalee consisted of seven stockades of a most formidable nature: from their extent and the number of huts, I should not imagine the strength of the enemy to have been less than 10,000 men. The whole of the stockades, with the exception of a principal one erected round a Puka-house, I have directed to be destroyed; in it I have posted Rajah Gumbier Sing, with his levy, he having returned with a great proportion of his men, not being able to come up with any part of the enemy's rear-guard. "The latter may now be estimated entirely defeated by the enemy, for as far as the snafewar, as Banskaidi, they are said to have passed six days ago, in full retreat for Munnipour."

Extract from the letter from the Governor-General to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors of the East-India Company, dated Fort-William, Nov. 12, 1884.

"In a despatch of the 16th of October, Brig.-Gen. Sir Archibald Campbell observes, that if he can trust the information he receives, the united strength of the Burmese empire is now collecting in his front. Part of the army under the Maha Bundoola (who commanded in Arracan) is believed to have been present in the stockades attacked and carried by Major Evans's detachment; but their presence, Sir Archibald Campbell remarks, does not appear, however, to have given any additional confidence to the troops who have hitherto been opposed to us. The Court of Ava, he adds, has already made great exertions in supplying their army with such materials as the country and capital contain, all, or great part of, which has been successfully captured by the British force under his command. "What further efforts in that respect they may be able to make, he cannot judge; but if any inference can be drawn from the wooden guns, double and single-headed wooden shot, lately found in their stockades, and the rude lumps of rugged iron used as shot, their arsenal department, it must be concluded, is reduced to a very low ebb."

The political intelligence from India is of rather a gloomy complexion this month. Besides the unsuccessful affair with the Burmese, detailed in a preceding despatch, a small body of our troops has been cut off by the garrison of a refractory chief near Darwar, full particulars of which are given in a former part of our number.

The newspapers likewise refer darkly to other reports from the Mofussil, but no particulars what, ever are given. The India Gazette of Nov. 18 states, that a squadron of the 8th cavalry, moving from Bareilly, had been ordered to halt, in consequence of some intelligence from Moradabad.

No confirmation of the statement given to the authorities at Rangoon, by two Burmese, respecting an alleged revolution at the Court of Ava, has yet been received. It is said that Siam is about to declare war against the Burmese.

Home Intelligence.

DESTRUCTION OF THE SHIP KENT, CAPT. COBE, IN THE BAY OF BENCAY.

We have received the following statement of this lamentable occurrence from an officer of the Kent:—

"The ship experienced a succession of bad weather from the time of her leaving the land; and about three o'clock on the morning of the 1st of March, a gale came on from the SW. which increased so much, as to oblige us to heave to, under the maintopsail and staysails, but it somewhat subsided towards noon, a little before which, the third mate was sent down to see that every thing was secure below; for which purpose he took a small dark lantern, and observing a cask of spirits adrift in the hold, he gave the lantern to one of the two men with him, whilst he went to see if the other, whom he had dispatched for wood to secure the cask, was about to return. Meantime the man accidentally dropped the lantern in the longer of casks below: and before there was a possibility of picking it up, the cask was stove, through the violent rolling of the ship, and, the spirits falling on the lantern, immediately ignited. Every effort was used to smother the flames by heaving down wet blankets, soldiers cloaks, &c. Water was thrown down in every direction. The gun and orlop decks were scuttled, the ports opened, and from the heavy sea running, tons of water very soon found their way into the hold. It was soon discovered, however, by the smell of the tar, that the cables had caught fire, which left no hopes of saving the ship. The necessary arrangements for getting the boats out were commenced, when, about an hour from the time the fire took place, the man from the foretopmast head called out 'a sail to leeward.' The foresail was set, and we stood down towards her, about two, or somewhat past, closed with her; the launch and large cutter were got out, and the quarter boats were lowered down, and loaded with as many women, children, and men as they could hold. On the return of the boats from the brig, the only method of filling them, was by the men lowering themselves down by a rope attached to the driver-boom-end, and the women and children by being slung on the poop, and lowered down from the same place. By about half-past ten, they were all out of the ship, with the exception of about forty, many of whom were become so panic-struck, that although they would go out on the boom, neither threats nor entreaty could persuade them to go down by the rope (although some might have done so, could they have urged the foremost on the boom to have descended to make way for them.) From half-past ten to near eleven, the launch remained under her stern with ample room for all: not one man in five minutes, and frequently longer, took advantage of the opportunity. The ship was now labouring excessively from the quantity of water she had shipped, and tore the thwart out of the bow of the boat, and at the same time carried away the rope which was fast to the driver-boom, by which the people had descended. They were then hailed to jump overboard, as the only means of escape, with the chance of being picked up by the boats; this chance was embraced by one man only, who was saved. From half past, to three-quarters past eleven, the flames were burning with such fury from the cabin windows and gun-room ports, that the boats were compelled to quit her. The ships' guns were now going off; about twelve, the masts went over the side, and at a quarter before two she blew up without much report; she continued burning until four, when she apparently sunk."

The number of persons on board was as follows:—passengers 19; military officers 20; troops, 344; women, 43; children, 66; crew, 145; total, 637.

The vessel which bore in sight, was the Cambria, Capt. Cook, who made the utmost exertions, and succeeded in saving Colonel Fearn, and 300 officers and privates of the 31st regiment, 19 passengers, 94 women and children, and 139 of the crew, besides the captain. The passengers, and 36 Cornish miners on board the Cambria, seconded Captain Cook's Cook's endeavours, in a very praiseworthy manner. A very different conduct was displayed by the crew of the Kent, who could only be compelled to join in endeavouring to save their companions by coercive measures.

The individuals who remained after the Cambria left the wreck (54 men and 7 children) supported themselves on the masts and booms. About three the next morning, another sail was discovered, which proved to be the Caroline, Capt. Bibby, from Egypt, who sent his boat alongside the masts, and saved fourteen men of the 31st regiment. The remainder had perished.

The East-India Company, with their usual liberality, have distributed upwards of £2,000, amongst the owners, the captain and crew of the Cambria; and the officers of the 31st, on board the Kent, have presented Capt. Cook with an elegant cup, worth fifty guineas. A very handsome letter of thanks has also been forwarded to him, from H. R. H. the Duke of York, commending his meritorious zeal and promptitude.

HYDERABAD PAPERS.

A Special General Court of Proprietors of East-India Stock was this day held by adjournment, "for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the Hyderabad Papers, now before the Proprietors, as far as they respect the conduct of the Most Noble the Marquess of Hastings, late Governor General of India."

The minutes of the last court having been read—

The Chairman (W. Astell, Esq.) announced the purpose for which the court was assembled.

By his direction, the clerk read the original resolution of the hon. D. Kinnaid, and the amendment proposed by the hon. Chairman, as follow :

Motion.

"That this court, having taken into its consideration the papers printed in pursuance of its order of 3d March last, relating to certain pecuniary transactions of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. with the government of his highness the Nizam, is of opinion, that nothing therein contained tends to affect, in the slightest degree, the personal character or integrity of the late Governor General of India, the Most Noble the Marquess of Hastings."

Amendment.

"That this court, having taken into consideration the papers printed in pursuance of its order of the 3d of March last, relating to the pecuniary transactions of the house of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., at Hyderabad, with the government of his highness the Nizam, is of opinion, that there is no ground for imputing corrupt motives to the late Governor General of India, the Most Noble the Marquess of Hastings, K.G., or to any member of the Bengal Government. At the same time, this court feels called upon to record its approval of the political despatches to the Bengal Government, under date the 24th May 1820, 28th November 1821, 9th April 1823, and 21st January 1824."

Mr. Freshfield wished, before the commencement of the regular discussion, to offer a few observations to the court. His public duty had prevented him from attending at the last debate, but he had understood that the hon. baronet (Sir John Doyle) had particularly alluded to him as being the solicitor of Mr. Adam. Now, though he would contend that such a circumstance, if it were true, should not preclude him from offering himself as the defender of Mr. Adam in that court, yet he owed it to Mr. Adam, to himself, and to the court, to state, that he never saw that gentleman in his life, that he never had any correspondence with him, but only knew him as being the son of an old and valued friend of his (Mr. F.'s), whose character he had long admired. But notwithstanding this consideration, he must add, that he would not have undertaken his defence in that court without perusing the voluminous papers then under the notice of the court, which was more than some hon. proprietors on the other side had done. He, therefore, thought he was justified in defending that gentleman against unfounded attacks; and if he had found reason for giving his vote in opposition to the friends of the gallant general, they had to thank themselves for it, for bringing the question forward.

Sir John Doyle said, that in the sentiments he had delivered, he fully admitted the respectability of Mr. Adam, but only complained that his friends should have thought it necessary to come forward to vindicate his character when nobody attacked it. He confessed his inferiority to his hon. friend in turning an eulogium, but, if he recollected rightly, he had, on the occasion alluded to, stated (what he sincerely believed) that Mr. Adam was a very honourable man, and that if he were not so, he had greatly debased his respectable lineage.

Mr. Impey rose merely to call the gallant general's attention to one point, otherwise the court might be led into error. The gallant general had said, that Mr. Adam had not been made the object of attack. Now he (Mr. Impey) remembered, that on the first day of the discussion, an hon. proprietor (Mr. Hume), a very injudicious friend of the Marquess of Hastings, had stated his determination of impeaching Mr. Adam.

Sir J. Doyle explained. Nothing of the kind had been said on Friday, at least by him.

Mr. Impey declared the expression was used in the course of the debate.

Captain Marswell then proceeded to speak to the question. He was conscious he was the worst speaker in the court, but assured them he would not be the longest; and he dared say there were many hon. proprietors, like him, who, never having ventured to exercise their privileges in that way before, were desirous of offering their sentiments on the present question. He did not come to address them with a set speech, but it should be his aim to make an intelligible one. He hoped, that if in the observations he was about to make, any falling errors might occur, the court would attribute them, not to want of sincerity, but to want of training. If he mistook assertion for proof, heary information for confirmed evidence, and declamation for argument, if he should unanimously step forward to defend the characters of those whose characters had not been attacked, he should plead in his justification, the powerful influence of example, and would hope for the indulgence of the court, for in that case he would be at sea without a compass, and the buoys lost. His object would be, to establish, to the best of his ability, the pretensions of all parties. The Marquess of Hastings had been their Governor General for a period of nine years; his merits had been recorded on the books of the court, and he had been rewarded with a gift of £60,000 sterling. He had, during his administration, granted a license to the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co. to enter into a loan with the government of the Nizam, without which license, the contracting of the loan would have contravened the Act of Parliament. This step had excited, and very justly, the disapprobation of the Court of Directors. In the mean time rumour was afloat, and, ever ready to distort the facts of any transaction which she laid hold of, imputed dishonourable motives to the noble Marquess. The natural consequence was, that his friends, desirous to repel the imputation, called for papers, and the large book was brought under the notice of the court. He (Capt. Maxwell) had bestowed great pains in making himself acquainted with the subject to which they refer. Whether his want of occupation, or his want of sense, had led him to do this, he could not say; and though he might not have considered it with so much ability as other hon. proprietors, he was sure he had bestowed as much attention on it, and had not a less earnest wish to arrive at a just conclusion on its merits. On the policy of the Marquess of Hastings in granting the license he would not dwell. He saw no reason to alter the opinion he had first formed upon that measure, which was directly hostile to it. The great book before them contained upwards of 500 documents, not more than one-fiftieth part of which were before the noble Marquess when he granted the license, and therefore they ought only to judge of that nobleman's conduct on this point from the same documents which he had before him. His (Capt. Maxwell's) opinion was, that if the noble Marquess had had the advantage of perusing the mass of documents then before the court, he would have pursued a different line of conduct. He was confident, that had that been the case, they would not have had to consider a measure, which, however well-meant it might be,

he could not but consider improper. He hoped, however, that no expression which should fall from him, might be construed into an insinuation that he entertained the idea that those voluminous documents were laid before them for the purpose of bewildering; on the contrary, he was convinced, that had those papers been given, the Court of Directors would have been accused of withholding documents. The minutes of Messrs. Adam and Stuart, and Lord Hastings, which he had read with the most minute attention, did not, in his opinion, bear upon the point. The first ten documents were all the noble Marquess could have had access to, with reference to the subject under the consideration of the court; the others had originated in subsequent periods. To the early documents alone they ought to look in giving judgment on the subject to which they referred. It was understood that Messrs. Adam and Stuart had offered opposition to the noble Marquess; he thought, that in so doing, they had acted conscientiously, and were therefore entitled as much as his lordship to the approbation of the court. The opposition of those gentlemen did not appear to him to have been of a factious nature, though he allowed it might have caused the noble Marquess to precipitate his measures. He had already declared his opinion as to the policy of the noble Marquess, but before he touched upon that point, he could not help declaring, that the statement made by an hon. proprietor (Mr. Russell) had, in his idea, furnished a key to the transactions. It appeared to him (Capt. Maxwell) both clear and convincing. The hon. gentleman might possibly be in possession of information which no other member of the court might have. The explanations he had given on many points connected with the transactions of Palmer and Co. appeared to him (Capt. Maxwell) very satisfactory. He candidly admitted that he had not gone into the accounts when he read the papers. He thought, however, that this court was not the best place in the world for their examination: Hyderabad or Calcutta, he conceived, were the places best adapted for such a scrutiny; at all events it was not London, where there were no means of explanation or contradiction. Under this conviction, he had not paid that attention to the accounts which was necessary to enable him to pass an opinion on their accuracy. An hon. proprietor had, indeed, stated that he considered them to be wholly fallacious. The hon. proprietor ought to have given some evidence in support of his assertion. His (Capt. Maxwell's) impression was, they were not altogether erroneous. They had, he was aware, been examined behind the bar, but he could not guess by what test, for he knew the practice employed in India

India in the examination of accounts. Much had been said with respect to the amounts of interest charged, and at this point he could not refrain from saying which might have been a subject of complaint. He must say that the rate of interest taken by Messrs. Palmer and Co. was not considered excessive in India. He had himself lent money in India at 12 per cent., and in examining the bill, had obtained, through the double operation, a discount of 2 per cent. on the whole more than 10 per cent. (Hear!) He would not state the names of the parties, because he was not a friend of the propriety of such a charge, but he mentioned the fact upon his honour. At the time the loan in question was made, he was at Calcutta, and having some unemployed cash, he was recommended by a general officer on the staff to embark in that transaction. But he was first desirous to ascertain what sort of security it was that he was to receive from the Nizam, and, notwithstanding the reported good wishes of the Marquess of Hastings, he (Capt. Maxwell) considered the security so insufficient, that he declined advancing a single farthing in the transaction. (Hear!) Those who were acquainted with India would be able to say, that the interest which was thought to exorbitant here, was not so considered there. What was the cause of this difference? why was interest in India higher than in England? The reasons for this were local. In England, in time of war, the farmer borrowed money at 7 or 8 per cent; the English farmer, to meet this demand, could raise but one crop from his land in the year; but in the same period the Indian farmer could raise three or four crops. Now what better reason could be given for the highness of the rate of interest in India, than the circumstance of mother earth being so much more productive there than in this country? Though he thought the policy bad, he could not coincide in all the opinions which his proprietors on the other side had pronounced upon the transactions. In all he said he wished to be considered as neutral. He came there as the advocate of neither party, and he would condemn the measure if it only gave birth to extravagant professions. The facility of borrowing money appeared to have operated in India as it did in England, by inducing the borrower to get as much as he could, and to spend it all. In 1820, when the loan was contracted, it appeared that the Nizam became indebted to the house of Palmer and Co for sixty lacs of rupees, and subsequently the debt had amounted to 100 lacs. (Hear!) This was the effect of the house lending at such easy terms. In advertent to the amendment, which approved of the despatches of the Court of Directors in reference to the transactions at Hyderabad, he did not consider it necessary to enter on the defence of this body, because he did not see how it could be fairly accused. Their acts are the acts of the proprietors at large. A board had been appointed for examining and ratifying their despatches, without the concurrence of which they could not proceed to India. He did not see how the Court of Proprietors, with any regard for its own dignity, could pass an opinion on their despatches. In the case of injustice being committed by them, appeal could of course be made, and compensation awarded to the injured. The court, he had no doubt, wished to do justice to all parties, but it would be a strange way of going to work, to acquit one and condemn twenty-four individuals. With respect to the charge of favoritism, he acquitted the noble Marquess entirely. He did not conceive how that charge could be established. Among the papers were two private letters of the Marquess of Hastings, which he sincerely regretted to observe there, but they contained, he was bound to declare, no evidence of favoritism on the part of his lordship. The first of these he would read, and in commenting on it would detain in the court as short a time as possible. This letter was dated 21st June 1821, and was addressed to Sir Wm. Rumbold in the following words:—"My dear Sir William. It is difficult for me to make you comprehend the unpleasant discussions which have been, within this fortnight past, recorded, with regard to the pecuniary engagements between the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. and the Nizam. The whole has originated in these underhand suggestions of Mr. —, which a false delicacy towards him prevented my exposing. They made impressions on others, who, acting on the erroneous persuasion, staked themselves in a manner which makes them flounder obscenely now, in order to preserve consistency. Much advantage is given to them by an apparent (I am sure not a real) want of frankness on the part of your house. I apprized you long ago, that it was expedient for the firm to define, upon oath, whether or not any British public functionary had at any time had pecuniary transactions with the house which could influence him in countenancing your dealings with the Nizam's government. The evitment of so simple a declaration is awkward, even in the eyes of me, who have so strong a belief in the honour of your proceedings." There needed no stronger evidence than this letter afforded, of the purity of motive on the part of the noble Marquess. Had he been conscious of any impropriety of conduct, he would have addressed the house in such terms as these. "A charge has been brought against me, I have committed myself myself for your interest; you must therefore bear me out by furnishing documents, and not leave me in this predicament." The letter proceeded, "Though Mr. Stuart declared he had never thrown on Mr. Russell the imputation of a secret understanding with you, peculiar circumstances convince me, that such a suspicion was communicated to persons at home, and was received with ready faith. It depends on the house whether I must not also admit doubts. Yours, &c." Now was there anything in that letter which could justify them in passing a censure on the noble Marquess? With respect to the other letter, he (Capt. Maxwell) contended it did not warrant the interpretation which had been put upon it. It afforded no evidence that the Marquess of Hastings had improperly favoured the house of Palmer and Co. It ran, as follows:—"My dear Sir William: The account you have given of the house of Palmer and Co. at Hyderabad is very favourable, and certainly the details justify your inclination for going to that city in order to inspect the books. I enclose you a letter to the Resident, couched in terms which will ensure to you his attentions and most earnest good offices. The partners speculate that you, being one of the firm, will interest me in the welfare of the house to a degree which may be materially beneficial to them: it is a fair and honest calculation. The amount of advantage which the countenance of government may bestow, must be uncertain, as I apprehend it would flow principally from the opinion the natives would entertain of the respect likely to be paid by their own government to an establishment known to stand well in the favour of the supreme authority here. Perhaps a more distinct benefit may attend the firm, from the consequent discouragement to competition with you by any other British partnership, to which a similarly professed sanction would not be granted. It is on the ground of the service to the Nizam, at the request of our Resident, that I have consented to let the good wishes of government for the prosperity of this firm be signified. No new establishment could have such a plea. Believe me, &c. &c." Certainly the worst light in which this letter could be viewed was the consideration that the noble Marquess intended to discourage any other house from competing with that of Palmer and Co. But had any application for the establishment of another commercial house been refused? That must be shown before the fact could be proved against the noble Marquess. Suppose he (Capt. Maxwell) had come to the resolution to commit murder, but never made the attempt, it would be hard to hang him for a crime which was never committed. But to revert to the Marquess of Hastings, he could show, that so far from being predetermined to refuse any application of the sort, he would have been very ready to grant it. He understood from an hon. proprietor, a partner in the house of Mackintosh and Co., that the noble Marquess had declined to that firm, that if they were inclined to establish a branch bank in the Nizam's dominions, not at Hyderabad, but at Gwalier, they would be permitted to do so. But, after all, if the grand point of favouritism were proved against him, it could only be said that he had some of the weaknesses incidental to human nature; and though sometimes mischievous, they were amiable weaknesses. There was no prejudice mixed up with his actions. The sentiments he (Capt. Maxwell) entertained on the subject, were entirely disinterested. The noble Marquess had never served him in any individual instance; on the contrary, he had done him a positive injury by withholding some allowances to which he considered himself fairly entitled. His opinions, therefore, had not been delivered for value received; for no consideration should prevent him from doing the noble Marquess justice. As to the administration of that noble individual, he thought it had been over-eulogized both here and at Calcutta. He was not one of those who signed the address at the latter place when his lordship quitted India, but he believed that many did who were now strenuous supporters of the amendment. The question before the court was one of the utmost importance to the future interests of the proprietors. It regards, in the first place, the Marquess of Hastings; in the second, the Court of Directors; and lastly, the Company generally. The contents of the papers in the hands of the proprietors had been published to the world, and could not be recalled; and he was well convinced that the renewal of their charter depended in a great measure on the decision they might ultimately come to. A question so deeply affecting their interests had never before been agitated in that court. The Hyderabad papers would teach them a lesson. They would show them what was due to their own character, and to the interests of humanity. They were bound, as British merchants, to abolish the prevailing system of speculation, and to introduce order and regularity. A few years would terminate the duration of their charter; and in that time much might be done. Their labours could not be directed to a better object, and he was convinced that the renewal of their privilege would mainly depend on what should be done in those few years. They should not look exclusively to their own interests, but have some respect to those of mankind at large. His only hope was, that at the expiration of the term term of their charter, they would, by their previous conduct, have raised themselves a claim to the gratitude of millions, and the admiration of the world. Let them not act otherwise in regard to Lord Hastings; let them not damage him of that "which not enemies, but left him poor indeed." He would, however, wish it to be understood, that he considered the Court of Directors entitled to their support and approbation. The duties they had had to perform were arduous and laborious, and on their performance of them depended the best interests of the Company. In conclusion, he would wish that the hon. Chairman would withdraw his amendment, and the hon. proprietor his original motion, and he doubted not, but a resolution could be proposed of such a nature as would meet all their wishes, at once satisfy the Marquess of Hastings, the Court of Directors, and the government abroad. Such a proposition he had in his pocket, and was ready to submit it to the consideration of the court, if an opportunity for doing so was afforded to him. If his proposition were rejected, another course still remained,—to choose a certain number of individuals from each side of the court, who might draw up such a resolution as would reconcile all their feelings. If his plan did not meet the wishes of the court, he was sorry for it; but he consoled himself with the goodness of his intention.

Mr. Walsborough thought, that in rising to address the court, for the first time, he might naturally ask himself why a person like him, totally unconnected with Indian affairs, should have taken an opportunity to speak on the present subject. The court, at least, would believe that he had no interest in supporting either party. The amendment must be considered as coming from the Chairman, in his individual capacity, which was the most delicate way in which it could be brought forward, because the whole weight of the executive body did not, by that means, bear upon the discussion—a discussion which he considered as important as any which had taken place since the impeachment of Warren Hastings. He had often been led, by the habits of his life, to the consideration of such papers as those which were in the hands of the proprietors: he thought the question involved in them was not one of pounds, shillings, and pence, but one of the most paramount importance. In expressing his sentiments upon it, he looked for that courtesy which the court never omitted to extend to all who spoke from pure and honourable motives. He did not require them to follow his opinions; he came there not to speak on a party question, to examine the principles which pervaded the whole transaction. But before explaining his views, he would entreat the indulgence of the court in overlooking the unintentional errors into which he might fall; he knew the skill of the gentlemen on the other side, and he felt himself at their mercy. He was not sure that he ought to mention an hon. proprietor's name; but it had been said, on a previous day, that no imputation had been thrown out against Mr. Adam. Now, if his (Mr. Walsborough's) reconciliation did not fail him, he had heard one of that hon. proprietor's friends hold out a threat that if the original motion were not carried he would impeach Mr. Adam. He could not condemn, in too strong terms, such attacks made against a man high in office, and which, had that individual been present, would never have been indulged in; at least, they would not have been aimed in that direct and unmerciful language which, he regretted to say, was too frequently made use of in that court. He remembered that a divine, who wished to illustrate the force of consciousness in the human mind, told the following story:—"Two men happening, as they walked together, to encounter a deal lion, at first were seized with dread, and started back, thinking the beast only asleep. Finding, however, that it was really dead, they approached and raised its paw. Suddenly they thought it began to move, and they ran away as fast as if the devil was after them." (Laughter.)—He could not help thinking that this tale strongly illustrated the point he was speaking of. Mr. Adam and Sir C. Metcalf might be considered as dead lions; they had been attacked in their absence, when they were not able to defend themselves. Mr. Adam was accused of constant, but conscientious opposition to the Marquess of Hastings. (Indication of No!) Well, if gentlemen did not like it he would not say conscientious opposition he would, however, refer them to a letter from Messrs. Adam, Fendall, and Bayley, in answer to some interrogatories put to them by his lordship, respecting his conduct as Governor-General, and desiring their opinion as to whether he had endeavoured to evade the directions sent out by the Court of Directors. That letter ran in the following words:—"December 10, 1822 We have this day had the honour to receive your lordship's letter of the 8th inst., in which you have been pleased to call upon us to declare 'whether we have ever discovered in you any management or apparent inclination to evade an order from the hon. court, which could, without distinct injury to the Hon. Company's service, be fulfilled.' Whether, in case of the instructions from the hon. court, the most irreconcilable to existing circumstances, consequently the most embarrassing, we have ever heard you remark upon the inapplicability of the orders with any irreverent levity? Whether, on the contrary trary, we have not observed in you an invariable solicitude to warp the exigencies of the juncture as far as possible to the hon court's wishes, so as that the latter might be satisfied to the utmost extent safely practicable? To the two first of these questions we can have no hesitation in replying distinctly and unequivocally, in the negative; while we can, with no less truth and sincerity, declare that in every instance which has come under our observation, your lordship's conduct has been invariably governed by the principles stated in the last question." Now he would put it to any impartial person, whether this letter did not utterly disprove the assertion of personal hostility between the Marquess of Hastings and those gentlemen? He would next refer them to the minute addressed by Mr. Adam to the hon. court, dated Dec 28, 1822. The reason he dwelt so long on this point, was because an hon. proprietor, who had been attacked, and styled Mr. Adam's solicitor, for offering some observations in defence of that gentleman's conduct, had not the privilege of a reply. Here was the passage in Mr. Adam's minute—"I do not feel myself called on to enter on a vindication of the part I have taken in the recent discussions regarding the Hyderabad affairs. I have deeply lamented the necessity of opposing myself to the views of the Governor General, but I am consoled by the consciousness of having performed an imperative, though painful duty. The case will now be brought fully before the authorities at home and I entertain no apprehension of the issue." He would now say a few words on the charge of incivility urged against Mr. Adam, for not reading documents sent by Wm. Palmer, except such as he was bound to do in his official capacity. On this subject, the minute he had just quoted had the following passage—"I acknowledge having declined to read a private letter from Messrs Wm. Palmer and Co, tendered for my perusal in strict confidence by the Governor General, because I did not wish to acquire, in a manner which precluded me from making use of a knowledge of particulars, which might embarrass my judgment on public questions likely to arise between government and that house. An impression had been left on the court from what had fallen from an hon. proprietor, that Sir C. Metcal's present rank had taken its rise in connection with this business. (Applause.)" Then he had not rightly understood the hon. proprietor. A charge of inconsistency had, however, been brought against a late member of the British Government (Mr. Stuart), in whose presence he was speaking of his having contradicted himself respecting the character of Chunder Sool the minister of the Nizam's Government. In defending that hon. gentleman from this charge of inconsistency, he conceived he was doing that which the modesty of the hon. gentleman alone prevented him from doing, for it was not a pleasant situation for any man to stand up and call for your approbation on his own conduct.

Mr. Stuart begged leave to state, that he was, besides, very indisposed on the day in question, but he hoped he should again have an opportunity of addressing the court on that subject.

Mr. Wodehouse continued.—An assertion had been made that Mr. Stuart had contradicted himself in the character he had given of Chunder Sool. Now it has been shown, beyond all possibility of doubt, that the sentiments, which to be those of Mr. Stuart, were, in fact, those of the Resident at Hyderabad. It was difficult to conceive on what grounds the charge of Mr. Stuart's vexatious opposition to the Marquess of Hastings rested his conduct, throughout the whole of the transactions. He would refer to a passage in his minute of the 10th Nov 1819, which he says—

"I had, indeed, indulged in more propitious anticipations. I had cherished the hope, that, by a more equitable and benign exertion of our influence, we might extend the blessings of order and justice to the whole country, that we might thus riden the British Government from the odium of tolerating in dominions where our power and influence are confessedly uncontrollable evils of mal administration, which I believe to be as great as any that prevailed in the worst of the native governments, which it is the boast of our policy to have corrected.

I am very sensible of the difficulty of such reforms, when they are to be accomplished by the mere exertion of influence, and I am not overcredulous to the sudden unclonations often ascribed to that species of interposition; but I fear that, in the Nizam's dominions, the evil is too urgent to admit of choice. The Resident, at a former period, has declared, that the utter ruin of the country can be averted only by the direct assumption of it; and if we are not prepared to resort to that extremity, the attempt to correct the most prominent abuses by the exertion of our influence, seems to be the only practicable alternative.

Again in another of the same gentleman's minutes, dated 10th June 1820, where he alludes to the proposition of the sanction to the COC being conveyed in the Resident's letter, the following passage occurs—"The papers submitted by the Resident afford no information, with respect to the rate of interest or other advantages stipulated by the house, so as to enable this court to judge how far the arrangement may be an economical and beneficial one for the Nizam's government."

ment. In my account of the 1st Nov. last, recorded on the proceedings of the 1st Jan. 1890 following, I advanced objections against this government sanctioning a former pecuniary arrangement between the Nizam's government and the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co., upon the ground of the want of information which I had received on the present occasion. The hon. Bart. will admit, that I must entertain objection to the present proposition as being inadmissible. My objections, however, have acquired increased force from the fact and apparently growing extension of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co.'s pecuniary concerns with His Highness's government. Could this, he asked, be considered as anything in the shape of unwarranted opposition? But it had been said, that it would have been sufficient for Mr. Stuart to have expressed his dissent from the proposed measure, without entering into a detail of the reasons, which influenced him in coming to a decision on the question. Mr. Stuart had felt how important that question was, and, therefore, desirous to place his opinions on it upon record: such a course could not but be considered in any other light than as a constitutional mode of opposition, and was generally productive of great benefit. With respect to the question of the rate of interest, he begged leave, with all due submission to the hon. Bart. who had dilated on that point in last Friday's debate, to offer a few observations. It would be presumptuous for him (Mr. Wasborough) to enter the lists on such a topic, with such an antagonist as that hon. Bart. who had such great experience in matters of that kind; but he could not help submitting one question which arises out of his own statement. The hon. Bart. had endeavoured to prove that the 60 lac loan did not turn out so beneficial to the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co., as was generally believed, and stated a case in which he said 34 per cent. was obtained; but he (Mr. Wasborough) could not see how he made out that statement. The hon. Bart. added to the profits 8 per cent. which arose from the difference of exchange; but could that be considered interest? he did not think so. Let 8 be subtracted from 34, and 26 remain, and that, he would contend, was the amount of interest. But he had to observe another difference between that case and the transaction in which the firm of Messrs. Palmer had been engaged; which was, that it was not a loan, but merely a purchase of money made by the government of Bombay. The government said, "we are in want of so much money, and we will give so much for it." He was not, he thought, wrong in his manner of stating the case. The government gave bills for the money—these were tangible securities: and, believed, it would not be dangerous, that this was a transaction for one year only. It could only be fairly compared with that of the 60 lac loan if it had extended over a series of years with the interest always continuing the same. But to take a transaction of this nature, originating in circumstances of great exigency, when Bombay was in danger of being taken by the enemy, and place it in comparison with the other, he thought an unfair way of proceeding. The hon. Bart. had, he believed, stated that he should not like to have negotiated the 60 lac loan, because he did not consider it in the least beneficial, indeed, rather the reverse. Now he would beg leave to observe, that before Sir Wm. Rumbold became a member of the firm of Palmer and Co., he wrote a letter to Mr. de Fries, a friend of his at Madras, asking his opinion of the speculation. The answer of Mr. de Fries was expressed in the following terms:

"My dear Sir: I was favoured four days ago with your letter of the 28th ult., Soo Ragoon. I shall with pleasure impart to you my frank and sincere sentiments on the subject of your communication, and with perfect unreservedness, on the same condition that you required it of me; namely, that whatever I may say on the subject, it is to be considered entirely confidential, and intended only for your own private information and guidance.

"There could be no doubt of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. carrying on a beneficial trade at Hyderabad, and I believe, as far as the nature of it will admit, the risk not great, compared to many other branches of trade. I have had several opportunities, from my intercourse and transactions with a gentleman of respectability and fortune who had been long resident at Hyderabad, to obtain a knowledge of the commerce of that city, and my candid opinion is, that if you can be admitted into the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., and allowed at the same time to keep and remain at Calcutta in your present employ, you should by all means accept Mr. John Palmer's offer; in which case I should advise you, in order to render the concern beneficial to you, you ought to advance a capital of two or three lacs of rupees; for, from my knowledge of the transactions of that house at Hyderabad, it will require your carrying that sum into the firm to make it an object of advantage to you."

In reference to the proposition of compromising the question before the court by another amendment, he would say a few words. The hon. proprietor, who had on the present occasion, deserted his side of the court, (Mr. Dixon) had first of all advanced this proposition. That hon. proprietor had made a comparison between the original motion and the amendment, and and the Duke of Bridgewater's canal) and the river Irwell, which, after running parallel to each other for a length of distance, diverged at a certain point. He (Mr. Washbrough) thought the simile might be extended a little further, and would say that if the canal should happen to be too full it would run over into the river and inundate the country.

Mr. Dixon observed that the river fed the canal, and not the canal the river. (Much laughter).

Mr. Washbrough felt he had committed a mistake, but he hoped he should be able to get out of it. The river, according to the statement of the hon. proprietor, fed the canal. (Cries of question). He assured the hon. gentlemen he was coming to the question; whichever way the case was, the consequences as to the overflow would be the same; and to apply the argument to the question before the court, he thought that, whether the original motion or the amendment were carried, the consequences to the Marquess of Hastings would be the same; for in either case no slur would be cast on his character. To shew this, he would observe first, that on the 18th of May 1820, the Court of Directors passed a vote of thanks to the Marquess of Hastings; this vote was confirmed by the proprietors on the 29th of May 1822.

The Chairman correcting the hon. proprietor, informed him that both votes were passed in 1822.

Mr. Washbrough thought his argument instead of being weakened was rendered stronger by that fact; for the first condemnatory despatch sent out by the Directors, was dated 4th May, 1820, and consequently two years previous to the passing of the vote of thanks. The natural inference then, to be drawn, was, that the court considered the policy which called for condemnation to be an isolated affair, and not to be included in a general view of his lordship's administration, which had called forth their praises. He did not see how the Hyderabad transactions could be brought forward to militate against his lordship's character after the passing of that vote of approbation. But though no charge was intended to be founded against his lordship, yet they might be allowed to argue from those transactions that every particular of his administration had not been characterized by that sound policy which was to be found in it when considered as a whole. Were this rule to be adopted, the Court of Directors would be deprived of the power of duly appreciating the acts of their servants, and what honourable man would be desirous to receive a reward bestowed without discrimination? He now begged leave to be allowed to bestow a little consideration on the transactions to which the despatches allude, and to make some observations on them. The establishment of the house of Palmer and Co. was the first in order of these. Mr. Wm. Palmer requested permission of the government to form a commercial establishment at Hyderabad for the purpose of carrying on a banking business, and likewise of engaging in the purchase of timber in the forests of Gudavery, which was to be employed in ship building. As these objects appeared very plausible, and proper, a license was immediately granted by the government, and sanctioned by the Court of Directors; and they applied ten years afterwards to the government for what? Why, to be absolved from the consequences of their wrong-doing for the space of two years; for they had, during that time, not only contravened the law by lending money to a native prince, but by lending it at too high a rate of interest. Of the rate of interest, lawful or unlawful, a great deal had been said. He was ignorant as to the custom said to be prevalent in India of lending money at such a height, but he conceived such a practice very improper. An Act of Parliament had been passed to limit the amount of interest to 12 per cent., and this measure was adopted in consequence of the disastrous results of some transactions with native powers: some alterations were subsequently made in that Act, and provisions were introduced to extend to the provinces; but the bargains which had been contracted previous to the enactment of the law were not to be dissolved by these provisions. He would now pass a few observations upon a topic hitherto lost sight of in this debate. The law in India with respect to the recovery of debts was, as appeared to him, of a very peculiar nature. If a man were born in wedlock, his father being a European and his mother a native, his creditors might lay hold of him under the English law; but if he were not born in wedlock, he was not considered a British subject, and he might evade the payment of his debts. Now if this were the situation of Mr. Wm. Palmer, he and his partners might set the law of India at defiance. He did not state this from his own knowledge, but was led by what was contained in the printed volume. The opinion of Mr. Fergusson, the Advocate-general, in this case, was as follows:—

“To George Swinton, Esq., Sec. to Gov.
“Sir: 1. In reply to your letter of the 3d inst., I have the honour to state, for the purpose of being submitted to the right hon. the Governor-General in Council, that British-born subjects offending against the provision of the Act 37th Geo. III., cap 142, sec. 28, although the offence be committed out of the Company's territories, and by persons residing out of those territories, may be prosecuted in his Majesty's courts in India, when they

they can be made amenable to the process of such courts. There might of course be difficulties in procuring the attendance of witnesses to prove the offence, our courts having no power to compel the attendance of witnesses residing in a foreign territory.

"2. I am of opinion, that the misdemeanour in question, namely, lending money, and taking a higher rate of interest than 12 per centum per annum, whether to individuals or to native princes, cannot be considered an offence of that heinous description, which, according to the usages of Europe, or to the general principles of public law, would justify the British Government in applying to the government of the foreign state in which the offence had been committed, to seize and surrender up the offenders.

"3. The terms 'subjects of his Majesty in the East-Indies,' as construed by the Supreme Court, are held to include, not only his Majesty's European subjects, but all persons, sons of British fathers, born in wedlock in the East-Indies, without regard to the description or country of the mother; but persons born out of wedlock, although the sons of British fathers, and born within the Company's territories, have been held not to be included within the terms 'British subjects,' or 'subjects of his Majesty,' which are used indifferently throughout the Acts of Parliament.

"4. With respect to the liability of country-born partners of a mercantile banking-house to punishment, for contravening the statutes referred to, and on which the law-authorities at home appear to be doubtful, I am decidedly of opinion, that persons of that description are not liable to prosecution or punishment for any such acts.

"I have, &c.

(Signed) "R. C. FERGUSON, Adv.-Gen.
Tort William, 15th Oct. 1823."

A plea of such a kind was set up by Mr. Wm. Palmer. His declaration was "I am the subject of the Nizam, and touch me if you dare." He obtained his information on this point from the letter of the resident at Hyderabad, inserted at page 246. It was as follows:—

"I understand from good authority that Mr. Wm. Palmer, in forwarding the minister's letters, pretended that he did so as a subject of the Nizam's Government, bound to attend to its wishes. This plea was disingenuous, and might be termed ungrateful, as throwing off for an unworthy purpose the sovereignty of the British Government, to which he owes every thing."

He thought he was thus borne out in his assertion. He would maintain, therefore, that in the conduct of Messrs. Palmer and Co. there was much chicanery. Mr. Wm. Palmer said, "I will obtain the interest of the British Government to forward my views; if any untoward circumstance should arise, my partners may make themselves easy, I can be the 'escape-gont'; I was not born in wedlock, and therefore am not amenable to the laws; I am the Nizam's subject, and you have not power to touch me." In looking at the 60 lre loan transaction, he thought there were many circumstances connected with it which might be brought to bear upon the present question. He was in doubt respecting the propriety of his quoting from a book which professed to be a summary of the administration of the Marquess of Hastings in India. He would, however, in the first place, read an extract from a minute of the noble Marquess. He would not blame his lordship, considering the close connexion which subsisted between him and Sir Wm. Rumbold, for endeavouring to do that gentleman all the service in his power, but he (Mr. Washborough) thought he should have shewn more firmness when the question became one between private friendship and public duty. He thought the character given of Chundoo Loll in the printed documents, might with equal aptitude be applied to his lordship. Of Chundoo Loll it was said "that his private virtues were the worst part of his character." (Hear!) Now he (Mr. Washborough) conceived those expressions might be interpreted in this manner: that he saw clearly the path of duty, but had not courage to pursue it; in short, that he was too much influenced by the wishes of others. There was a minute of the noble Marquess's, in which he stated he could not perform his duty as Governor-General. And why? because of his connexion with Sir Wm. Rumbold. The following passage occurs in a minute of his lordship's, dated 17th June 1820:—

"That the loan must be advantageous to the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. cannot be questionable, as otherwise they would have no inducement to listen to the applications of the minister. A person in whom I take a very lively concern from his having married a ward of mine, brought up nearly as if she had been my daughter, is a partner in that house. The degree in which his interest is engaged in the proposed transaction might, without my being conscious of the bias, warp my judgment. I shall therefore forbear taking part in the decision of council, but it is incumbent in me to define some inadvertencies which must attend it." Had the noble Marquess stuck to this resolution, no blame could have attached to him. He however returned to the council; and he (Mr. Washborough) certainly thought that the reasons urged for this return looked more like an excuse for doing a wrong act than a defence of one that was right. These reasons were stated in a minute of his lordship, dated 14th July 1820. It ran thus:—

dilemma. Either I must abandon the principle which I at the outset adopted of non-interference, or I must leave Rajah Chundoo Loll to feel himself deserted in the first hazardous step taken by him, through compliance with the instigation of this government. His now forbearing to carry into effect those reductions which he had announced, would be a triumph to his powerful adversaries, of such mischievous consequences, that I should be hopeless of bringing about any reform in the Nizam's administration, unless by measures on our part bearing an odious character of violence. I cannot hesitate in my choice; I must retract my profession, acknowledging that I was wrong in ever letting a personal consideration induce me to withdraw myself from any part of my public duty." He thought this evidence enough that his lordship on that occasion sacrificed his public duty. The 60 lac loan was negotiated at Calcutta in 1820; he was not aware how the delay was occasioned, but an interval of thirty days took place between the appearance of the requisition and the granting of the loan. No communication could of course, in that interval, have taken place, if a messenger had been employed on the occasion to go between Calcutta and Hyderabad. The Advocate-General, on being applied to, decided against the legality of taking money out of the treasury to advance the loan. The question then naturally arises, in what state was the money-market at that period? They had the Marquess of Hastings' own word for saying that the Company's treasury, in 1821, was in so flourishing a condition as to exceed all its debts. In 1814 the government had contracted two loans, one at the rate of 10 per cent. and another at 6 per cent. It was therefore natural to think that the pecuniary affairs of the Company went on improving from that period, up to the time specified by the noble Marquess; to be sure the Nepal war must not be lost sight of; that was the source of great expense. He could not, however, omit to subscribe his praise to the great and eminent qualities of the noble Marquess, not only as displayed in that transaction, but throughout the whole of his administration; for these he was entitled to every credit. But to return to the subject of the loan: if he (Mr. Wasborough) wished to obtain a loan of some money, and applied to his hon. friend (Sir C. Forbes), would he not naturally look to the money-market in the event of his consenting, in order to see if the interest charged was not too high. The government, in his opinion, would have done wisely by lending the money from their treasury. A carte blanche was a measure often resorted to by the Governor-General in cases of imminent peril to the empire; and in the case of the Nizam, he thought the government would have been justified in superseding any Act of Parliament, and lending the money to the Nizam, and that too at a lower rate of interest, than had been charged by Palmer and Co. The affair was certainly one of a very complicated nature. In this country, when a loan is wanted, the receiver pays no more, less, according to the value of the security he can give. In such a case there is clear and open dealing. But Messrs. Palmer ask permission to advance 60 lacs (cries of 60 lacs of rupees); he begged pardon, 60 lacs of rupees, and when the government asks what they were to gain by the transaction, they refuse to tell. Suppose a man wanted to raise money to purchase an estate, would not the first thing decided on be the amount of interest which he was to pay? After that point was settled, the lawyers would be called in, the deeds and conveyances drawn up, and if the security was found sufficient, the money lent. But in the 60 lac loan transaction the amount of interest was carefully kept back, as was also the time of payment. They had been told by the late resident (Mr. Russell) in the course of his able, and he would say elegant speech, that it was to be paid off in twelve years.

Mr. Russell, interrupting the hon. proprietor, said he was entirely unconscious of having made the assertion, and believed he could not have done so, as it was not the fact.

Mr. Wasborough begged the hon. gent's pardon: he certainly had understood him to say so. He thought the terms of the license granted by the Governor-General were very vague and loose; but he admitted, that whatever might be said of the unfairness in granting this license, it was most evident that when the Marquess granted it he certainly did it from the best of motives, for he admitted it was done for the purpose of aiding the Nizam, and that was a good object. The blue book certainly contained evidence of previous pecuniary transactions having existed between the house of Palmer and Co. and the Nizam's Government; it is indeed stated, that one of the objects of the loan was to pay off some unbalanced accounts. The suspicions of the noble Marquess might have been awakened had that fact been communicated to him; but it was studiously kept back. Sir William Rumbold confessed that the debts due to the house amounted to 25 lacs of rupees. In his letter to the Chairman, he said, "This therefore was the sum due by the minister to the house when the operation of the loan began, and not a single rupee was un-sanctioned balance. If the amount of bonus was likewise deducted, it would be found that only 26 lacs of rupees would be left to be paid to the Nizam. He thought there had been a deal of shuffling fling with respect to the interest. The first item appeared to be the credit taken by the house for a bonus of 80 lacs of rupees (No, no!) He hoped he did not state any thing that was not borne out by the facts. In turning to the book, he found, at page 661, they would find this item, "To Najah Chundoo Loll, compensation on loan and premium on interest reduced, 8,00,000 rupees."

Mr. Russell begged leave to state that that sum was on the debtor side of the account, and that the house did not credit themselves with that sum.

Mr. Washborough begged pardon. He would wish it to be understood that he offered his observations to the court with great deference, and would not think of setting up his opinion in opposition to that of the hon. proprietor, whose information and experience connected with those subjects were so extensive. He repeated, he thought there had been a great deal of shuffling in the accounts with respect to the 60 lac loan, and that although the house had laid claim to much good having been effected by them, yet these circumstances took away considerably from their merit.

The hon. D. Kinnaird.—What circumstances?

Mr. Washborough would read them; another short extract from the "Summary," and he thought he could shew that the noble Marquess had been imposed upon by the representations of the house. He thought he was doing the Marquess great justice in placing the thing in the best possible light for him. He was far from wishing to underrate the merits of the noble lord; indeed he would wish his statue to be placed in a niche of this room. The Marquess of Hastings had been very fortunate in being seconded, not only by the best civil, but the best military officers the country ever produced. He was not, however, the less entitled to praise on that account, for it was his wisdom that guided those excellent machines, and set them in motion. In his passage up the Ganges, the noble Marquess said that he was met by Sidi Ali, the sovereign of Oude, who pressed him to take eight lacs of rupees: this gift his lordship refused, but accepted the money as a loan. He was not going to give any opinion as to the policy of this measure, he would leave it to be decided by persons who were better qualified to judge of it from their more extensive information on those subjects. They would likewise find it stated in the "Summary," that eight lacs more were added to this loan, and that the rate of interest paid was 6 per cent. Now if the Governor-General, when on the point of commencing a war, could borrow money at 6 per cent. interest, one would naturally think the Bengal Government should borrow at a similar rate in time of peace.

Sir C. Forbes observed, that the loan alluded to by the hon. proprietor was a voluntary one.

Mr. Washborough admitted that, but did not see how that circumstance could make such a great difference. The rate of interest was charged according to the credit of the person who accepts the loan. Now he had no doubt the hon. baronet (Sir C. Forbes) could get money at 2½ per cent., while he (Mr. Washborough) would have to pay 10 per cent. for it. He maintained, the question of interest depended entirely on the security given. (Laughter.) He did not care for their laughter; he had it on the authority of a gentleman much better acquainted with these subjects than himself, that money was worth whatever it will bring. His principle was, that if any person gained by a transaction of that kind, it should be the borrower, and not the man who has the money lying idle in his coffers. The case of the loan was however different, for Messrs. Palmer and Co. were in that transaction enabled to make their own terms, because there was no competition, and that circumstance was enough to make a vast difference in the rate. Any one who had complete control of the money market could make his own terms, and that Messrs. Palmer and Co. did this was evident from the letter to Sir Wm Rumbold from the Marquess of Hastings — "My dear Sir William: The account you have given of the house of Palmer and Co. at Hyderabad is very favourable, and certainly the details justify your inclination for going to that city in order to inspect the books. I enclose you a letter to the Resident, couched in terms which will insure to you his attentions and most earnest good offices. The partners speculate, that you, being one of the firm, will interest me in the welfare of the House to a degree which may be materially beneficial to them: it is a fair and honest calculation. The amount of advantage which the countenance of government may bestow must be uncertain, as I apprehend it would flow principally from the opinion the natives would entertain of the respect likely to be paid by their own government to an establishment known to stand well in the favour of the supreme authority here. Perhaps a more distinct benefit may attend the firm, from the consequent discouragement to competition with you by any other British partnership, to which a similarly professed sanction would not be granted." This passage, he would contend, justified his assertion. He appealed to them, as merchants of London, whether the noble Marquess had made a wise use of his authority in this transaction? He told a person connected with him that relationship, that he would do so and so, that the house should have the sanction of his authority and the weight of his name to help them in their speculations. He knew that they reckoned upon this, and he called it "a fair and honest calculation." It was not necessary for him to argue the question of corruption; all he would contend for was, that the noble Marquess had been imposed upon by representations of the necessities of the Nizam's government; and were he (Mr. W.) disposed, he might shew that the parties who made this representation were anxious to effect the contract for the loan, in order to pay themselves their former balances. The noble Marquess gave his assent to the proceedings; he did not say that he was aware of the full intentions of the parties as to the loan, but he did give his sanction to the house of Palmer and Co. in transactions which ought never to have had existence. Was this, he would ask, such conduct as befitted the Governor-General of India? That was the question which ought to be considered by the court. Another point which made a great impression on his mind was, that Sir W. Rumbold, having married the ward of the noble Marquess, by whom he acquired very considerable property, which was vested in trustees, applies to him (the Marquess) to know whether he might use the trust-money in his partnership transactions with Palmer and Co. The Marquess of Hastings, in his letter of Nov. 20th, 1814, answers in the negative, and gives it as his opinion, that the trust-money could be laid out in no other way than in the purchase of government securities. The hon. baronet pressed on the attention of the noble Marquess, that the transactions with the house would be likely to be extremely lucrative, and he proposed borrowing the sum which he was to advance for his share in the firm. The Marquess, in his reply, says, "you talk of borrowing the sum which you are to advance for a share in the firm: how can you do that without security to pledge? Your own money cannot be made that security, because that would be to subject it to the very risk which Sir E. East regarded as illegal." It appeared, however, that Sir Wm. Rumbold did borrow the money, and at 12 per cent., which was the highest rate of interest allowed by law, and it might be presumed that he would not have borrowed at such a rate if he did not believe that he was likely to make a great deal more by the business of the firm of Palmer and Co. Sir Edw. East, as he had just stated, had given his opinion to the Marquess, that such an application of the money of his former ward could not be legal. If the noble Marquess knew this as trustee for Lady Rumbold, how should he be ignorant of the nature of the transaction as Governor-General? The hon. proprietor then thanked the court for the patient attention which he had received, and the best return which he could make for it would be, to shorten the few observations which he had still to make. It appeared to him, that any thing contained in the amendment would not reflect on the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings, nor expunge from the records of the court those deservedly high praises which had been bestowed upon him. He had been Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief for several years, and had discharged the duty of those high stations nobly: he spoke of the general course of his administration. But at the time the vote of the Court of Proprietors had been agreed to, approving his general conduct, these transactions, he believed, were not known to the extent with which the court was now acquainted with them. He would ask any hon. proprietors, did they doubt the information contained in the large blue book which had been laid before them? If there were any reason to believe that the individuals who supplied the documents contained in that book had given wrong information, and calculated to mislead the Company, then of course no proceedings of any kind could be founded on them; but if the book was unimpeached and unimpeachable (and that it was unimpeachable he was disposed to contend, for he could not bring himself to believe that any man, much less a man of the high character which Sir C. Metcalf had hitherto sustained, could be so lost to honour as to supply documents which he knew to be false)—but he repeated, if the documents before them were correct, they could come to no other conclusion than that which had been very properly stated in the amendment. There was one remark which he would make, on the subject of pecuniary transactions with native princes. It was well known that such transactions, by British subjects, were ever objectionable, on account of the subsequent trouble and embarrassment which they created to the Company at home, as well as to the Government abroad. It was only the other day that the first report of the Rajah of Tanjore's affairs was presented to the House of Commons. Those on the subject of the Nabob of the Carnatic's affairs had already amounted to seventy-nine in number, and in all probability, would amount to seventy-nine more before the whole was brought to a conclusion. These complicated proceedings arose from the disposition of the native governments to raise money at any rate and by any means. To remedy or prevent such evils in future, an act was passed in the year 1778, to prevent the taking of a higher rate of interest in any money transactions in India than 12 per cent.; and in the year 1797

another act was passed, by which all pecuniary transactions between British subjects and native princes in India were declared illegal, at any rate of interest, unless with the sanction in writing of the Governor-General in Council, subject, of course, to the subsequent approval or rejection of the Court here at home, for they were there as the House of Commons, having the general superintendence of the public affairs of the Company. Now, he would ask whether, if such high interests were illegal, and if such transactions were to be countenanced only in cases of urgent necessity, was it right that they should be allowed to continue without any check or controul. An hon. proprietor had said that this would be attended with difficulty, but still it ought to be attempted. It was of importance sufficient to engage the most serious consideration of the court, and every means should be resorted to to put it down. It had been said, as he had before remarked, that the amendment would implicate the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings: he denied that it would. Posterity, in years to come, would judge of the results of the noble Marquess's government in India; they could not be affected by the present vote; that vote (he meant the affirmative of the amendment) had been forced on the court by those who had introduced the original motion. It was not intended by it to impute any corrupt motives to the noble Marquess; hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to think it did, but here they were at issue, and on this point he would meet them. He contended, that it would leave the recorded praises of the noble Marquess untouched, praises such as seldom before had been given to any man in his situation. But what was proposed after they carried this motion, and cleared the noble Lord's character from all imputation? Was it not intended to increase the compensation for his services? that was in the requisition. (Cries of no, no!) In the way in which he viewed the amendment, it did not appear to him that there was any disposition in the court to accuse the noble Marquess, but it was very natural for the Directors not to wish to allow their proceedings to be called in question. He would now leave the question, with this remark, that if he thought, in voting for the amendment, he should be casting any censure on the character of the Marquess of Hastings, or any imputation of corrupt motives, he would be sorry to give such a vote. The amendment would, however, have no such effect. It was not meant as an attack on him; but as a fair defence of their own proceedings from all imputation.

Mr. Dixon rose to defend himself from the imputation of inconsistency, which he conceived had been cast upon him by the last speaker.

Mr. Wadborough, in explanation, denied having intended to say any thing which could be personally offensive to the hon. proprietor.

Sir Charles Forbes addressed the court in explanation of what he stated on a former day, about the rate of interest paid by government on one occasion, when it had advertised for tenders for taking Company's paper for cash. What he had stated was, that 100 rupees cash were offered and accepted for 120 paper money; that the paper money bore an interest of 6 per cent., and a farther sum of 8 per cent. was allowed for difference of exchange between Bombay and Calcutta, making in all 34 per cent. in one year. It was true that Government were obliged soon after to open their treasury all over India at 12 per cent., and got 2s. 6d. sterling for the Bengal rupee.

General Thornton said, that many of the points which had been mooted might be very useful to the interests of the Company in other respects, but he did not see how they bore upon the question immediately before the court. To some of the allegations which had been made, he scarcely knew what answer to make. He had ever a high respect for the character of the Marquess of Hastings, and that respect was not in any degree diminished by any thing he had heard in the course of the present debate respecting him. The noble Marquess had been accused of favouritism. He believed there was some ground for such a charge, but it was not favouritism to Sir Wm. Rumbold, as he should be able to shew before he sat down.

Before he proceeded farther on the subject, he could not avoid remarking on the unfairness and want of candour which had marked the conduct of hon. proprietors on this occasion, in finding constructive faults in the conduct of Lord Hastings by disjointing sentences and taking partial extracts of particular documents. Surely this was not an ingenuous or manly way of getting up a charge against any human being: why, upon such a principle, any writings, even the sacred scriptures, might be tortured into a meaning which was never intended. The court knew that celebrated passage in scripture, "The fool saith in his heart there is no God;" suppose he were to divide the sentence, and take only the latter part, would it not be most unfair to quote it as a text of scripture in proof that there was no God? Yet it was not unfair to select garbled extracts of letters and documents for the purpose of vilifying the character of a most distinguished and respectable nobleman. He had heard of the gratitude of Sir C. Metcalf, and he had also heard of what Robespierre had said of the crying sin of gratitude—that it was unknown in the French revolution—and on this point, he thought that Sir C. Metcalf calf gave the fraternal embrace to some of the sans culottes.

Mr. Weetling.—Will the hon. general say what gratitude is here meant, and he will answer himself?

General Thornton continued.—He would now beg to call the attention of the court to the state of the law by which the intercourse between British subjects and the native princes in India was to be regulated. It appeared that by the 19th Geo. III., not more than 12 per cent. was allowed to be taken as the interest of any loan contracted for in India; and that by the 37th of Geo. III., British subjects were prevented from lending money to any of the native powers, without the consent in writing of the Governor in Council, under penalty of being deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and the transaction declared void: and it was further enacted, that if any such case arose, it should be laid before the law-officer of the district where it occurred, in order that the offenders might be prosecuted. It was also enacted, that the opinion of council should be taken before any license was granted to any British subject to enter into any pecuniary transactions with any native power. Now he contended, that in the case before the court all the clauses of the Act had been complied with. The license to Palmer and Co., to negotiate with Rajah Chundoo Loll, was granted on July 29d 1816. The opinion of the Advocate-General, Mr. Strettel, was dated 19th of July in the same year, and he there laid it down that the 13th Geo. III. confined the penalty for taking more than 12 per cent. for interest of money to persons who committed the offence within the Company's territories; and Mr. Spankie, Advocate-General, stated the 13th Geo. III. had no reference to the case of loans made to native princes, and he added that the clause did not extend to make British subjects guilty of the offence out of the Company's settlements, or admit the recovery of penalties for taking more than 12 per cent., if such interest were not taken within their settlements. The law, he conceived, was thus fully complied with, but still it was thought necessary to send the case for the opinion of counsel in England. That opinion, given in 1822, fifty years after the act had passed, was, that restriction on the rate of interest extended as well in those parts of the East-Indies which are not under the government of the Company, as in those which are. It was not for him to set up his opinion against that of the Attorney-General and the learned Sergeant (Bosanquet) who was the law-officer of the Company, but it did seem somewhat strange that after fifty years, during which only one construction had been put upon the Act, this new interpretation should be made, limiting the rate of interest to be paid and taken in countries which were not under the Company's government. (Hear, hear!) It would seem to him, that these learned gentlemen were frightened by a rate of interest so disproportionate to what was paid in England. These opinions were however acted upon; and in the political letter to Bengal, dated 9th of April 1823, it was said by the Court of Directors "we desire that you will cause this explanation and instruction to be made public, and that you will institute prosecutions against all persons in any way contravening the law as thus explained." This instruction was in great part acted on, and the consequence was the ruin of the house of Palmer and Co., and that on representations of Sir C. Metcalf, which he would maintain ought not to be depended on, for it was his opinion, that most of the assertions affecting that house were altogether misrepresentations. He did not say they were wilful on the part of Sir C. Metcalf, but that gentleman did receive, and state as facts, all kinds of rumours and suspicious affecting the house. What was the next step taken? It was one which shewed a determination to ruin Palmer and Co., for although they had, in some of their most important transactions with the Nizam, received what was admitted by the hon. member of council to be equivalent to a guarantee—

Mr. Stuart.—Will the gallant general declare what he considers this was to be a guarantee for?

General Thornton said he was sorry if he had mistaken what the hon. gentleman stated on a former day, but he certainly had taken his observations, in the same way in which they had been understood by an hon. bart. (Sir C. Forbes), to mean, that the sanction of the Supreme Government to these transactions was equivalent to a guarantee, and that, in that sense, the Company were bound to make good the losses of Palmer and Co.

Mr. Stuart.—The hon. general has not wholly mistaken me, but as the question is one of importance, I will repeat what I did say. I stated, that to any transaction of the house of Palmer and Co. with the Nizam, to which the Supreme Government had given its sanction, I considered that there was given what was equivalent to a guarantee.

General Thornton resumed.—He would not press that part of the subject farther, but would come to what had been done in consequence of the instructions sent, and these instructions were acted upon in a manner which evinced a determination to ruin the house at all events. In the beginning of February 1823, during the administration of Mr. Adam, a letter was addressed by the Government in Council to Sir C. Metcalf, then at Hyderabad, directing directing him to inform the house of Palmer and Co. that they were prohibited from all intercourse with the Nizam's ministers, personal or written, direct or indirect, except through the British Resident, in the same manner as in the case with respect to other British subjects at Hyderabad. This conduct towards those gentlemen was, he conceived, most cruel, and could not be justified by any conduct which had been imputed to them. (Hear, hear!) He had heard talk of plots, what plots could be meant? If there were any between the former Resident and the house of Palmer and Co., it was desirable it should be openly stated; but such a supposition was absurd, and if ever a suspicion of the kind had been harboured in any quarter, he thought it must have been most completely removed by the able and manly statement of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell). (Hear, hear!) He now came to the proceeding against the house under the administration of Lord Amherst; under him the ruin of that house was completed. On the 5th December 1823, Mr. Secretary Swinton wrote to Sir C. Metcalf, in answer to a letter which had been received from him, enclosing his reply to an application made to him by Palmer and Co. He says, "The Governor-General in Council entirely approves the tenor of your reply to Messrs. Palmer and Co., and desires that you will apprise the house, that, as stated by you, no demands on their part, on which illegal interest is charged, either prospectively or retrospectively, can be permitted to be conveyed to the government of his Highness the Nizam through the channel of the British Resident." The ruin of the house was thus entirely effected, and it stopped payment a few months after.

A Proprietor.—What has this to do with the Marquess of Hastings?

General Thornton continued.—He mentioned these facts to shew the conduct of Sir C. Metcalf to the house of Palmer and Co., and he would assert, that that conduct had in a great measure arisen from animosity at their having transmitted a letter of complaint from the Nizam's minister, Chundoo Loll, to the Governor-General in Council. That was a letter which he would contend ought to have been sent, in the first instance, by the Resident himself, when he received it from the minister. It was the soundest policy to let the ears of the Supreme Government be open to all complaints from the native princes, and they should be attended to. This was the policy pursued at home in the government of the army: the complaints of all individuals made at the Horse-Guards were promptly attended to, and that was one cause of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief's popularity. He contended, that if the Resident at Hyderabad had refused to transmit the complaint or remonstrance of the Nizam's minister, he did not deserve to be continued in his situation. Whatever might be his other qualifications for office, they should be overlooked if he was proved to have neglected so important a part of his duty. Whatever might have been the favourable feelings of the noble Marquess towards him, he should address him in the words of Othello—

— "Cassio, I love thee,
But never more be officer of mine."

Mr. Innes rose to order. He begged to submit, that what the gallant general was now stating, had no reference to the question before the court. It was not a defence of the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings, but an accusation against him for not having dismissed Sir C. Metcalf from his situation as resident at Hyderabad. If there were any grounds for such an accusation, which he did not admit, the present was not the proper time for it.

General Thornton contended that he was quite in order; he had set out with saying that the Marquess of Hastings, if guilty of any favouritism, it was towards Sir C. Metcalf, and not to Sir Wm. Rumbold; and that Sir C. Metcalf had been guilty of neglect in not transmitting the letter of Chundoo Loll, the substance of which had been communicated to him by the assistant Resident, Lieut. Burnet. In that letter, Chundoo Loll, after entering into a long detail of the causes which reduced the Nizam's government to the necessity of borrowing large sums from Messrs. Palmer and Co., and of the exertions he had made to extricate his government from its embarrassments, says, according to Lieut. Burnet's account (in letter 24th June 1822, page 251, paragraphs 10, 11, 12, 13):—

"The minister is, he says, aware that the repayment of the sum due to Messrs. Palmer and Co., previously to the period specified in the agreement entered into with them, will be considered by the members of that firm a great hardship; but he hopes, by affording them assistance and protection in their future mercantile speculations, that they will be eventually saved from loss."

"He then goes on to observe, that although the settlements for a term of years in the different districts of the Nizam's country have been completed, and every possible means taken for the protection of the cultivating class from the oppression of the Talookdars, yet, in addition to those gentlemen formerly employed in civil duties, Captains Campbell and Lee have lately been appointed."

"He asks what would be the opinion which his highness the Nizam would form of him were he to become acquainted with the the circumstance of British gentlemen being permitted to exercise interference or authority in his country? He remonstrates, in rather a strong tone, against the continuance of such interference, for which there is no precedent, and for which he attempts to prove there no longer exists any necessity.

"He represents the bad consequences which arise from the existence of two separate authorities, in proof of which he encloses the letter from the Talookdar of Kilburgah, which I have herewith the honour to transmit."

In answer to this (General Thornton continued) a letter is written by Mr. Bushby, by direction of Sir C. Metcalf, and dated Hyderabad, June 5, 1822 (page 255), in which he states, in paragraph 8th, "Of the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth paragraphs, I am directed to observe, that the Resident is surprised at the present opposition, for the first time, to the measures adopted for the relief of the country from oppression. Hitherto, the minister has been considered as assenting and pledged to the very measures to which he would now appear to object."

There certainly could be no doubt of the oppression, but the cause was that upon which the minister and the Resident did not agree. In the conclusion of his letter Mr. Bushby states:

"Lastly, I am directed to request you to have a conference with the minister, and discuss the contents of his note in the spirit of the preceding observations."

In the answer to this, addressed to Sir C. Metcalf, and dated June 22d, 1822 (page 256), Mr. Barnett states (paragraph 5): "the minister professes to be convinced by the arguments made use of in the 8th paragraph (of the preceding letter) of the necessity of a continuance of the measures adopted for the relief of the country from oppression, and he declares his entire conviction of your good wishes for the welfare and prosperity of the Nizam's government. His dread is for the future, lest others may come with different views and other feelings." Why, said General Thornton, should Sir C. Metcalf have believed this? Must he not have known that the minister said this because he was afraid to say otherwise? He must have known that these could not be his real sentiments, after what had come to his knowledge of the conduct of some of the Resident's officers, in overrunning the country, and in being guilty of so many unwarrantable exercises of authority.

A Proprietor.—"What has the court to do with these matters? We are not here trying Sir C. Metcalf."

General Thornton continued. Soon after this it was found that Chundoo Loll, not having received any answer to his remonstrance, wrote to the Governor. Genu-ral, and finding no other mode of communication, had it conveyed through the house of Palmer and Co. That letter contained long and serious complaints of the grievances which the minister asserted affected his master's territory by the interference and exercise of authority on the part of some of the Resident's officers. It would be found at length inserted in page 176 of the book. Having been laid before the Council, an answer was sent, informing the minister that the communication through Mr. William Palmer was highly improper, that it should be either through the Resident or the Persian Secretary; that the subject of his complaint had been considered by the Council, and they were of opinion, that the minister was mistaken in attributing any unfriendly disposition to the Resident, Sir C. Metcalf, but that the Resident would be again reminded of the continued disposition of the Supreme Government to promote the best interests of the Nizam. He (General Thornton) did not see why Chundoo Loll should have been blamed for having sent his complaints through Mr. William Palmer. In point of fact, the Resident had been guilty of a neglect of duty in delaying to send it when it was first transmitted to him. He had before observed, that the utmost liberty should be given to the native princes in India to transmit their complaints to the Supreme Government. It was the practice and the excellent policy of the House of Commons here to throw no impediment whatsoever in the way of the complaints of the people, and to institute an inquiry into all those which seemed well founded. Why was the Government of India to be excepted from this wholesome regulation? Was it to be allowed, that, circumstanced as we were with respect to the native powers, their statement of grievances should be stopped in this way? He would assert, that if Sir C. Metcalf interfered to prevent the complaint or remonstrance of Chundoo Loll from reaching the Governor in Council, he ought to be removed immediately from his situation. It was the duty of the Company to inquire whether all complaints made were well founded, and, without inquiry, it was impossible to say how far oppression might be carried. (Hear! hear!) After receiving the letter of the Governor in Council, announcing the reception of the Rajah's complaint, Sir C. Metcalf seemed to be alarmed, and well he might, for he had put himself in a situation of great jeopardy; and he drew up a letter containing some awkward excuses for not having transmitted it before. Those excuses, he would contend, were wholly inadmissible, and Sir C. Metcalf was responsible for his neglect. All his acts had been from bad to worse. He now came

In paragraph sixth, Sir C. Metcalf, in alluding to the proceedings of the minister, reproached him for the fault, the great fault, as he called it, which he had committed, and besought him to assure him of my pardon. I observed, as I had done before, that I could not have entertained any personal feelings on the subject, and that he had reason to be assured from the letter which he had read, that his conduct in that affair had not excited any displeasure on the part of the high authority which I served. He still insisted that he would not be easy until I would pronounce the word pardon from my own lips, which therefore I did."

Here was the real delinquent stating to the Council the conduct of the individual who had been oppressed, and who, though apparently expressing contrition for his fault, was the person who had most reason to complain.

In paragraph seventh, the letter proceeded—

"At the termination of the interview, he put his hands together and threw his head into my lap in order that I might put my hand on it, and catching hold of my hand, pressed it warmly to his breast. In describing such particulars, my object is, to lay before the Governor General in Council the character of the extraordinary man with whom any duty has placed me in contact and collision."

There was nothing extraordinary in all this, and if it exhibited an extraordinary man, it was Sir C. Metcalf himself, who could have permitted such an act on the part of the minister, and having permitted it, who could have recorded it in a manner which redounded so little to his own credit. He must have known at the time that Chundoo Loll could not have been sincere in this professed submission, or if he did not, the views of the character of the natives of high rank in India were very limited. He (General Thornton) had heard in the House of Commons that Chundoo Loll could not be sincere in getting his head into his lap, which he had done. He had heard, or read, he believed, that a company of men had once met and were engaged to murder Sir Metcalf and to burn his house, and that consequently he was obliged to come there to describe their opinion of him, as they really felt them.

There existed great confusion, and much was astonished at hearing from him different sentiments so different from those he had previously expressed. If the same magic influence had been exercised on the unfortunate Chundoo Loll, there was no doubt that the Resident would have had to give a very different account from that contained in the letter which he had just read. It was more than probable that the minister would have said: "You are my oppressor and I am now more than ever in your power; I must, therefore, state not what I feel, but what I think may be most agreeable to you." The former Resident was a good man and took no advantage from his situation to oppress me, but you have oppressed me and omitted to transmit my complaints and my prayers for redress." If this could have taken place, it would have been seen that, instead of the Rajah asking pardon of the Resident, the Resident would have to demand it of the Rajah. (If so, hear!)

It appeared to him, after all he had heard on this subject, that there was no ground for any charge against the Marquess of Hastings, except, perhaps, that he had looked with too favourable an eye on the conduct of Sir C. Metcalf. When Lieutenant Colonel O'Brien was appointed to assist him in the Residency, he protested against it, and he (General Thornton) considered that the government of India failed in its duty in not admonishing Sir Charles on account of such a breach of discipline; on the contrary, it appeared from the public statements that the government were disposed to put a more favourable construction on his intentions, and to suppose that they also judged more favourably of them by acquitting him of any design to do more than to submit, in strong terms, and on public grounds, objections to Lieutenant Colonel O'Brien's appointment. In the protest of the hon. director (Mr. Pattison) it had been very properly remarked, that the Court had omitted to notice the dignified assertion of the Marquess of Hastings, that he would not shut the door against any complaints that might be made during his government. He (General Thornton) would contend that no complaints should be considered unjust until they were inquired into, and that it was imperative on the government of India to make such inquiry whenever complaints came before them. For, if unjust, their injustice ought to be made known, but if just, they ought to be redressed. (Hear, hear!) Now, in respect to the transactions of Palmer and Co. with the Nizam, he could not think that the interest which they charged was exorbitant when all the circumstances were considered: in this opinion he was fully borne out by the able speech of the late Resident (Mr. Russell) who was on the spot and acquainted with the whole of the transactions, and whose opinion on that subject was confirmed by the declaration of the hon. bart. (Sir C. Forbes). If there was any thing unreasonable in their contracts, it was that they were made against their own interest. He would not occupy the attention of the court much longer. As to the Marquess of Hastings, he would say that he had never asked or received a favour of him in his life, and he only stood there to do justice to that nobleman, whom he saw extremely ill used, without even the shadow of reason. He would not go through the panegyrics which had been so deservedly pronounced upon him in that court and elsewhere, but he might observe that the noble lord had received, in the course of his public life, the thanks of all those with whom he had come in contact in his official capacity. His high character had not, however, escaped censure. In this it might be assimilated to that of another celebrated individual, Lord Nelson; both were distinguished for great talents and important achievements, but neither had escaped unjust censure. It appeared to be a consequence of greatness that its possessors should have enemies, and for no other reason, but because they were great so it was with Lord Nelson, and so it was now with the Marquess of Hastings. While on this subject he could not avoid repeating to the court a few lines written upon the character of Lord Nelson, by the present right hon. George Canning.

"Thy skill to plan; thy enterprise to dare;
Thy might to strike; thy clemency to spare;
That zeal, in which no thought of self had part,
But thy lov'd Country fill'd up all thy heart.
That conscious worth, from pride, from meanness free,
And manners mild as guileless infancy.
The scorn of worldly wealth; the thirst of fame
Unquenchable; the blush of generous shame;
And bounty's genial flow, and friendship's holy flame."

The same language might, he thought, apply to both those illustrious characters. He had thus stated what were his sincere opinions upon this important question; and in the honest discharge of his conscientious duty, to the interest of the Company, and to the character of the noble individual concerned, he would give his vote for the original motion. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Pattison hoped for the patient attention of the court while he delivered a few observations on this subject, which he considered of the first importance. He might have chosen an early period in the debate to deliver his sentiments, but he did not wish to do so until he had heard what might be said on the subject. It was not his intention to enter into any lengthened details on this occasion, for he was persuaded that the gentlemen present had already devoted a large portion of their time to its mature consideration. He wished to put the case on what he conceived to be its right footing; but before he proceeded to the general question, he was anxious to say a few words in defence of himself. Few indeed, they should be, as he felt conscious that any thing he could offer on a subject so insignificant must possess a very trifling interest when contrasted with the general importance of this momentous subject. He had been accused of inconsistency from more than one quarter, on account of his having signed the letter of 1821. An hon. proprietor (Mr. Poynder) who had made the charge, stated, that after signing the letter of 1821, he (Mr. Pattison) had brought forward a motion for granting to the Marquess of Hastings five thousand a year. Now, he would state, with respect to the mode of printing that letter, he was not fairly dealt with, as his name alone was signed to it, with the addition of an &c. &c. He acquitted any persons of having intended so to frame it as that it should appear his and his only, but certainly it went forth to the public, appearing more as his than it ought to have done. He was not in the chair at the time; he was only in the deputy chair. The chair was then filled by a most worthy and excellent person, now no more, Sir Thomas Reid. When the letter of 1820 was written, Sir T. Reid was in the deputy chair, and was consequently a party to that letter, and when he came to the chair, in 1821, he (Sir T. Reid) gave directions for the drawing up the letter of that year, consonantly with the letter of the previous year; but in the year 1820, he (Mr. P) was out of the direction and bore no part in the business. Indeed he now rejoiced at that circumstance, for there was one paragraph in that letter of 1820, which he never could have approved; he referred to page seven, paragraph 12, and he begged to remark, that that letter was in answer to five paragraphs containing the whole of the information which the Court of Directors then possessed on the subject. That was to be found in the first page; and he would not trouble the court by

by reading it; but it was in effect, that a licence was given dispensing with the act 37th of Geo. III. in favour of W. Palmer and Co.; not a word was said depreciating the character of that house; it merely stated that they were the persons to whom the licence was granted. Well, the Court of Directors took notice of this licence, and expressed great displeasure at its having been granted. From that expression of the court's opinion he did not now dissent, and had he been a member of the Court of Directors at that time, he would have given it his full and entire concurrence; for he stood not there as the advocate of any man, but as the advocate of truth and justice, and what appeared to him to be the best interest of the East India Company. (Hear, hear!) At that time Messrs. Palmer and Co. enjoyed a most high and well deserved reputation in India. In support of this statement he would appeal to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russel) who had been Resident at Hyderabad, or to any other gentleman who had means of information on the subject. But what was done by the court on that occasion? An order was sent out for rescinding the licence. It was peremptory, and on no account was its execution to be delayed. This, he admitted, was right, though perhaps a little precipitate; yet he confessed that the principle on which it went was a just one, and had he been a director at the time, it would have met with his sanction. There was, however, one paragraph, to which he could not have given his consent. It was the 12th paragraph, and was to be found in page 7th. It stated: "We think it necessary to add, that if any discussion arises between the house of Palmer and Co. and the Nizam respecting any pecuniary transactions that have taken place between them, you are prohibited from lending your name, authority, or good offices of any kind, in furtherance of any demand made by the firm." He was not in the Direction then, and had no right to comment upon this; but it did appear to him that this proceeding was severe, nay, unjust, because the individuals thus denounced, had not been criminated, but stood as clear and as fair before the court as any person then present. (Hear, hear!) Now the first objection that he had to the amendment was, that it called on the Court of Proprietors to sanction that very injustice. The subsequent letter of 1821 he found in train when he came into the Direction, and he did not interfere, as he found this paragraph, to which he must ever object, was followed up by some others, which spread a healing mercy over the whole. One of the paragraphs contained these words:—

"We had not contemplated the possibility of your having committed our government to the support of engagements between the house and the Nizam's government, either to an indefinite period, or for a term of years; and we now feel ourselves placed in the painful dilemma of being obliged to tolerate the exercise of an influence on your part, which for more substantial reasons we would wish to restrain, or of peremptorily ordering you immediately to desist from the exercise of that influence at the risk of ruin to a commercial establishment which we should be sorry to injure, and of reproach to the good faith of your supreme government which we are most desirous to uphold."

This paragraph almost reconciled him to the whole letter, as a merciful spirit was allowed to prevail. So in the next paragraph it was said:—

"You are to give peremptory notice to the firm of Messrs. William Palmer and Co. to bring it forthwith to a termination, by ceasing to make any further monthly advances for the payment of the troops, and by closing the accounts and delivering up the tankhas, as soon as they shall have reimbursed the sums previously advanced. In issuing this instruction, it is by no means our intention to injure the credit of the house; and unless it shall be made clearly to appear to you that it would produce such an effect, we desire that, in the event of their disobeying your injunction, you will direct your Advocate-General to institute a criminal prosecution under the act of the 37 Geo. III. cap. 142, sec. 28, against such of the parties as may be amenable to its enactments." So that even if they were found contumacious, it was not intended that any criminal information should be laid against them, it, by such measures, there was a risk of their being driven to destruction. He could assure the court that the paragraphs of 1821, in passing through his hands, had been considerably modified, as he thought that they threw blame on the government of India, in terms of harshness and severity, for matters which were not sufficiently known. He found that his opinion of para. 12 of the letter of 1820, was the same as that of the government to which it was addressed, and he begged to read to the court an extract from the opinion of Mr. Stuart, who was then a member of the council. He said (in page 69),

"Messrs. Palmer and Co. have uniformly declared that they could not venture to engage with a government like that of Hyderabad, unless assured of the countenance and support of the British government. In approving the arrangements proposed by the house, accompanied by such a declaration, this government has pledged itself to sanction the required support: the instruction, therefore, which I have cited from the court's letter, could not reasonably or equitably be enforced without relieving the house from its engagements with the the Nizam's government. The minute of Mr. Adam agreed on the subject of the orders sent out with that of Mr. Stuart. It stated,

"I am sensible, at the same time, that after the sanction was given by the government to the transactions of the house of William Palmer and Co. with the government of the Nizam, those orders could not have been carried into complete effect consistently with good faith, unless the house were to be secured against the consequences of the act."

A similar opinion was expressed by Mr. Fendall, in his minute, of the letter of 1821, which was answered by the Governor-General in 1822, and the several charges which it contained were, in his opinion, most satisfactorily rebutted. It was clearly explained why the record of the examination of Sir W. Ruinbold was not sent home, because there were no minutes taken of the same. This letter furnished distinct explanation with respect to the Aurungabad arrangement; and he had not yet heard a single objection to it: it had been most deservedly praised by all who alluded to it—by all who knew of its importance. That arrangement stood upon a rock, and every opposition to it must be futile; he did not think indeed that it could be found fault with in any quarter. Every body, who knew what an army was, must admit, not merely the extremely bad policy, but the great danger of having troops ill paid and ill fed. The ruinous effects of such neglect of an armed force, had more than once been felt in India, and indeed were to be dreaded every where. But if they sought to blame the arrangement by which so many dangers were avoided, let them, he would say, only contrast its effects with the state of things which subsequently existed when the arrangement was put an end to, and which had been described by Sir C. Metcalf, who stated, "that a portion of the troops had been for five months without receiving any pay, and that, in some instances, the recruits had fainted in the ranks for want of wholesome sustenance." In page 114, it would be seen that Lord Hastings had satisfactorily answered another charge which he (Mr. Pattison) was sorry to say formed part of what had been termed his draft. In paragraph 36, which is noticed by Lord Hastings, it is said, "the arrangement for the payment of the troops in Berar, did not take place till near the end of April, 1818. It could not, therefore, materially conduce to the success of the war which was drawing to a close." He did not deny the having agreed to the paragraph which the noble Lord then quoted. He was one of the persons by whom it was signed. He repeated he was not in the chair at the time; he then filled the situation of deputy chairman; but if he had held the former situation, he should not consider his responsibility the greater. The person who filled the chair was in general more prominent in the acts of the court than any other member; but the responsibility for those acts did not rest with him alone; they were the acts of the court, and it was unfair to shift them from the whole body to the shoulders of particular individuals.

With reference to that passage, in paragraph 36, Lord Hastings says, "The then real state of the war is justly assumed from any letters to the hon. court, dated about that period." But what individual in India other than myself, could at that time entertain such a confidence? No one but the Commander-in-chief had the means of exerting over every part of the immense theatre of operations, the views requisite for calculating a sure and speedy issue. It has escaped notice that I was distant from Hyderabad at least 800 miles by the nearest route; not only without any regular or secure communication, but with bodies of the enemy actually intervening. The prospects under which I reposed could not, under any circumstances, have been prudently explained. The motive against imparting them was insuperable, when the consequence might be a premature relaxation of those efforts south of the Nerbudda, the continuance of which was a main ingredient in my computation. At the very juncture when the provision of pay for the advanced troops is indicated as superfluous, the Paishwah was moving with his army between the Taaty and the Nerbudda, in the dominion of the former prince and in the vicinity of the troops in question." Why, if this was the case, and there was no doubt that the statement was correct, there was no need of "holding up a finger," to induce the Nizam's troops to revolt: they would themselves have gone over to the enemy, if some arrangements had not been made by which their pay was secured. It was well known that these troops were the most faithful in India, except, perhaps, those of Mysore; but still it would have been a great risk to have brought that force, in a discontented state, into the vicinity of an enterprising enemy. In another part of his letter, the noble Marquess alluded to the charge now made against him, with somewhat of a prophetic spirit. He says, "The charge indeed of a favour shown to the house of William Palmer and Co., which would, according to the description, have been grossly dishonest, is made to sweep over every transaction." The noble Lord seemed to think that his character was assailed by such a supposition, and he then entered into a detail of all the transactions, from the first establishment of the house at Hyderabad, down to the date of his letter. He believed that every body who knew the noble Marquess would give him credit for not having any thing hypocritical in his character, and consequently that he would not apply the terms "grossly ly disabled" to an act of which he knew himself to have been in any degree guilty. The noble Lord then went on to the other part of the transactions; and he stated that a direct interference with the government of the Nizam, so as to control his minister in his operations, would have been contrary to the law of the land. But he had attempted no such interference. It was from a feeling that the noble Marquess had given a satisfactory answer that he (Mr. Pattison) concurred in the motion before the court, and in doing so, he did not conceive himself to be guilty of any inconsistency with the course which he had adopted in the year 1821. That letter called for further explanations; and for what could such a demand have been made, except with a view to throw more light on the subject on which information had been required? If it were inconsistent to change one's opinion, after having got fresh information, it was an inconsistency of which any man who was disposed to arrive at the truth might be guilty, and from an inconsistency of that kind he did not claim exemption. But it was said that he had proposed in the Court of Directors a grant of £5000. a year to the noble Marquess. That was not the fact. the proposition came from one whom they all venerated for his age, respected for his abilities, and loved for the virtues and kindness of his heart—he meant the lion. William Elphinstone. (Hear, hear!) It was true he (Mr. Pattison) did vote in support of that motion. He felt himself bound in justice to adopt that course; and, should the proposition be ever renewed, either here or elsewhere, he would support it, if his were the only hand in the court held up for it. (Hear!) He voted for it for the best of all reasons, because he thought the noble Marquess fully deserved it. (Hear, hear!) Several gentlemen had been called to order, and, he thought, incorrectly, while speaking on this particular point. Now he considered it quite relevant; in fact, it hung to the question before the court. He begged pardon for occupying the court so long with what was merely personal to himself, but he felt it necessary after the allusions which had been made to him in that court and elsewhere. The newspapers, which took so much notice of their proceedings, had commented upon the opinions which he had felt it his duty to express, and if he had been the inconsistent man which some hon. proprietors seemed to think, it would not have escaped notice in those quarters. By the way, he saw before him an hon. proprietor (Mr. Washborough) whose speech the court had heard with so much attention, and who, as he was connected with a newspaper, would, he hoped, give a correct report of his own remarks in support of the amendment, and he was persuaded would do equal justice to the other side of the question. The court would bear in mind (and it was a very important circumstance) that the political letter so much talked of was sent out to India in November 1821, and that in May 1822, the Court of Directors came to an unanimous vote of thanks to the Marquess of Hastings, for the able and distinguished manner in which he had discharged the duties of his high station; and, at the same time, expressed their regret that family circumstances should have obliged him to relinquish his government. In that vote he (Mr. Pattison) concurred, and if there were any inconsistency in his conduct in doing so, he was glad to find that he erred in such very good company. (Hear, hear!) One of the newspapers, the Times, alluding to his (Mr. Pattison's) opinion of the Marquess of Hastings' government, had said, that he (Mr. P.) had showed himself no true prophet in one part of his protest. It mentioned the Burmese war, as evidence that the noble Marquess had not left India in entire peace, and had asked him (Mr. Pattison) what did he think of that war? He would answer, that the existence of that war did not in any degree disprove the statement he then made. He did not know whether he was right in his geography, but he believed that the other side of the Bramaputra river was out of India Proper, and to India Proper he had confined his observation. But the court, he trusted, would recollect that the noble Marquess had got them out of a similar scrape with the Burmese on a former occasion. That distinguished person did not feel that he was bound to seize by the horns every mad bull which he might see ready to attack him. He conceived it to be more prudent if he could get him away by holding up a red handkerchief, or any other similar measure. He would now come to the question before the court. By the terms of the amendment it seemed admitted, indeed it was admitted on all hands, that the noble Marquess was a man of the most honourable mind, and one hon. proprietor had said that his greatest weakness arose from his virtues. Now he thought that the various and important operations in which the noble Marquess had been engaged, sufficiently showed that he was a man of the greatest capacity, and not likely to be affected by any weakness of mind. An hon. proprietor (Mr. Freshfield) had said that he was guilty of partiality; but after first pursuing the observation, that the noble Marquess was free from corruption, and that his integrity was unimpeached, he (Mr. Pattison) would come to the amendment. Here, however, he must notice a statement of the hon. Chairman, which he did not consider a correct representation of what took place elsewhere. The hon. Chairman was asked, whether the amendment was his own, or that of the Court of Directors? and he answered that it was his, but if there had been a little more time it would have been that of the Court of Directors. Now this he conceived not to be a fair representation of the fact, as there were many members of the court who disapproved of it; and it was not spoken of in terms of praise except by the Chairman and the Deputy. If the hon. Chairman had simply said that it was his own, it would have been perfectly just; but it was not quite fair to insinuate that it would have been adopted by the Court of Directors if a little more time had been allowed (Hear, hear!). Now, if a man had been charged with being dishonest, and had been, as it were, on his trial for eleven months, and if, in the course of the discussion, it had been agreed upon all hands, that his character was unimpeached and free from any stain of corruption, he could not see for what purpose that discussion should be protracted, nor for what cause this amendment should have been introduced, except to make confusion worse confounded. (Hear, hear!) He really could not see any other object; and he must state, that if it were carried it would be one of the most discrepant productions that he had ever heard of. It began by introducing the noble Marquess as one who was to be declared free from corruption; and then came an acquittal of the other members of government, who were not accused. He would ask, was it necessary that Mr. Adam, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Bailey, Mr. Ludall, Mr. Edmonstone, Mr. Seton, Mr. Dowdeswell, and Sir E. Puget, should also be recorded as honourable men? They were "all honourable men." He did not use the word in the satirical way in which it was used by the poet. No—he believed they really were men of high character and honour. But he did not see the necessity of this grouping them for the purpose of declaring what nobody denied, that they were "honourable and estimable characters." And if it was considered necessary to put together a number of highly respectable individuals, who had little or nothing to do with the immediate question, they might as well add the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Mayor of London, and they would then have a very goodly company. (Hear, hear, and a laugh!)

Mr. Stuart, when his name was mentioned, rose, and was about to address the court, when

Mr. Pattison said, that it would be better for the hon. member, unless he was about to speak to order, to wait until he had done. He himself acknowledged he had often a disposition to interrupt, but he had seen the inconvenience of the practice, and had, therefore, abandoned it. The hon. Director then continued.—Inquiries were made and answered with respect to these transactions in India; and, in the course of the investigation, no imputation was cast upon the conduct of the noble Marquess. But in the amendment, now before them, the court were called upon to approve of all that the Court of Directors had written. He cautioned gentlemen as to what they were about to do, in approving all those matters, and all the proceedings which were founded upon them. If they agreed to the amendment, they must approve the overstrained eulogies on Sir C. Metcalf, and they must adopt the overstrained slanders of that gentleman, for so he should call them. (Hear, hear!) What he particularly objected to in this amendment was, that it called on the Court of Proprietors to do that which was wholly out of their province; namely, to approve of the letters of the Court of Directors. These had been already approved by the highest authority;—by the Commissioners for the affairs of India. This was what he greatly objected to, as establishing a very bad precedent. Perhaps the court were not aware, that appeals had already arrived in this country against the whole of these proceedings, from Mr. William Palmer and Sir William Rumbold, who had both been crushed by them. There were also appeals from others on the same subject,—from the creditors of the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., who, though not absolutely or technically outlawed, were still debarred from regaining the moneys they had lent, while they, thus pursuing the course of justice to mankind, were paying all those to whom they were indebted. Would a British public sanction such a violation of justice? Would the Court of Proprietors, who were themselves a court of appeal, say that one side was right, and having heard the statement from that side, refuse to listen to any other? British justice revolted at such an idea. (Hear, hear!) If he were in any doubt as to the course which he should pursue on this occasion, he had an example before him, by which, on every occasion, he could be most safely guided. He had heard the opinions of an hon. gentleman, of the highest rank and greatest moral worth at that side of Temple-bar. (Mr. J. Smith). There was no man in society whose character stood more deservedly high, and whom he more respected. He had known him from his boyhood, and his respect for him had every day increased by his increased knowledge of his worth. That hon. gentleman had declared, that he fully concurred in the original motion, but that he could not listen to the amendment.—He then, after all he had heard and read on this important question, gave his assent to the motion, because it declared Lord Hastings to be an honest man; but he objected to the amendment, ment, because it implied doubts. (Hear, hear!) He now came to the charge of partiality, though, after what had been already said, any thing further upon that subject was almost a waste of time.—The partiality was said to have been evinced in four different instances: first, in permitting the establishment of the house of Palmer and Co., at Hyderabad; secondly, in granting the license in 1816; thirdly, in the sanction given to the Aurungabad arrangement; and, fourthly, in sanctioning the sixty lac loan. With respect to the Aurungabad arrangement, it was one to which he (Mr. Pattison) gave his entire concurrence, whether he viewed it in its object, or in the excellent effects which it had produced. As to the granting the license, he would fully admit, as a general principle, that such a course should be adopted with great caution, and only under very peculiar circumstances. It was not to be denied, that very serious consequences might ensue from granting to British subjects the privilege of making loans to the native powers in India; but was the Marquess of Hastings the only man who had concurred in this arrangement? He was assisted in council by three most intelligent men; they had been a long time in India, and were particularly acquainted with all the details of Indian affairs. The noble Marquess was new in the country; he had been only two years there; but the court had never heard a word implying any non-concurrence of the three members of Council in what was done on this occasion. Was he (the noble Marquess) to be singled out of the council, and solely blamed as guilty of partiality in an act in which they had all concurred? Were all the other members to go harmless, while he alone was to be blamed?

A Proprietor.—Decidedly not.

Mr. Pattison. Then, he hoped, that if Lord Hastings was to have his share, the other members might be presented each with his own portion of the cake. (Hear, hear, and a laugh!) As to the sixty lac loan, the court should recollect, that it had been strongly recommended by the Resident at Hyderabad, at that time, who had forcibly impressed on the Governor in Council, the absolute necessity of supplying the immediate wants of the Nizam's government. But it was objected, that the terms for the contract of this loan were exorbitantly high, and that the loan might have been obtained at a much lower rate. Really some gentlemen seemed to think, that the Nizam's country was like an El Dorado, where money was so plenty, that it might be had for the mere asking. They who knew India, however, were fully aware of the difficulty of procuring money for the use of the native powers. An hon. member (Mr. Washborough) had alluded to what Lord Hastings had said as to his connexion with Sir William Rambold, who had married his ward; but he had not referred to the minutes of Council on that point, to which he (Mr. Pattison) now begged leave to refer the court. He alluded particularly to the minute of Mr. Stuart, an extract of which he would read. It was to be found in page 47 of the printed papers:—"Even to the illustrious character and high station of the Governor-General, the avowal of such an interest can be only honourable. Next to the highest objects of power, the good of our country and of mankind, the opportunities which it affords of promoting the welfare of those endeared to us by friendship and affection, will be deemed by generous minds, the fairest reward of its toil and anxiety. How forcibly such ties must be felt by his Lordship, will be understood by all those who know the kindness and benignity of his nature. How much gratification I shall always derive from being able to concur in his Lordship's indulgence of that kind feeling; how much mortified I must be, when motives of duty may constrain me to deny myself that happiness, I hope I need not profess. The sentiment is due, no less to his Lordship's exalted station in government, than to the kind and liberal disposition which he invariably manifests, to meet claims of a similar nature on the part of the other members. But, whatever may be the difference of views upon the present case, there is one point upon which I venture to submit a confident opinion. I do not hesitate to pronounce, that his Lordship is the only person who can think that his friendship for a gentleman, whose interests are involved in the question, constitutes the slightest grounds for his withdrawing from the determination." The fact then was, that this alleged partiality of the noble Lord, was nothing more than an expression of interest in the welfare of a man, whose wife was his ward, whom he had brought up from her childhood. (Hear, hear!)

The hon. proprietor had mentioned one part of the subject, on which he had laid particular stress. Of course, he did not blame the hon. proprietor for noticing it, although he unquestionably objected to the view which he had taken of it. He seemed to think that the sixty lac loan was got up, and the license granted for it, specially to serve the house of Palmer and Co. But sure he (Mr. Pattison) was, that a nobleman, holding the elevated station of the Marquess of Hastings, would never risk his high honour, his illustrious character, by assenting to any such proceeding. Sir C. Metcalf himself spoke in very favourable terms of the loan at first, and continued to speak not unfavourably of it, until the unfortunate conspiracy which that hon. gentleman imputed to have been set on foot, to remove him from office, so soon as it was found that Palmer and Co. interfered in denouncing the acts of that "bold dog-gon," whom the gallant officer (Mr. Doyle) had described, in overturning the arrangements of the minister, Chundoo Loll. From that hour, and from that date, the most marked hostility was manifested towards the house of Palmer and Co. (Hear!) Now, so far as regarded Lord Hastings, he would endeavour to shew, and that endeavour, he was sure, would be successful, that his conduct throughout the whole affair, had been most correct. In page 186 of the papers, they would find a letter, addressed by Lord Hastings to Sir C. Metcalf, then Resident at Hyderabad, on this subject, dated Sept. 13, 1822. It appeared that his Lordship, so soon as he knew of the bonus and payments to Mr. Wm. Palmer and others caused a very severe letter to be written respecting the transaction; not so severe, perhaps, as some of their (the court's) letters, but of marked and pointed severity in regard to the object which he had in view. Did that look like partiality or collusion? The noble Marquess himself immediately called for an explanation of this contract; and all the discussion which took place afterwards, had relation only to it. If Palmer and Co. and Chundoo Loll had conspired together, if they had cheated, if they had committed frauds, (he put the matter hypothetically), it was quite clear that they must have so acted; without the knowledge, nay, without the suspicion, of the noble Marquess, who left Calcutta before the explanation offered had been duly considered. The curtain may be said to have dropped as far as he was concerned in this part of the subject. The question of the loan must be considered separately and distinctly; and, in his opinion, it would be well to get rid of that subject, to do justice to the undisputed merits of the noble Marquess, and to declare the firm intention of the court to take up the question of the Hyderabad loan, on its own specific grounds. (Hear, hear!) He would now call the attention of the court to another curious circumstance; but, in doing so, he meant not, in the slightest degree, to reflect on the character of Sir C. Metcalf. It appeared, by Sir C. Metcalf's letter of the 5th of April 1821, par. 20, page 196 of the papers, that he had, between that period and the perusing of a former despatch, discovered that a bonus had been granted: before that, it seemed, the circumstance was not known; and it appeared, that he found it admitted on the accounts which had been delivered. Why, then, should a charge of concealment be made? Here was no concealment. The house of Palmer and Co. supplied their own fair documents: and what did Sir C. Metcalf do? He began boldly by proposing to the supreme government to pay off this loan—aye, even to pay Messrs. Palmer and Co. their whole bonus; and he felt no hesitation in proposing to give them an additional bonus of six lacs of rupees, by four annual payments of a lac and a half each. (Hear!) He knew, he observed, that this would be satisfactory to all parties, and would be a fair gain to Messrs. Palmer and Co. (Hear!) In the answer of Messrs. Palmer and Co., p. 198, they express their readiness to enter into any arrangement which the Resident might propose. The bonus which had been stipulated for, was, it seemed, to be paid off, and even an additional advantage, to the amount of six lacs of rupees, was to be allowed. (Hear!) Much had been said about the high rate of interest; but, as had been well observed, interest was entirely relative. The best judges of this subject (amongst whom were Sir C. Forbes and the late Resident, Mr. Russell) had placed it in the clearest point of view. They had shewn, that money could only be raised on favourable or unfavourable terms, according to the peculiar circumstances of the party borrowing. The value of money must be decided by the nature of the security offered by the borrower, or the portion of risk which the lender incurred. Now, he should be glad to know, who would lend money, at an ordinary rate of interest, to a man situated as Chundoo Loll was; to the prime minister of an absolute prince, knowing that the death of the minister, the death of the sovereign, or the alteration of his government, would be fatal to the contract? In the event also of the death of the lender, his family could reap no benefit from the terms of the loan; and why? because the sovereign, in that case, became his heir. (Hear!) He (Mr. Pattison) would much rather lay out his money in the right hon. Fred. Robinson's Exchequer bills, bearing a sure interest of 2d. or 2½d. per cent. per diem. (Hear!) It was better assuredly to have a moderate, but certain interest, rather than hazard your money on a mere pay or play proceeding, connected with many circumstances which might defeat your object, and which, in the event of your death, might consign your family to want. Let the court look at the bonus. It would appear, at first sight, a very large gift; and, he thought, it would have been wiser, if the house had made it known to the Resident, though not bound to do so by any engagement. They would have shewn much more worldly wisdom, if they had taken that course. But, after all, what was this bonus which had been so often referred to, ad captandum vulgus? It appeared that the minister wanted to raise sixty lacs of rupees, in some way or other, and a given rate of interest was proposed. Palmer and Co., from the state of the money-market, found that they could not procure advances advantage to that amount at 18 per cent., and it was agreed that they should lend 52 lacs of rupees, still receiving an interest of 18 per cent. on the nominal 60 lacs, which was equal to 20½ on 52 lacs. When these 52 lacs were paid, and not till then, a bonus of eight lacs was to be allowed. Now, gentlemen must recollect many instances of bonuses being allowed in this country. He believed it must be in the recollection of many gentlemen, who had not the misfortune of being so old as he was, that, in the course of the late war, loans had been raised by Mr. Pitt, in the 3 per cents., at 46 and 47 per cent., which were now paying back at 94 per cent. What was the bonus here? It was 115 per cent. Let them look at the Mexican loan negotiated the other day by Mr. Goldsmidt. He took it at 86 per £100, at 6 per cent. interest; but he had good security for his money. And what did Mr. Goldsmidt then do? Why, before he sent that loan into the market, he placed upon it a premium of 3 per cent., and put the difference in his pocket; instead of 86, he sold it at 89, thus netting 3 per cent. Here, certainly, was something to put in his pocket; but these gentlemen, Messrs. Palmer and Co., actually received nothing. Now, suppose the public had come forward, and said to the original contractors for the loans which occurred in the time of Mr. Pitt:—"Gentlemen, we will be very much obliged to you, if you will let us participate in the immense profits you are now realizing—let us divide this 53 or this 115 per cent. between us:" would it not have been deemed a most extraordinary request? The fact was, that, at the time, government were glad to get money at any rate; and those transactions had more of an usurious character than the transactions of Palmer and Co. Yet, surely, they never heard any person accuse Mr. Baring or Mr. Angerstein, with having embarked in usurious speculations. The real fact was, that some persons thought the rate of interest was exorbitant, without having sufficiently considered the circumstances. The loan was so long in contemplation, that a rise naturally took place in the money-market. The native bankers, aware of the circumstances in which the house was placed, turned round on them, and exacted heavy interest. In this state of things, the minister agreed to the bonus of eight lacs of rupees; a sum which, if the justice of that court did not interfere, they never would receive. (Hear!) This plan of a bonus was resorted to, because the terms of the original loan were found to be exceedingly hard. In this there was nothing unfair or unusual. It must be recollected, that one of the most distinguished men in this country, who had contracted to advance money for the payment of debts due by the French government—he meant Mr. A. Baring—finding that he had made an improvident bargain, was anxious to have the terms altered; and, if Lord Castlereagh had not very much amended the terms of that loan, with respect to the periods appointed for its payment, Mr. Baring would have been ruined. Lord Castlereagh, however, held out his hand, and saved that individual: and the transaction went forward and was completed. Would any one call Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Baring conspirators on that account? (Hear!) Again, Mr. Angerstein had a contract with Mr. Pitt, some thirty years ago, for an advance of money, on the principle of a lontine. For the only time in his life, he believed, Mr. Angerstein made a bad bargain. He saw his error, and immediately went to Mr. Pitt, to whom he explained the situation in which he was placed. The matter was at once set to rights. The lontine was abandoned and another mode of raising the money was adopted. Was this a conspiracy between Mr. Pitt and Mr. Angerstein? Was it not a fair and equitable proceeding? (Hear!) In this case the tide of the money-market ran against Messrs. Palmer and Co.; and the consequence was, that this bonus was allowed. Individuals in India, well acquainted with money transactions in that country, did not consider this a proceeding which deserved all the censure that had been cast upon it. Mr. J. Palmer told Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. throughout, that it was "a bad job, and he would have nothing to do with it." He looked farther than those gentlemen; they had, in truth, been dupes all through. (Hear!) And in what had they been most grossly duped? They had been most grossly duped by that confidence which they had placed in the assurance of protection and countenance, which had been, in the outset, held out to them. (Hear, hear!) It was supposed that a very large extent of protection was promised to them in the commencement of their transactions. But what were the words of the Governor-Gen., as contained in Mr. Adam's letter, of the 22d of April, 1814, in answer to the application of Messrs. Palmer and Co. to establish a mercantile firm at Hyderabad? They were these—"His Lordship in Council will, accordingly, approve of your (Mr. Russell's) affording every proper degree of countenance to the proposed commercial establishment of Messrs. Palmer and Co., consistently with the provisions of the treaty." All these gentlemen stipulated for was only to be protected against fraud; little expecting fraud from the quarter where they hoped for countenance and protection.—(Hear, hear!)—After having received such a promise, the parties interested had been most cruelly dealt with. (Hear!) A great great deal had been said to prove that no money was advanced on this transaction—that it was, in reality, nothing more than a fictitious loan. (Hear!) Now, any person who understood the very first rule of Cocker (addition) had nothing to do but to cast his eye over this book (the Hyderabad papers), from page 620 to page 625, and he would find that large sums of money had been actually paid. From the month of February to the month of August, 1820, no less than forty lacs of rupees had been advanced to the minister by that house. (Hear, hear!) His question was, had they advanced that money at all? He believed they had advanced it; and he believed further, that no person could reasonably doubt the fact. (Hear!) What other construction could be put on their accounts? And, if they had advanced this money—if, by doing so, they had placed their affairs in such an embarrassed situation, as made it necessary for them to seek the support and sanction of Government to get their property back again, why should they not do so? It was really little better than actual ignorance to assert, that they had not made these advances. He could not help thinking, that Sir C. Metcalf had conducted himself, to say the least of it, in a very extraordinary manner. He was not much in the habit of supposing, that gentlemen of education were capable of perverting the truth; and, therefore, he believed that Sir C. Metcalf was labouring under some extraordinary mental aberration. (A laugh.) The advances of money were proved to have been made for “beneficial purposes;” and, if the minister, after he had received the money, used it improperly, converted it to the accomplishment of any object not originally contemplated, the minister alone was to blame—it was impossible to censure the house, with justice, for such a diversion of the funds supplied. (Hear!) Some of Sir C. Metcalf’s letters respecting the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co. and their proceedings, were so extraordinary, that he would not be doing justice to the subject unless he noticed them. In page 244 and 245 of the printed papers might be seen the nature of the impressions (and truly they were very strange ones) on which Sir C. Metcalf founded his assertions relative to the influence of the house. The statements occurred in the despatch of Sir Charles to the secretary of govt., of the 30th of Sept. 1822. In paragraph 76. Sir C. Metcalf states—“I do not mean to accuse Messrs. Palmer and Co. of making an unfair use of their power; they may exercise it, perhaps, with great moderation; but it is a power which does not properly belong to merchants, and ought not to be entrusted to persons who have only their own interests to regard.” In paragraph 77, he goes on to say—“The notion of their having a strong influence in the British government is not confined to Rajah Chundoo Loll, and the belief of the exertion of that influence in his favour, is very prevalent. It is a common report that he is persuaded by them that he holds his place by their protection.” Here they had that very satisfactory authority “common report;” but he believed that many persons were of opinion, that common fame was, very often at least, “a common liar.” In paragraph 78, Sir C. Metcalf says—“A native gentleman, who pretends to have access to the privacy of Rajah Chundoo Loll’s house, has informed me, spontaneously, positively, and repeatedly, that he had heard Mr. W. Palmer declare to Rajah Chundoo Loll, that I should have accomplished his (the minister’s) removal, if they (Messrs. W. Palmer and Co.) had not written to Calcutta, and prevented it. I mention this as a rascall.” “As a proof of what?” asked Mr. Pattison. “As a proof of the existence of this prevalent notion.” Sir C. Metcalf had here, step by step, conjured up the idea of a notion into a state of actual existence. (Hear!) “The poet’s eye” appeared, upon this occasion, “to be in a fine phrenzy rolling.” He “gave to airy nothings, a local habitation and a name.” How he could so suddenly conjure this mere notion into a state of active existence, Sir C. Metcalf could best explain. But let gentlemen mark what followed in the self-same paragraph; “I am not,” continued Sir C. Metcalf, “inclined to believe the story, though I know not what good the gentleman could have proposed to himself in the invention. (Hear!)—Still I am not disposed to credit it, because I would not pin my faith to the assertion of any native gentleman, and find it difficult to credit that Mr. W. Palmer would so commit himself.” If he were not inclined to believe the story, why did he promulgate it? (Hear!) How could any person read, without laughter, such gross balderdash as this? (Hear!) In paragraph 79, Sir C. Metcalf proceeds to say—“That the minister is persuaded of their (Messrs. Palmer and Co.) having influence, and of its operating in his favour, I have no doubt; but I am inclined to suppose, that they must allow their native agents to work that impression, and cannot themselves directly hazard such unfounded assertions; but that they are willing to take advantage of the impression, I must infer—(Hear, hear!)—from all that passes under my observation.” In several succeeding paragraphs, Sir C. Metcalf expressed himself thus—“I was once informed, that, on my first arrival, Bunketty Doss, the native partner of the house of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., had given out, that I had been appointed Resident on the recommendation of Mr. W. Palmer.” “Another native gentleman,” (one of those persons whom Sir Charles had just described as not being worthy of belief) belief)—asked me, one day, whether the Nizam's government had not formerly a Vackeel in Calcutta? I answered in the affirmative. He then asked whether there was any there now? I replied that I rather thought not. He next added, that it was reported that Sir William Rumbold acted as agent for the Nizam's government with the British government." "Another native gentleman, who was so kind as to patronize my welfare, gravely advised me, after some trepidation in bringing forth his counsel, to procure a letter in my favour from his highness the Nizam to his Excellency the Governor-General; suggesting that it might be useful to counteract some design, on the part of other persons, which he would scarcely venture to hint at." "The unfortunate nephew of Ulmud Buksh Khan, Neeaz Behadar Khan, who was killed in the late disturbance, asked me," (I suppose, said Mr. Pattison, before he was killed,) "whether the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co. was established here, on the part of the Company? and on my answering in the negative, expressed his wonder at their power and influence, adding, that it had reached its present pitch since the junction of Sir W. Rumbold, and had been on a different footing before." "But the common people" (excellent authority, truly!) "were, throughout the country, of opinion that the house is identified with the British government; and the revenues which are poured into their coffers are considered as so much tribute to our treasury." "I have some time found difficulty in persuading strangers, that Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. do not actually govern a great portion of the Nizam's dominions. Such is the notion to which their manifest influence, and the large assignments possessed by them on the revenues, have, not uncommonly, given rise. I believe, that, in this respect, they exercised formerly a more direct influence than now. I have understood that, heretofore, they were more in the habit of recommending the nomination of the officers of government in the provinces. I do not know that they exercise this privilege at present; it has not at least forced itself on my notice." "In describing circumstances, as related to me, respecting the supposed influence of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., I beg that I may not be understood as relying much on the truth of such relations; they must always be received with caution." (Aye, said Mr. Pattison, and ought to be published with caution, which they were not.) "But, as I do not go in search of them," (indeed!) "and as they force themselves on me from various quarters, they certainly assist in producing the conviction which I entertain"—(it appeared, then, that Sir C. Metcalf entertained a conviction, the production of which was mainly assisted by relations, on the truth of which he did not much rely!)

—and have expressed on this subject. Some reports I suppress, as unfit to be mentioned, without proof of their veracity;" (and where was the proof of the veracity of the unsuppressed reports?) (Hear!) "and other circumstances I pass by as being personal, or too trivial for a grave report; though, nevertheless, characteristic of what I have attempted to describe." Was it possible (continued Mr. Pattison,) that such rubbish as this, such hearsays, and reports, and rumours, could be approved of by that court? (Hear!) By the amendment now before them, they were called upon to confirm the praise which the Court of Directors had bestowed on Sir C. Metcalf. These were the details of Sir C. Metcalf's proceedings; and irksome as was the task, he would read extracts from some other letters of Sir C. Metcalf, craving the patience of the court; for, upon his honour, he was ashamed of detaining them so long with the perusal of such trash, and he certainly would not do so, but he felt it necessary for the due understanding of the case. In page 356, Sir C. Metcalf, in his despatch to the Secretary of Government, writes thus—"As far as pledging myself to the assertion, that persons officially attached to the residency, and, from the circumstance, necessarily conferring influence, have been engaged with the concern now known by the designation of W. Palmer and Co., either as partners, or as deriving extraordinary benefit from the connection, I can have no hesitation, because such information is necessary to expose a part of the impositions practised by Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., who, originally I believe, derived their principal influence from that source, and had always the support of that connection, until they obtained the more powerful patronage of the supreme government; and, even afterwards, clung to a hold on the residency, as having advantages prospective as well as actual, until inquiries on the subject, or other circumstances, rendered an ostensible separation necessary." Sir Charles went on to say—"I hope that this general assurance will be sufficient, and that I shall not be required to bring forward the names of the gentlemen of the residency, who were connected with that establishment. To do this I feel the greatest reluctance. One gentleman is in India to answer for himself; but, even with regard to him, a public disclosure would be painful to me. Others are far away, and would have no opportunity of justifying or explaining their connection with the firm; while, in their absence, a stigma against them would appear on the public records. Nevertheless, if it be considered indispensably necessary that this information should be furnished, I must, of course, sacrifice every other consideration to duty and obedience." Such was Sir C. Metcalf's introduction to the naming of certain persons, which followed a little afterwards.

afterwards. He now came to the letter of Sir C. Metcalf, of the 8th of March, 1823, in which he so reluctantly divulged the names of the individuals whom he supposed to be connected with the house of Palmer and Co. In paragraph 8th, he observed—

"From the situation of the building in which the concerns of that partnership were conducted, it is evident it must have enjoyed the Resident's support and patronage. It is also understood, and there is, I fear, no doubt of the fact, that Mr. Russell, the Resident, was further connected with it, and derived profit from its transactions. Whether he shared profit and risk with the others as a partner, or received an extraordinary interest for money deposited in their hands, I am not able positively to state. It is possible that his connexion with them may not have gone beyond having his money with them at an ordinary rate of interest, and some of his most intimate friends seem to entertain this persuasion; but from all that I have heard on the subject, the impression on my mind amounts to a conviction (this, observed Mr. Pattison, appeared to be a favourite word), that he must have derived extraordinary profit from their transactions, and that his connexion with them was such as gave them a hold on him ever afterwards.—(Hear, hear!) There is, nevertheless, a possibility that I may be mistaken in this conclusion, which it is the more necessary to notice, as Mr. Russell is not present to offer any explanation."—(Hear, hear!)

He would not trouble the court with many more extracts from this document, at present; he would skip over much matter, by which it was sought to implicate Mr. Russell in the affairs of the house of Palmer and Co.; and he would at once proceed to Sir C. Metcalf's conclusion, so far as it regarded that gentleman. After having advanced much criminatory matter, on mere assertion, he proceeded to observe:

"I suppose Mr. Henry Russell has been induced to connect himself with Messrs. Palmer and Co. solely by the temptation of realizing a fortune more rapidly than by ordinary means, without any intention of supporting that house in any improper transactions. With respect to the latter arrangements, which had Mr. Russell's recommendation and support, I conceive him to be totally free from any pecuniary interest in those transactions; and though I think it probable, that, without the previous connexion, those arrangements might not have obtained his recommendation, it is still very possible that he may have inclined to think them advantageous for the Nizam's government. There is no proof that he had any knowledge of the bonus, the most objectionable part of the pretended sixty lac loan; and he may have considered the reduction of interest, even to 18 per cent., as a considerable benefit."

Having said this, Sir C. Metcalf proceeded to use the language of compliment towards Mr. Russell. He (Mr. Pattison) could not anticipate that that gentleman would feel very grateful to Sir C. Metcalf for his extraordinary kindness. Having first cast suspicion on him, he, in the end, endeavoured to set all right, by adopting the language of praise. "I trust (said Sir C. Metcalf) that it will not be forgotten, that Mr. Russell has rendered eminent services at the Nizam's court; that he confirmed our political influence, so as that it stood the test of a most trying crisis; and that when the two great neighbouring states fell off from their alliance, and became our enemies, the resources of the Nizam's country supplied our armies, and the troops of this state co-operated effectively and efficiently with our own, in various important services during the war. These effects may justly be ascribed to Mr. Russell's management, as far as individual agents are ever entitled to such credit; for the disposition to throw off our yoke was supposed to exist here as well as elsewhere, and the Indian world could scarcely believe that the Nizam was not to form a part of the coalition against us."—(Hear, hear!) In par. 23 of the same despatch, he alludes, very distinctly, to the fact, that individuals connected with the residency, at the head of which he was, were in the habit of transacting business with the house of Palmer and Co. After having attacked all those who were attached to former residents, for dealings with the house of Palmer and Co., he ultimately acknowledged that the gentlemen of his own residency were carrying on dealings with Palmer and Co. as well as the rest. "I am not aware, and do not suppose (said Sir C. Metcalf), that any gentleman attached to the present Residency either is or has been a partner in the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., or has derived any extraordinary benefit from the connexion. The numerous European constituents of the house generally receive 12 per cent. interest for their money, and the gentlemen attached to the present residency have both received and paid this, as the ordinary interest in account current, considering these dealings to be as unobjectionable as ordinary dealings with any other house of agency. Under the same notion I have never thought it incumbent on me to object to them." Sir C. Metcalf, it appeared, did not think it necessary to go into any very minute inquiry on this point. He did not seek to inform himself whether these gentlemen had or had not taken advantage of their situation, as being connected with the government. No—they were his own creatures, and he did not feel inclined to molest them.

But, if there were one paragraph in that large book, more wicked or more slanderous than another, it was par. 26, page 466, and was as follows:—

"I am bound to acknowledge, that, since the termination of that (the Aurangabad) contract, the troops have been ill paid, and, in some instances, reduced to great distress, of which I have only lately received intelligence."—Let the Court now mark the conclusion of the paragraph:—

"Yet this I attribute to culpable neglect, if not to a conspiring design on the part of the minister, and not to any necessity:—and I am also satisfied, that, with similar neglect, or counteraction, the troops would not have been more regularly paid, under the continuance of that contract; for, before its termination, Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. twice stopped payment, in consequence of a temporary delay on the part of government."

What did Sir C. Metcalf mean here? Did he not mean to assert, that this minister,—the minister of an independent sovereign, under our influence,—was wicked enough to keep back the pay of the troops, to the extent of starving them? And for what purpose was this asserted? Why, to run down the house of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. What did he mean by a conspiring design? It was an accusation levelled at the minister and Palmer and Co. He defied any man to conceive, or to say, any thing more wicked than this.—(Hear!) He had read these paragraphs, in the hope (he trusted a well-founded one), that they would impress the Court with the feeling, that it would not be wise to approve of an amendment, which sanctioned all that had been done by Sir C. Metcalf; the more especially as there were appeals pending in this country against the conduct which had been pursued towards the house of Palmer and Co. If the Proprietors stood aloof, and said nothing—if they declared that they would give no judgment in this case—then Palmer and Co. had another tribunal to appeal to, and they might yet hope to obtain justice. But, if they decided, if they gave it as their opinion, pendente lite, that Sir C. Metcalf was right—then they became parties to what he had done; they became parties to acts of signal injustice, and the whole weight of their opinion would be cast into the scale against the interests of those who were seeking redress. Now, observed the hon. director, I should be very sorry to see our 'worthy and approv'd good masters' plunged into any such scrape! You are very well as you are, and you will remain in a neutral situation if you are wise. Let the matter be decided fairly—let the transactions of the house of Palmer and Co. remain to be canvassed—let us see whether, on examination, Sir C. Metcalf's position be right or wrong. Sir C. Metcalf asserted that the loan was fictitious. Now he (Mr. Pattison) would pledge his credit, aye, and the credit of others who understood figures well, that this assertion was erroneous. If the Proprietors approved of this amendment, there was an end of the matter. Hitherto the business had been going backwards and forwards like a shuttlecock. From Calcutta it was sent here, and from this country it was echoed back to Calcutta. Messrs. Palmer and Co. had now formally appealed—he was sure the honourable men who must decide their cause would do them justice,—and, in his view of the case, it was by no means desirable to get rid of those appeals, by a summary and premature decision in that court. He, therefore, strongly deprecated such a proceeding. If it could be possible—if the hon. Chairman, who had moved this amendment in his capacity as a proprietor, could be induced to withdraw his proposition, which involved consequences that he conceived the court would not wish to precipitate, it would be a most gratifying circumstance. Surely, it would be an unjust thing to decide on this momentous question before they knew the whole bearing of the case—before the appeals of the complaining parties were even read. For the honour of the East-India Company, for the honour of the members constituting this court; he should feel very little pain, if, after due inquiry, he were himself found to be in the wrong. It might be considered a romantic feeling, but certainly it was a sincere one. He did what he conceived to be his duty, when he tendered his protest; but, he declared, such was his regard for the executive body, whose respectability and consistency he would maintain and uphold at every hazard, that if, in the end, he appeared to be wrong, and they turned out to be right, it would give him pleasure instead of dissatisfaction. He did not wish, however, to involve innocent persons, for so they appeared to him to be, in the ruinous consequences of a hasty vote: even if this amendment were carried, the matter could not possibly stop here. It must go before a higher tribunal; but it would go there under the disadvantage arising from the decision of this court. He called on the proprietors not to act contrary to the first and greatest principle of human justice—Audi alteram partem! At present they had heard but one party, and, if they decided, it must be on the statement of that party alone. (Hear!) He wished that the conciliatory suggestion of an hon. proprietor (Captain Maxfield) could be adopted, and that this discussion might be brought to a conclusion by modifying the motion, and getting rid of the amendment for the present. If this were done, it would leave the question of the transactions of the house of Palmer and Co. perfectly open to discussion hereafter. He thought it would be the height of human wisdom and of human justice to adopt that course. He had been obliged, on a mature view of the subject, to advocate this course of proceeding.

ing. The original motion contained the direct and clear expression of a belief that Lord Hastings was an honest, an honourable man. He thought so too; and he did not see the necessity of going beyond that proposition. It was for the court to consider the exceeding importance of what they were now doing. If the amendment succeeded, which he would say, in the strongest and most emphatic language, "God forbid," the Court went to the extent of throwing doubts on the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings. (No, no.) What were they about to do? On a mere suspicion of favouritism, they were about to censure one of the most able and dignified Governors-General that ever administered the Company's affairs. He said, on a suspicion of favouritism, for the whole of the charge seemed to be reduced to that. No one had ventured to insinuate, much less to say, that the Marquess of Hastings had incidentally, or otherwise, received the slightest benefit from these transactions. But, because he had the misfortune to accede to the request of Sir W. Rumbold to join the firm, which it was evident from these papers he did reluctantly, because he so acceded, and because in the progress of business, the party whom he supported became involved in transactions of a doubtful nature, was it, he demanded, on that account, that they were to stigmatize the character of a man, who had rendered the Company as distinguished services as any individual had ever done? (Hear, hear!) The Marquess of Hastings was not a character of yesterday. Nearly half a century had now elapsed, since he signalized himself fighting the battles of his country in America, as Lord Rawdon. (Hear, hear!) The noble achievements of the Marquess of Hastings, from a very early period of his youth to the present hour, would go down to history, and would receive from posterity the meed of admiration which was due to them. (Hear.) The noble Marquess had been accused (for an accusation it certainly was) of too great liberality—of a total disregard of wealth—of a carelessness about pecuniary concerns. This, however, was always the case with lofty natures, who looked to future fame, whilst natures of a less exalted kind, sought after present profit. Would that court, he asked, at the end of the noble Marquess's life, nine years of which had been devoted to the Company's service, with a zeal never surpassed, and with a degree of success, except in the case of Lord Clive, not any thing like equalled—would they, the proprietors of East-India stock, when, in the decline of his days, the noble Marquess was pursued and persecuted by slander, inflict upon him another pang, by proclaiming to the world, that on this occasion they had come to a qualified vote? (Hear!) He had received a letter from the noble Marquess, a few days ago, which he would read to the court. But before he did so, he must observe that the noble Marquess was no personal friend of his; and he begged leave to state, that he had no connexion with the noble Lord. He was a plain citizen, and he could not say, "that he knew lords, or that lords knew him." He had entered into a communication with the noble Marquess in consequence of his being in the chair in 1817-18, when thanks were voted to the noble Marquess. In the progress of all those extensive measures that were connected with the Pindarree, Mahratta, and Nepaul wars, the noble Marquess had also occasionally been made acquainted with his sentiments. The letter in question was dated Malta, Jan. 11, 1825, and ran thus:—"You dissuade me from repairing to England," (for, said Mr. Pattison, the noble Marquess wrote to me that he was coming to England, for he could not endure the situation in which he was placed) "till it shall have been seen how the court means to proceed." (I read this letter, said Mr. Pattison, who appeared to be very much affected, from the hope, because I still do hope, that the court will do this great man justice.) "It was not" (continued his lordship) "my intention to undertake that voyage, till that point should have been ascertained; for I could not present myself in London but to make war, and the necessity would be painfully repugnant to my wish. I have only one consolation in looking forward to the contingency, namely that the previous discussion will probably shew such a distinction of parties in the court...." It was too much the fashion to produce confidential letters; but he hoped what he had done on this occasion, would not be viewed as an improper act. (Hear!) He very much feared, that, if the court did not come to a judicious decision on this question, it would involve them in very great difficulties. In his opinion, it would be likely to lead to a discussion and decision in Parliament, a circumstance which ought, if possible, to be avoided. (Hear!) He stood forward, firmly impressed with the high character and splendid services of the noble Marquess. The whole of his political actions were recorded by the court, and were admired by his country; and, considering every circumstance connected with the administration of the Marquess of Hastings, he thought it was sound wisdom to stand by him to the extent here required, instead of shewing an ungrateful disposition, by cavilling at mere trifles. (Hear!) Consider how long and how well the noble Marquess had served the Company, and let not his treatment be similar to that which a great man, whose statue now adorned that court, court, had experienced. Warren Hastings had undergone a persecution which lasted ten years. He was assailed by all the talent, eloquence, and power of the country. The minister of that day gave way to the opponents of Mr. Hastings; the consequence was, that he had to endure a trial which lasted for the long period of ten years. But he triumphed at last.

was a maxim, the truth of which could not be shaken. Truth, though obscured for a time, must ever prevail in the end; and Warren Hastings, after his ten years of persecution, not on the part of his "good masters," but assailed by party or faction, was acquitted by the British public. That public, by whom his actions had been carefully scanned, at length rewarded his virtues and his sufferings with their testimony of his innocence. Why should individuals, in this instance, act upon a system of cavilling, and talking upon vague beliefs of partiality, when not a single overt-act could be proved, even by his learned friend the lawyer? (Mr. Impey) (A laugh). There was not any thing like an overt-act to be found; and it would be a want of magnanimity in that court, if they did not pass over such contemptible trifles as had been introduced, when the character and fame of an illustrious individual, who had toiled zealously and successfully in their service, were at stake.

(Hear, hear!)

Mr. Poynder.—As the hon. director has thought proper to call on me, by name, to explain on what account I ventured to charge him with inconsistency, I feel it due to the hon. director, to myself, and to both the Court of Directors and Proprietors, to state, as shortly as possible, the terms of the document which led me to come to that conclusion. (Cries of question.) I shall refer him to his own letter, which will, I think, support my assertion. (Cries of question.)

The Chairman.—As the hon. proprietor wishes to explain, I think he ought to be heard.

Mr. Impey.—I trust the hon. proprietor will make a distinction between an explanation and a new speech. (Hear!)

Mr. Poynder.—The hon. director has made a personal attack upon me, and in return, I wish to offer proof that my position is correct. It was the hon. director's impression, that I had charged him unduly and untruly, with inconsistency. (Cries of adjourn and question.) Sir, in one of the despatches (that of Nov. 28, 1821) the hon. directors, and amongst them Mr. Pattison, stated what I have before brought to the notice of the court. They say, "In truth you have in substance, if not in form, lent the Company's credit in the late pecuniary transactions at Hyderabad, not indeed for the benefit of the Nizam's government, but for the sole benefit of Messrs. Palmer and Co." (Loud cries of No, no, adjourn, and question.) This, Sir, is the language of the Court of Directors, addressing the noble Marquess. And they state further,—“You have not guaranteed to the house the fulfilment of the engagements entered into with it by the Nizam's government, but the house has received the support of the British government, and it expects that the influence of that government will be employed to secure satisfaction of its just demand upon the government of the Nizam. Without this countenance and support, Messrs. Palmer and Co. declared that they never would have established an extensive mercantile concern (much less entered into large pecuniary dealings with the government) in a country where there are no regular courts of judicature. With this countenance and support, they not only themselves feel secure, but they are placed in circumstances which enable them to secure a combination of the native monied interest.” In another passage, the directors say, “that the apology offered by the noble Marquess is the language, not of a responsible, but of an irresponsible government. It is not an exercise of the licence of acting without instructions, and reporting the proceedings for the information and sanction of the authorities at home; it is the assertion, by your government, of a power to act, without the obligation to communicate to any superior authority the means of judging of your acts; and, consequently, the assertion of a power to elude all check and control. It is not an assumption of discretionary power, on the part of the local government, to suspend the execution of instructions from home; it amounts to the assumption of a power to do what you please, and to communicate to us just so much of what you have done, as you may see fit.” (Cries of question.)

Now, Sir, I do conceive this to be as condemnatory as caustic, and as criminatory a letter, as any one that appeared through the whole course of these proceedings.

Mr. Pattison.—I do conceive that the learned gentleman is not entitled to go into a fresh examination of these documents. He has had his time,—I have had mine, and I thank the proprietors for their indulgence. (Hear!)

The Chairman.—I hope the hon. proprietor will confine himself to explanation.

Mr. Poynder.—If I had not been interrupted, I should have been done long since. The hon. director has stated, that I said he proposed a grant of £5000 a year to the noble Marquess. I did not say so; but I assuredly stated, that he supported a proposition of that nature. How he could have done so, after that letter, the hon. director director best knows. It appears to me and others, to have been a most extraordinary proceeding. (Question, question!)

Mr. Pattison.—If the learned gentleman is allowed to make another attack on me, I hope I shall be permitted to repel it.

The Chairman.—I hope it will be thought, that enough has now been said on this subject. (Hear!)

Mr. Stephen (the Master in Chancery) said, he would not have risen, on this occasion, if he did not feel it was necessary, in justice to himself, in justice to the Marquess of Hastings, and in justice to the high names which were connected with this discussion, to state his reasons, if, unfortunately, this amendment should be put, for voting against it. If he had understood that it would be proper or necessary for him to give his opinion on such topics as had been alluded to, in reference to the character of the noble Marquess on this occasion, (as, he thought, he would prematurely do, if he voted for the amendment), he would not have appeared in the court this day; because he could not do justice to those subjects, not having read those voluminous papers. Public duties, in another place, had prevented him from making himself master of those documents; and, therefore, he was not competent to form an accurate notion on the disputed topics. It, however, was not disputed, that the noble Marquess's conduct stood unimpeachable, with reference to any dishonourable or selfish act—with respect to any thing unbecoming the high character which he had so long maintained. (Hear!) Finding, then, that the noble Marquess stood before them without a charge, and, indeed, without an accuser, he felt it was competent for him to come down to the court, and to do that which justice to the noble Marquess imperatively required. (Hear!) Now, he confessed, that, in his opinion, it would not be doing justice to the noble Marquess; it would not be acceptable to his feelings, nor to the feelings of any honest man, if approbation were voted to him, in connection with the present amendment. (Hear!) Not that he meant to contend, that the substance of that amendment was wrong: far from it. He knew not, if it were brought forward as a separate motion, but that it would receive his support. Here, however, he conceived it to be misplaced. The original motion appeared to be correct. It was admitted to be so by general consent. No person had endeavoured to invalidate the statement it embraced. The amendment might be right; but, sure he was, it would be wrong, if voted at this moment; and, if for no other reason, for the strong reason which the hon. Director (Mr. Pattison) had assigned; namely, that it would operate prejudicially to the case of those who had appealed against the proceedings of the Indian government. (Hear!) He (Mr. Stephen) was a professional man, an humble dispenser of public justice; and he must say, that, to agree to the amendment would be to create a prejudice against those parties; it would be virtually pronouncing against the characters of other persons. (Hear!) He thought also, that it would, in fact, be doing injustice to the honourable names that were implicated in the proceedings of Government, and more especially to Mr. Adam, whose name had been particularly mentioned. That gentleman he had not an opportunity of knowing; but, if he had not a clear mind, and a sound heart, he was very unlike the stock from which he had descended. (Hear, hear!) He (Mr. Stephen) had been on terms of intimacy with his father for fifty years, and a better man he had never met with in society. (Hear!) He was not prepared to say, that Mr. Adam had acted improperly, neither had he heard it asserted. From the information which had been laid before the public on this important question, it would appear, to use Mr. Adam's own words, that he only stood forward on the ground of public principle, without any private bias whatever. (Hear!) In the opinion promulgated by Mr. Adam, the Court of Directors had concurred; and, it appeared to him, that his character could not suffer from investigation of the fullest and most extended description. (Hear!) He, therefore, thought it would be an act of injustice to Mr. Adam, if this vote of approbation were sanctioned, without inquiry. (Hear!) The despatch of Nov. 1821, certainly contained a very severe reproof of the Marquess of Hastings, and also a very severe impeachment of the character of other persons; and he thought it would be contrary to the first principles of justice, if the court precipitately approved of those accusations, instead of examining first, and, if the case called for it, expressing their satisfaction afterwards. He meant to say little more, because many points on which he would have offered his sentiments, had been very fully and fairly stated by the hon. director who had spoken last. (Hear!) The only part of that hon. director's speech, of which he did not approve, was, where he made some remarks, with reference to a new proprietor, (Mr. Wasbrough) who had this day stated his opinions. The hon. director had alluded to that gentleman's private avocations, as if those avocations had any thing to do with the expression of his opinions, as a proprietor of East-India stock. (Hear!) It was said, that he was the editor of a public print; and he (Mr. Stephen) thought it right, when the observation was made, to express his dissent against it. The hon. director seemed to think, that the hon. proprietor meant to report the speech which he (the hon. Proprietor) had delivered. He would only say, that, if the report were equal to the speech, it would be in no wise discreditable to the hon. Proprietor, (Hear!) though he differed from him with respect to his general feelings on the subject, since the object of the hon. Proprietor was to vote for this amendment, against which he should certainly hold up his hand. (Hear!) What the hon. Director had said, as to the injustice of prejudging claims, which were in a train of investigation, demanded serious attention. If they shut out the facts on which the accused individuals rested their defence, of what value would be the praise which they were now called on to bestow? Would they not take away the credit, the grace, the beauty, of the acquittal (as it was called) of the Marquess of Hastings, if other matters, bearing on the conduct of different individuals, censuring some and praising others, were appended to it? (Hear!) Such a proceeding would, in the idea of every gentleman, take away all the grace and value of the resolution. It would be better to pay no tribute to the character of the noble Marquess: it would be better to let the case stand as it at present did: it would be better, as had been suggested, to give up the original question, rather than to vote such an amendment. (Hear!) It would be worse than doing nothing to agree to such a proposition. Was it not, in common acceptance, considered a matter of reproach, when individuals, being called on to do justice, mixed up extraneous matter, unnecessarily coupled something else, with that which should have stood alone? (Hear!) Suppose a lady's character were at stake, and let it be observed, the character of an honourable man, — the character of a soldier — was as delicate as that of a lady (Hear!) — suppose an individual, in such a case, were called on to give an opinion of the lady's conduct; what would be the consequence, if the person appealed to, answered, "I believe she is a woman of character, of honour, and of virtue; but (these *but*s were always very significant) I think, that, in a variety of instances, her conduct has been very imprudent and indiscreet?" Would not such a statement have the effect of fixing a censure on the individual accused? For his own part, he was not fond of those eulogies, which contained a but or a nevertheless; (Hear!) he did not like to see doubtful matter coupled with that which was plain and distinct. (Hear!) He was moderate in his opinion, and therefore could not go the length which the amendment proposed. He could not but observe, that, in the course of this debate, a quantity of the most objectionable matter had been introduced; matter which the Court of Directors had made the subject of severe animadversion, and on which they had founded their reproof of the Governor-General. He really believed, if the task were to be performed again, the Court of Directors would not act as they had done, because, as it appeared to him, they had proceeded on an imperfect view of the case; (Hear!) therefore, they were liable either to do too little or too much: perhaps if they were again called on to express their opinion, they would go further, though he was inclined to suppose that they would stop far short of what they had before done. It was, however, quite clear, that what was done on an imperfect view of the case, was not fit for the adoption of the proprietors, considering the perfect view which they now had of the proceedings. (Hear!) He would leave out all the censure which was contained in these despatches, believing as he did, that there was nothing improper in the conduct of these parties. Such was his undisguised belief: but if there were cause for suspicion, then he would say, it was their duty to investigate the subject, before they sanctioned a condemnatory resolution. (Hear!) The question could not be decided in that court; it could not be set at rest by the voice of the Directors and Proprietors: it must be heard before other tribunals. (Hear!) He had not had an opportunity of going over those reams of paper which were sent to him as his instructions on this question, but he was decidedly of opinion, that the court would not agree to this amendment without hearing the opposite side. Palmer and Co. had not been heard; Sir W. Rumbold had not been heard; neither had their creditors been heard: could they then decide on an ex-parte statement? Could they say such and such transactions were wrong, without hearing both sides? He certainly thought they ought not to proceed in this manner; and if he had any interest with his honourable friend the Chairman, or with those who supported the amendment to the original proposition, he would suggest that that amendment should be withdrawn, and that the court should vote on that resolution, to the truth of which the Proprietors, on every side of the court, bore testimony. (Hear, hear!) This speech was followed by loud cries of "adjourn!" and "question!"

Mr. S. Dixon. — Is there any reason to hope that the amendment will be withdrawn? (No, no!) If not, then I move the question of adjournment.

Sir C. Forbes seconded the motion.

Sir G. A. Robinson rose amidst confused cries of "Chair, order, adjourn!" He begged to state that he had a right to speak to the question of adjournment: he perfectly admitted, that in having seconded the amendment, he might, in some degree, be said to have already spoken; but in rising at the present moment, he did not mean to claim any indulgence from the court with respect to the delivery of his sentiments on the general subject. It was not his intention, having been already heard, though briefly, on the question, to trouble the court further with it at present: if he possessed the right, he should perhaps exercise it on a future occasion; certainly he should not go into the question at that late hour. "What I chiefly rose for" (continued the hon. Bart.) "was, to notice that since we were last assembled here, a pamphlet has gone forth to the public, which I have had the opportunity of reading only within a very short time; and I wish, in common courtesy, to be permitted to put a question to the hon. proprietor (Mr. D. Kinnaird) who is the avowed author of that production. I only want to ask him the question for the purpose of explanation. Would he would do me the favour of informing me, whether, in the paragraph I am about to refer to, I am the individual pointed out? It is of course not an official paper to which I allude, and therefore is not amongst the printed documents. In page 97, speaking of a member of council, as having expressed some opinions unfavourable to the character of Mr. Russell, the author goes on to say, 'It is possible that the same gentleman who thought proper to spread his injurious and unfounded suspicions regarding Mr. Russell, about Calcutta, may have thought himself equally justified in communicating them to his correspondents at home. It is matter of universal report, that Mr. Stuart was in the habit of corresponding with a leading and most influential Director of the time, who had been openly hostile to Lord Hastings' original appointment, and to the policy his Lordship was known to pursue.' As I was, at that time, the Chairman of this Company, perhaps this passage may allude to me. If the hon. gentleman will do me the favour to say whether I am the person here pointed at or not, I shall esteem it a very great favour."

The hon. D. Kinnaird, as we understood, said, if he had alluded to the hon. Director, he would have named him.

Sir G. A. Robinson. As that is the case, the observation which I meant to have made with respect to the latter part of that paragraph, is rendered unnecessary.

The Chairman was proceeding to address the Court, when Sir C. Forbes rose. He did not wish to interrupt the hon. Chairman, but he begged to remind him that there was a call of the House of Commons this evening, and it was necessary, that both he and the hon. Chairman should attend.

The Chairman. "I have been for many years a member of the House of Commons, and I do not entertain any doubt on the point to which the hon. Bart. has directed my attention. Before the Court adjourns, I hope the proprietors will do me the honour to hear me. I do not wish to enter into the question at large, though, on the motion for adjournment, I conceive I have a right to do so. But after the personal allusion which has been made to me by the hon. Director, (Mr. Pattison), I deem it proper to say a few words; and I think I could, if it were necessary, add to the charge of inconsistency which has already been brought against that hon. Director. I have no wish for any private difference with him; but I must state my opinion of the hon. Director's proceedings as far as they rest upon public grounds. As he questions my observation, in reply to the hon. Bart. (Sir J. Doyle) 'that the amendment was, or if time had permitted, would have been the motion of the Court of Directors'—a position which he did not seem to allow, I must, for the purpose of explanation, go a little more into our secrets than I was disposed to do. (Hear, hear! intermingled with cries of "chair," and "adjourn!") The court will not I am sure obey the call for adjournment while I am on my legs. The motion which we are now met to consider, and which I believe we have now discussed for the fourth time, was followed up on the first day by the present amendment; and I considered that such a proposition was necessary for the ends of justice, after the requisition which had been sent in by certain proprietors: so desirous however was the hon. Director, who had described himself as most anxious to be a peace-maker, that the original motion should be carried without discussion, that on the 9th of February he took the course of moving, in the Court of Directors, a resolution to the effect, 'that the Chairman be requested to make known to the general court, as soon as possible, after the motion of the hon. D. Kinnaird shall have been made and seconded, that it is not the intention of the Court of Directors to offer any opposition thereto.' This was on the 9th of February; considerable debate ensued on the proposition; but so little support did it receive, that the hon. Director and the seconder of the same were desirous of withdrawing it; and the court, unwilling to take any advantage of the parties, suffered the motion to be withdrawn. The courage of the hon. Director, however, became greater on the 11th of February; and when the clock was almost striking, and we were about to attend the general court, then assembled, the same, or almost the same motion was again proposed. There were twenty-two Directors present, of which number seven only supported the proposition. I had, at that moment, the amendment in my hand, and had read it for information sake; and I not fairly, therefore, warranted in inferring, that, if time had admitted, and I had proposed it to the Court of Directors, it would have received their support, and been adopted as the amendment proposed by the Court of Directors? (Counter cries of "Yes, yes!" and "No, no!") The result will prove, when the question now before us comes to the vote, who is right in his assertion, and who is wrong. I never ventured to state that it was the amendment of the Court of Directors; but from the proceedings to which I have alluded, I contend that I am justified in thinking, that if the amendment had been formally proposed to the Court of Directors, it would have been acceded to by them. Before the court breaks up I would say a word to a learned gentleman (Mr. Stephen), who spoke at a distance from the bar. The hon. gentleman, who is himself a learned judge, comes down and tells us that he has not read the papers, but is, nevertheless, of opinion that nothing therein contained affects the personal character or integrity of the Marquess of Hastings. (Loud cries of "adjourn," and "spoke!") I am speaking to the question of adjournment, and I request not to be interrupted. (Hear!) I cannot but express my utter astonishment at the speech of the learned gentleman: he calls upon the court to pursue his advice, at the same time that he declares that he has not read the papers which have given rise to these proceedings. The learned gentleman has called upon us to suspend our judgment upon the court's despatches until some future day, when he promises to attend the court, to give us the benefit of his opinion; but, perhaps, at that time he will no more have read the papers than he has at the present moment. The learned gentleman says, "this case is pendente lite, and you are called on to approve of despatches by which it will be prejudged." I must declare my opinion that it is no such thing. Mr. Palmer, it is true, has sent to the Court of Directors a copy of the appeal, or memorial, which he has addressed to the Bengal government. (Much confusion—cries of "question!" "chair!" "adjourn!")

Sir C. Forbes rose amidst the call of "Order."

The Chairman.—I hope the hon. Bart. will suffer me to proceed. I have a word or two to say to him also before I have done. (A laugh.)

Mr. S. Dism.—I am anxious that my motion for adjournment should be put; but I should be ashamed of myself if I did not give an opportunity to any gentleman whose opinion is called in question, to explain himself before I press it.

Sir C. Forbes.—Sir, I rose with very great reluctance; but I did conceive, and I believe the court generally felt as I did, that you were deviating from the purpose to which, in the beginning, it was understood you would confine yourself. If we are to proceed with the general question, the hon. director who preceded you, is in possession of the court.

The Chairman.—It is not for me to decide; but, I believe, with some information on these points, that, on the question of adjournment, it is competent for any gentleman to observe on the whole subject. The hon. baronet surely ought not to be so impatient. Five times did he promise to sit down, but almost as many hours did he continue to speak, by St. Dunstan's clock. (Laughter.) I say, that we are not deciding pendente lite. The last of the despatches, which the amendment calls upon us to approve, is dated the 21st of Jan. 1824, and it is only within two months that Mr. Palmer has sent to the Court of Directors the copy of his memorial to the Bengal Government. (Hon. D. Kinnaird, "In vain!") It may, or it may not, be in vain; because, the Bengal Government have not yet stated their view of the case, and we cannot properly decide till their opinion is known. Sir W. Rumbold is in London, and has addressed a letter to the Court of Directors, to whom alone it is competent to take up this subject. Whatever is proper to be done, gentlemen may rest assured will be done; but let it not be supposed, that, by proceeding in the present course, we are shutting the door against substantial justice. The hon. baronet, (Sir C. Forbes) like the learned gent. (Mr. Stephen), has gone much farther than he ought to have done. He, also, has told us that he has not read the papers; but he has given us the reason: "My mind," says he, "is completely made up." And why? "Because I have received information from Sir W. Rumbold himself." In other words, the hon. baronet appeals to those whose conduct is affected by the question at issue; and, certainly, I for one, will not decide the subject on such authority. (Hear!)

Mr. Stephen, in explanation, said, that he had not come to discuss a question, the papers connected with which he had not read. In the outset he had distinctly stated this; and he had farther observed, to set himself right with respect to the vote he was about to give, that, though he could not hold up his hand for the amendment, because he had not read the papers, yet he could safely support the original question, because every person in court admitted the purity of the character of the noble Marquis, and to that extent alone did the motion go. No gentleman who had spoken in the course of the debate, had expressed the slightest feeling against the character of the Marquis of Hastings.

The Hon. D. Kinnaird would take advantage of the question of adjournment, to repeat what had been said by the learned gent. at the head of the court (Mr. Stephen). The hon. Chairman had come to an un-conclusion, when he maintained that the original question could not be affirmed without the person voting having read all those documents. The learned gent. had taken a very just distinction. "I may," said he, "vote for a proposition which I take to be correct, as no person opposes it—but I cannot vote for an amendment which involves such a variety of considerations." He would not vote for the approval of those despatches which he had not read; but he felt that he might justly vote on the mere question, whether there was any thing in these papers that reflected on the character of the Marquess of Hastings, having heard it asserted throughout, by persons on all sides of the court, that there was not.

Mr. Freshfield said, he rose to answer the observation of the hon. gent. who had just sat down. (Question, question!) He denied the justice of the conclusion at which the hon. proprietor had arrived. If an individual had not read the papers, so as to understand the question, with what propriety could he vote against an amendment, with the foundation of which he was unacquainted?

The court, at six o'clock, adjourned till to-morrow.

East-India House, March 1.

HYDERABAD PAPERS.

A Special General Court of Proprietors of East India Stock was this day held, pursuant to adjournment, at the Company's house in Leadenhall-street, for the purpose of continuing "the consideration of the Hyderabad Papers, now before the proprietors, as far as they respect the conduct of the most noble the Marquess of Hastings, late Governor-General of India."

The minutes of the last court having been read,

The Chairman (W. Astell, Esq.) said, I have to inform the proprietors that this court is met, by adjournment, from yesterday, to consider of a motion made, and of an amendment subsequently moved thereon, relative to the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings, as connected with certain transactions detailed in the Hyderabad Papers, to which I beg your attention.

The Clerk then read the motion and amendment—for which, vide preceding debate.

Mr. Poynder wished, before the debate began, simply to request a patient hearing for every gentleman who chose to deliver his opinion on this important question. He stated this in consequence of the very disorderly scene which occurred at the close of the last day's debate. He did not say this with any personal feeling, for he had no reason to complain. He thanked the proprietors for the attention which he had received, and which far exceeded his claims or his expectations; but, on the last occasion, he was sorry to see such men as Mr. Stuart, Mr. Freshfield, and other highly respectable individuals, assailed with cries of "question," when they attempted to explain. Even the gallant general himself (Sir J. Doyle) had, on a former debate, called on an hon. proprietor to answer his arguments, and not to interrupt him. He conceived that these constant interruptions operated as an extreme difficulty and discouragement to many gentlemen who were able to afford much information to the court on this question; but, not being in the habit of addressing public assemblies, they were obliged to desist. This was the more to be lamented, because some of them had been present on the scene of action; their fears and terrors prevented them, when they saw such confusion, from addressing the court. He could not again speak on this question, therefore, what he said had reference to others, not to himself; but he trusted the evil of which he complained would be avoided in future. At the last court, even the hon. Chairman had been obliged to sit down, not being able to obtain silence. This was unseemly in a body of such dignity, and met for so important a purpose.

Mr. S. Dixon hoped, that the same measure of justice would be dealt out to one and all.

Mr. Poynder said, he meant nothing else.

Mr. Wasbrough.—"I rise to explain.—I am desirous of noticing one observation which fell from an hon. Director (Mr. Pattison) at the last court. That gentleman alluded, I believe, to my being connected with the press, and hoped I would take care to have a correct report of my speech—these, I think, were his words. It is very true that I am connected with the press; but I appear in this court merely as a proprietor of East India Stock. The learned gent., Mr. Jackson, is my neighbour; and, feeling as I ought to feel, diffident of addressing the court, after him, who, I understood, would have opened the debate yesterday, I asked him, by way of courtesy, whether he would allow me, if I attended the court, to deliver my sentiments first? He very kindly stated that he would; but he intimated that Mr. Pattison would, most probably, open the debate. I therefore spoke to the hon. Director on the subject; observing to him that I understood he was about to read the debate, and, that if he did so, I should feel myself placed in a very awkward situation, as I should not be capable of addressing the court with any degree of effect, if I rose after a gentleman so well qualified to make a great impression on the court. In consequence I was suffered to take precedence. Now, sir, before I came to this court, I laid down this rule, from which I will not deviate, that, whether I did or did not secure the attention of the court, (and I stated the fact to my respectable partner) I never would report, in any paper or pamphlet, what I said within those walls. I hope, therefore, that I may be allowed to do my duty as a proprietor of East India Stock, without any reference to my avocations elsewhere."

Mr. Daniell (in the absence of Mr. Pattison) said—From my long acquaintance with the hon. director alluded to, I am sure nothing could be more remote from his intention, than to say anything personally offensive to the hon. proprietor. (Hear!)

Mr. Washbrough.—Before I ventured to give my opinion upon this important question, it was decided by me, that whatever I said, whether it was well or ill received, should not be introduced by me into any publication. I appear in this court only as a proprietor.

Mr. Pattison (who had just entered the court) said—I am desirous of giving an explanation to the hon. proprietor; and though I have heard but half of his speech, I trust that explanation will be a full and satisfactory one. I perfectly recollect what I said on the occasion alluded to, and I can assure the hon. proprietor, that I said it with extreme good humour. (Hear!) The hon. proprietor had acknowledged that he qualified himself as a proprietor of East India Stock, to speak on this question; and I thought it was not improbable that he might intend to give his speech to the public; but, most assuredly, I meant nothing personally offensive in the observation I made; and if it has been taken in that light, I am quite ready to say, that it was not so intended. (Hear!) The hon. gentleman has come here as a proprietor of East India Stock, and, whether he be or be not the editor of a newspaper, or of any other publication, that can have nothing to do with the sentiments he may deliver in this court—(Hear!)—his observations are entitled to as much respect as as those of any other proprietor. (Hear!)

Mr. Amory then proceeded to open the debate. He would, he observed, very shortly address the court on this important question. The feeling of diffidence which he entertained on addressing the court on the present occasion, for the first time, was greatly increased, because he was obliged to avow, after an attentive consideration of the papers before it, that he differed in opinion from gentlemen on the other side of the court, for whose sentiments he felt the highest respect, and whose talents he held in the greatest estimation; particularly from an hon. Director, (Mr. Pattison) whose abilities he greatly admired; but whose speech, he must say, did not produce that impression on his mind, which the hon. Director was desirous of imprinting on the court. With respect to himself, he wished to say one word—he belonged to what the gallant general (Sir J. Doyle) looked upon, perhaps, as a proscribed class; a class against which the gallant general had been pleased to direct many animadversions; but, before entering on the question, he felt called upon to say, that he had no acquaintance, no connection, with any of the parties whose conduct was now before the court. He came to the court merely as a proprietor, and not as an advocate of any particular class of men, or of opinions: he would, in that capacity, state his sentiments as shortly as he could; and he would do so without pursuing the course which others had adopted—he meant, without reading voluminous extracts from the great mass of papers which had been submitted to the proprietors. It had been said by a gentleman of great respectability, and of great and deserved influence, for whose opinions, on all subjects, he entertained the highest respect, (he alluded to Mr. John Smith) that it was impossible for any person to view this in any other light than as an "aye" or "no" question—as a question, either affirming or taking away, the character of the noble Marquis—as a question, the plain meaning of which was, "Is the Marquis of Hastings, or is he not, an honest man?" He, however, begged to say, that he dissented from that proposition. He thought it was quite possible that the noble Marquess, after having received from that court, and from the court which was held in the other room, the highest testimonies of their approbation for his general conduct, might, nevertheless, have cause to regret, that the injudicious activity of his friends had brought forward a question like the present, which might induce unprejudiced men not to entertain so elevated a respect for him as they had formerly done. The political conduct of the noble Marquess did not, he conceived, belong to this question; and, therefore, he would omit any notice of it. He would leave that to be decided on the particular papers relative to it, which had been laid before the court; and he would confine himself strictly to the motion and amendment now under consideration. The hon. director to whom he had already alluded, said, that the motion was a clear and simple one, and that the amendment only puzzled a plain question. He could not agree to this—the original proposition, in his opinion, contained much more than a hasty perusal of it would lead an individual to suppose. It was, he thought, drawn up with the accustomed ability of the hon. mover—it was calculated to secure the sanction of gentlemen who had not looked narrowly into it, and was likely to induce them to grant that which they did not intend to concede; but which.

which, on the moment, they did not perceive. (Hear, hear!) He must be allowed to say, that the motion did not merely go to the affirmation or negation of the proposition, "whether the noble Marquess be, or be not, an honest and honourable man?"—no, it went a great deal farther—(Hear!)—it went, in substance, to this point, that nothing contained in these papers touched, in the slightest degree, on the personal character and integrity of the noble Marquess. Had the motion been confined to integrity, he would have cheerfully agreed to it—at the same time he must say, that in raising the question of personal character, those who brought forward the proposition had raised a question of very considerable difficulty, and one on which he, as a proprietor, felt very great doubts. What was personal character? Where personal character was found in perfection, it must be said, with other component parts, at least to embrace, first, prudence; secondly, caution; and thirdly, impartiality. Now, without putting it in an offensive point of view to the noble Marquess or his friends, he must observe, that on a careful perusal of these papers, it did not appear that the noble Marquis had acted, in every instance, in the transactions before the court, with becoming prudence, caution, or impartiality. He stated this fairly and openly, for he had no connexion with the noble Marquess, nor with any of the parties—he was influenced alone by a sense of justice. Now, to what point, he would ask, did the amendment go? and before he touched upon that question, he would take leave to say, that if it had been moved on this (the proprietors' side of the bar, instead of coming from behind the bar, he would have been much better pleased; (Hear, hear!) and for this reason, because he thought the court of Directors were entitled to the full extent of credit given them in that amendment; and, therefore, it would have been more becoming and excite more confidence in this court, if the approbation of their conduct had emanated from amongst the proprietors, rather than have proceeded from themselves. (Hear, hear!) In consequence of the way in which that observation was received, he would take the liberty to make one remark. He considered that the official situation which the hon. Chairman held, did not in any way incapacitate him from acting as a proprietor of East-India Stock. Though he was but a young member of that court, yet he had professionally read, on the subject of their forms, every thing that was likely to give him a clear insight into them. He had waded through all the acts of parliament, and charters, which had been passed for the formation and regulation of the Company, and he there found nothing which prevented the chairman or any other director, from adopting any course of proceeding in a court of proprietors, that might be adopted by any proprietor on his side of the bar. But to return to the amendment: it set forth, in the first part, that there was no ground for imputing to the noble Marquess any corrupt motives. In that statement he most completely agreed—he thought the noble Marquess free from them, and that his character had been well described when it was said, that he was of "too easy a temper." The idea of his being actuated by corrupt motives, received the most general contradiction. (Hear, hear!) The amendment then proceeded to give the same degree of credit to the other members of the Bengal government; and he must be allowed to observe, that, if he had drawn up that amendment, he would not have gone so far. (Hear, hear!) The amendment then went to a point, which he thought was indispensably necessary, and he would state why he thought so. It appeared to him that gentlemen had been diverted, in the heat of debate, from the main feature of the original motion; for he thought it was impossible to come to an affirmative vote on that motion, without strongly implying their censure on the gentlemen on the other side of the bar.—(Hear, hear!) That was his sincere feeling. He would go further and say—(and he said it in perfect fairness)—that, though there were some few observations in the despatches in question, which (with the information they now had before them,) would, he conceived, were those documents to be drawn up at the time, be struck out;—(Hear, hear!)—yet, as a whole, he thought they were undoubtedly called for at the period when they were sent out. Such remonstrances were necessary then, and they were necessary to be approved now, to establish and keep on foot that sort of salutary control and check, which ought always to be maintained by the Company over their governments abroad.—(Hear!)—What, then, must be the inevitable result if they agreed to this naked motion? It would raise a very important question—it would, he feared, sanction a very dangerous principle. The higher station, the greater the talents of the noble Marquess, the more dangerous did that principle appear to him; in fact, if they refused to approve of what their executive body, in the exercise of a sound discretion, had done, they would go the length of making future Governors-General, perfectly independent of the authorities at home. (Hear, hear!) He came to this conclusion, after a very calm and deliberate consideration of the question. In the course of the remarks he had made on these despatches, he had freely said, that, as a whole, he approved of them; and he had, no less freely, observed, that there were isolated parts of them, which, being now in possession of more information than the directors had when they were drawn up, he did not approve of. But, were gentlemen who applauded that sentiment prepared to say that they approved of the whole of the letters from the Marquess of Hastings to the Court of Directors, which formed a part of these papers?—(Hear, hear!) If they were, he must say, that he was not disposed to do so. (Hear!)—He observed in those letters, intemperate, vituperative, and disrespectful language, at which the court naturally, in maintenance of its own independence, must have felt displeased. He also found that the letters officially addressed to the noble Marquess, were not considered by him as the letters of the Court of Directors, as the regular despatches of the Company, but were treated as letters coming from individuals. (Hear!) In one of his letters the noble Marquess observed in effect, "that the Court of Directors had suffered themselves to be deceived and imposed on by the civil servants here." He thought such observations, to say the least of them, were wholly uncalled for, and came with a very bad grace from a man of sense, such as the noble Marquess undoubtedly was, and one so well versed in diplomatic forms. He thought, therefore, that they were bound to support the despatches of the Court of Directors, to prevent such insinuations and observations being made in future. He conceived that those despatches were, under all the circumstances, imperatively called for; and it was necessary for that court to uphold them, as tending to keep up that proper check on their foreign servants, which was absolutely and essentially requisite for the maintenance of good government. (Hear!) Having said so much, and having in the outset declared that he did not intend to quote from these papers—he would merely state why he had refrained from doing so. He had not, then, called the attention of the proprietors minutely to those documents, not because he had not carefully read them, but, first, because many other gentlemen had entered very fully into their examination; and next, because in the course of a debate it required a clearer head and greater abilities than he possessed, to bear up, with any tolerable success, against the weariness which a constant reference to papers was calculated to produce in so protracted a debate as the present; therefore, he had not gone into an examination of this mass of documents. He would now, with the permission of the court, make one other observation. As he belonged to a particular class of men, (he meant the profession of the law) he called on the hon. baronet (Sir J. Doyle) and others, who had animadverted on that class, to treat them with the same fairness, urbanity, and justice, which other parties received. (Hear!) He would say, as a professional man, that his time and the time of his brethren, was their stock in trade—(Hear!)—and if they gave up their time to this discussion, they gave up that which was as valuable to them as the time of any other gentleman who could address them. (Hear!) He objected, for one, to the idea of there being any particular restriction by which lawyers were to be debarred from discussing any subject that might be brought before the court, or any reference to the callings of individuals. (Hear!) Therefore, if he addressed the court, or if an hon. friend of his (Mr. Freshfield) whom he did not see in his place, thought proper to deliver his sentiments, he thought they were entitled to receive the same degree of attention as was extended to other hon. proprietors. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Babb commenced his speech by observing, that the hon. proprietor (hon. D. Kinnaird) had introduced his motion in a very praiseworthy manner, with great good temper, and much gentleness of demeanour, but he was sorry to say that a pamphlet which the hon. proprietor had published, and which bore on the present question, did not deserve the same complimentary notice. In that pamphlet he had reflected on the individual who was second in authority in Bengal, when Lord Hastings was Governor-General:—That individual was a highly respectable member of council, whom he had known for four or five and thirty years. When he first met him, he was a young man of fine talents, of good principles, and correct conduct; one who manifested great application in acquiring a knowledge of the oriental languages, and great application in official duty—(Hear!)—affording a presage that he would arrive at a high situation in the Company's service. (Hear!) He would now lay before the court some of the passages in the hon. proprietor's pamphlet, in which that gentleman was spoken of. In page 97 the hon. proprietor thus noticed that individual. He said, "It is possible that the same gentleman who thought proper to spread his injurious and unfounded suspicions regarding Mr. Russell about Calcutta, may have thought himself equally justified in communicating them to his correspondents at home. It is matter of universal report that Mr. Stuart was in the habit of corresponding with a leading and most influential director of the time, who had been openly hostile to Lord Hastings' original appointment, and to the policy his lordship was known to pursue. But whether Mr. Stuart did, or did not, communicate his injurious suspicions of Mr. Russell to his correspondent; or whether some person, to whom Mr. Stuart may have confided them in Calcutta, was the channel through whom they were received and adopted at the East-India House, it is to the writer of these remarks as clear as the sun at noon day, that these unworthy calumnies had been communicated, had there received a ready belief, and were the real foundation of the foregoing letter." That was (continued Mr. Bebb) the letter of the Court of Directors of the 24th of May 1820, to the government of Bengal, directing them to withdraw the licence from the house of Palmer and Co. immediately. The paragraph proceeded: "The belief in the foul conspiracy slanderously alleged to have been formed between Lord Hastings, Mr. Russell, and the house of Palmer and Co., will alone account for the tone and the terms and the orders of the despatch in question; no other theory can render it intelligible. The circumstantial evidence in this, as in most cases, is of a nature that convinces more fully than any direct proof. Can an intelligible explanation be given of it in any other manner?"—Here (continued Mr. Bebb) Mr. Russell was spoken of as having been slandered, and Mr. Stuart was the person pointed out as the propagator of the slander. He (Mr. Bebb) did not take to himself the character of "a leading and most influential director of the time." He did not deserve such a description. An hon. bart. (Sir G. A. Robinson) who spoke yesterday, thought that he was the person meant, and he (Mr. Bebb) was of the same opinion; for the hon. bart's name was the first affixed to the letter withdrawing the licence of Palmer and Co. He (Mr. Bebb) in the face of the court included himself amongst the correspondents of Mr. Stuart. He had corresponded with him for many years before the Marquess of Hastings went out to India, and consequently for many years before he became a member of council; and he could not let this opportunity pass without stating, in the most unqualified, distinct, and unequivocal manner, without any mental reservation, that Mr. Stuart never did, in any letter, addressed to him (Mr. Bebb) state, or insinuate, or in any way imply, or intimate, that Mr. Russell was a partner in the house of Palmer and Co. He would go further, and state, that Mr. Stuart corresponded with another hon. director (Mr. Davis) now no more. He never saw Mr. Stuart's letters to Mr. Davis, but he had often had conversations with him about Mr. Stuart, and he would solemnly declare, that Mr. Davis never intimated that Mr. Stuart had, at any time, made such representations to him. (Hear!) And certainly to him (Mr. Bebb) any intimation of the nature alluded to, had never been thrown out by Mr. Stuart.—(Hear!)—He hoped therefore, that as far as the voice of one individual went, the court would clear Mr. Stuart from the severe imputation which the hon. proprietor had advanced against him in print.—(Hear!)

With respect to the late Resident at Hyderabad, who had addressed the court, some days ago, with so much energy, and who had made such an impression on the proprietors, with reference to that individual, he would say a few words. He (Mr. Bebb) never did hear that he was a partner in the house of Palmer and Co. until he saw it mentioned as a slander in that pamphlet. The late Resident had told them, that he had had pecuniary transactions with a namesake of his, Mr. S. Russell, who had money dealings with Mr. William Palmer; what those transactions were the late Resident had not informed the court, neither had he a right to do so; whether it was by way of loan, at legal interest or at a higher rate, he had not acquainted the proprietors. He had however informed them, that, at this period, Mr. William Palmer was accommodated in the residency; and the natives being of opinion that Mr. Palmer derived considerable influence from living in the residency, he (Mr. Russell) desired that gentleman to withdraw. In consequence of that direction, the hon. proprietor (Mr. Russell) informed the court, that Mr. W. Palmer did withdraw; and there was thus produced between him and Mr. Palmer a great degree of hostility.—Here the hon. proprietor left the court, with respect to the hostility which had been engendered; but it appeared that this hostility was not of eternal duration; for Sir W. Rumbold had, in his letter to the Court of Directors, included a private letter from Mr. Resident Russell, in which that gentleman encouraged Mr. W. Palmer to withhold the accounts which the Bengal government had desired the house of Palmer and Co. to produce. (Hear, hear!) If he were wrong the gentlemen who cried "hear, hear" could set him right. That letter did encourage Mr. W. Palmer not to produce those accounts; and it appeared that Sir W. Rumbold, one of the partners, was the instrument by which that object was to be effected. The letter was to be found in page 734; it was dated the 30th of October 1819, and ran thus:—

"My dear Palmer,—I have sent the letters to the residency to have the remainder of them copied; and, directly that is done, I will send them off. I return you the letter to Sir William, agreeing in every thing you have said in it. The openness with which you have come forward to exhibit the whole detail of your transactions in the Aurungabad concern, ought to operate powerfully in favour of the house. (Hear, hear!) But no mercantile establishment ought, in common justice, to be exposed to a scrutiny of this inquisitorial character. (Hear, hear!) Sir William, I should hope, would be able able to prevail on Lord Hastings, if this capdious, cavilling spirit continues to be displayed, to say, that whenever any substantial objection is urged, he will call on the house to explain it; but that he cannot consent to call on them for an indiscriminate exposure of their concerns, merely under the expectation that some ground of objection may be discovered in them. Such a practice is subversive of the very basis on which society is founded. (Hear, hear!) Your's very truly

Oct. 30th. (Signed) "H. RUSSELL."

Thus it was that suggestions were given for the house of W. Palmer and Co. to resist the orders of the government; those orders being founded on the offer they had themselves made, and in the spirit of which the licence was granted. It was not necessary for him to go into all the particulars. It was sufficient to say that an application was made by the house of Palmer and Co. for a licence which would exempt them from the operation of the law by which British subjects in general were bound. That licence was granted; it bore date the 23rd of July 1816; and, in acceding certain powers to the house of W. Palmer and Co. the Governor-General in effect, says, that permission "was granted to exercise those powers, provided that whatever transactions you (Palmer and Co.) may have with the Nizam's government shall be such as are approved of by the British government." But how could they be approved of and sanctioned unless the government knew what those transactions were? (Hear!) It was quite clear that the penalties provided by the acts of parliament relative to pecuniary transactions between British subjects and the native princes, were intended "to prevent the former from obtaining too much influence over the latter by lending them money and exacting an enormous rate of interest from them." The question then was, did Palmer and Co. or did they not, obtain an undue influence over the Nizam through the medium of their connexion with the government of the Marquess of Hastings? (No, no, answered by cries of yes, yes.) And next whether they did or did not receive an exorbitant rate of interest from the Nizam. (No, no, yes, yes, were called out by turns.) Here was the instrument itself which allowed the house of Palmer and Co. to enter into these pecuniary transactions; and it contained this specific clause: "Provided however, that the said firm of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. shall, at all times, when required so to do by the British Resident at Hyderabad, for the time being, communicate to the said Resident the nature and object of their transactions with the government, or the subjects of his said highness the Nizam." In this case the parties were required to produce their accounts, and they did send them to Calcutta; but they took very good care that they should be accompanied by one of their most active partners, Sir W. Rumbold, who was to exert his influence to prevent those accounts from being placed on record; and the reason given by the noble Marquess for conceding this particular point, namely, that the accounts should not be recorded, was a most curious one; it was without circumlocution simply this,—that, if the accounts were sent to London, they would be submitted to the inspection of persons ignorant of the habits, manners, and usages of India. Who, he demanded, were the persons thus pointed at? They were not individuals who were to be met in clubs, or in places where the chit-chat of the day occupied the attention of the parties assembled. In the first place those persons included the executive body of the East-India Company, to whom all despatches of the government abroad necessarily first came. On these despatches they were bound to exercise a fair and proper judgment. The executive body of which he was now speaking, might be said to consist of two parts; first of gentlemen who had not been in India, and next of gentlemen who had been employed in that country, which was the case with several of them. There were many gentlemen in the direction, who, though they had never been in the eastern dominions, had given up a great portion of their time and attention to the study of Indian affairs, and by long and laborious study had acquired a perfect knowledge of the Company's best interest. The other gentlemen to whom he had alluded, were persons who had passed many years in India, where they had held high offices, and were intimately conversant with the habits, manners, usages and language of the natives; these certainly were very fit individuals to examine the accounts of Messrs. Palmer and Co., if they had been placed on record, yet were they mentioned as persons who were likely to form "all sorts of erroneous conclusions." (Hear!) But who were the other parties thus spoken of? Why, the Commissioners for the Affairs of India. When despatches arrived in this country they were forwarded to the Commissioners for Indian Affairs as soon as possible. He knew that none of these gentlemen had been in India; but they were empowered to look into all matters connected with the administration of the Indian Government; and, considering the prompt and effectual assistance which they received, he saw no reason why they should not discharge their duties correctly and satisfactorily. The President of the Board was often in communication with the Chairs, and they informed him from the authentic records of every point relative to which he desired explanation.

explanation. Again, who were the other individuals thus slightly mentioned? They are (said the hon. director), yourselves, the constituent body of the East-India Company, the General Court of Proprietors; the greater number of whom, he was aware, had never been in India; amongst them, however, were to be found men possessing much natural acuteness of mind, assisted by education, and enlarged by a constant intercourse with the world. But at that moment he observed, on this other side of the bar, individuals who had filled high situations in their Indian empire; persons who were perfectly conversant with the habits, manners, and usages of the natives of India, and who were, in every respect capable of speaking justly and accurately on any question connected with India. (Hear!) These were matters of account, and had they no persons who were capable of judging of matters of that description? He saw among them a gentleman who had held the important office of accountant of Bengal, who might be considered, if not in name, yet certainly in fact, as the chief financier in India. How, then, could it be asserted, that any erroneous conclusion was likely to be drawn, if those accounts had been recorded and sent home? It appeared, with respect to the Aurungabad arrangement, that the information afforded to the Bengal Government was too vague and unsatisfactory to enable them to come to any decision on its merits, for Messrs. Palmer and Co. had not stated the rate of interest which they were to receive—a most important point, as every man conversant in such matters must allow. It did, however, appear, that Palmer and Co. were to have assignments on the Nizam's revenue to the amount of thirty lacs of rupees per year, for which they were to advance two lacs of rupees per month. Now, he would contend, that, supported as this house was, by the countenance and influence of the Governor-General and the Resident at Hyderabad, unless some convulsion took place in the Nizam's territories—some such convulsion as, were it to happen in England, would overturn the Bank of England—those assignments were as good as Bank notes. (No, no!) Any person, he was convinced, would have taken them in liquidation of an account. (Hear, hear!) Some of the Members of Council did not deem satisfactory the information which had been given of this Aurungabad transaction by Messrs. Palmer and Co.; and they called on Mr. Sherer, the Accountant-General, a most able and efficient officer, to inspect the documents which had been transmitted by Messrs. Palmer and Co., and to report his opinion upon them. In answer to this, Mr. Sherer wrote a letter, in which he referred to the 37th of Geo. III. cap. 142, and expressed his doubts whether Mr. Russell, the then Resident, was competent to give his sanction to any such arrangement. This doubt was founded on the fact, that it was not known to him, nor did it appear from the correspondence laid before him, that the consent or approbation of any of the Governments of India had been obtained to the arrangements concluded at Hyderabad between the Nizam's Government and the house of Palmer and Co.; and he observed, that had such consent been obtained, the circumstance would of course have been noticed in the correspondence. Mr. Sherer then proceeded to take a detailed view of the question, and, in the end, he called for a figured statement of the transactions between the house and the Nizam; an order was in consequence directed by the Government to the Resident at Hyderabad, calling upon him to transmit to Calcutta the accounts which Mr. Sherer had mentioned. The accounts were forwarded to the seat of government; but the great object of the order was baffled. The business was so conducted, that the accounts were not placed on the records of the council. The Senior Member of Council (Mr. Stuart), in a minute, which did him very great honour, and which might be considered a sort of protest against what passed in council at that time, recorded his opinion. To that minute the Governor-General replied; and his first observation was, that the Government of the Nizam was independent. What sort of an independence he enjoyed was fully shown in Mr. Resident Russell's report, on the military resources and political state of the Nizam's dominions, addressed to Sir Thomas Hislop, and subsequently introduced into a minute drawn up by Mr. Stuart. But he would give them the benefit of that position, he would suppose the Nizam to be as independent as Runjeet Sing, the sovereign of Lahore, or the king of Ava, with whom the Company were now at war. But what became of all that boast of independence, when promises backed by the countenance of Government were held forth by Palmer and Co.? When they considered the relative situation of the parties, they must perceive that a nominal, not a real independence could be maintained under such circumstances, and, therefore, this specious plea wholly fell to the ground. He hoped the court would excuse him, if he took the words of the Marquess of Hastings himself, with reference to a point on which he had touched in the beginning of his speech, namely, the alarm which seemed to prevail at the idea of sending these accounts home. These were the words of Lord Hastings: "When Sir W. Rambold was called before the council, he explained that the supplication of the house for Government's dispensing with the delivery of a copy of the accounts had this sole motive—the accounts once put on the proceedings of council must be transmitted home, so that the transactions of the house would be subjected in London to the inspection of persons liable to form all kinds of false deductions, from total ignorance of the habits of the country, and of every concomitant particular. At the same time he offered to explain every part of the transactions verbally, on oath, to the council. He further proposed to wait upon Mr. Stuart, at his own house, and there submit the accounts to his examination." Now, that a man of the great talents possessed by Lord Hastings, that a man holding his high station in life, could have placed on record such a sentiment as this, was, he owned, to him utterly incomprehensible. It was so unlike his conduct in other respects, so inconsistent with the services he had done the Company (services to which he bore willing testimony), that when he saw the passage he was lost in astonishment. (Hear !) The hon. proprietor, has, in his pamphlet, made a direct attack, not, indeed, by name, but plainly enough to be perfectly understood, on the Court of Directors. The hon. proprietor said: "Whether the original motive for these calumnies may have been to injure Sir W. Rumbold and his partners, or Mr. Russell, or Lord Hastings, it is abundantly apparent that their judges" meaning, observed Mr. Webb, the Court of Directors, and if he were wrong in his interpretation of the passage gentlemen would set him right) "and their accusers have been equally ready to believe without examination, and to record as true every charge that has been made." As a member of that body, he denied most completely the whole assertion; he would say, that the principal calumny complained of by the hon. proprietor had not in any degree biased his judgment. It was very true that he had heard it, but he treated it as a mere matter of report, as a thing which might be true, or which might be false; and he did not think that he was bound to inquire into that which did not come properly before him; which was, in fact, a mere rumour. He would venture, also, to refer to the sentiments of his colleagues, and he believed they would declare, that the rumour to which he would presently more distinctly allude, never, in any degree, swayed their opinion with respect to the transactions at Hyderabad. (Hear !) He was very sorry that the hon. proprietor had sent forth this publication; because he had a personal respect for him on account of the eminent talents he displayed. The distinguished part he acted in society, and the high character he bore as an active and intelligent man of business in this great capital. He was sorry that he had gone out of his way to throw a slur on the executive body; but as an humble member of that body, he was most anxious to repel it. What was the base insinuation that had been thrown out, and which had inflicted such pain on the friends of the Marquess of Hastings? He would give it in the hon. proprietor's own words, since he had been pleased to put it in print. It was nothing more than a mere report, but the hon. proprietor had given an airy report, "a local habitation and a name," by circulating it in a publication to which his name was prefixed; the hon. proprietor stated, and he believed it was his own sincere conviction, that the rumour was a most unjust one; and, in the commencement of his publication, he thus described it: "The calumny of which the friends of the Marquess of Hastings thought it necessary to take public notice, was contained in the following allegations;—that Sir W. Rumbold had been invited by the Marquess of Hastings to accompany him to India, being a creditor on his Lordship for a large portion of his wife's (Lady Rumbold's) fortune, of which Lord Hastings was a trustee; that Lord Hastings was to compensate Sir W. Rumbold by using his power and his influence in his favour on any occasion that might present itself; that he (Lord Hastings) had a corrupt interest and motive for so doing; that, in contemplation of availing himself of Lord Hastings' undue favour and protection in behalf of any commercial establishment with which he might connect himself, Sir W. Rumbold sought and formed a connexion with the firm of W. Palmer and Co., of Hyderabad." Now he did hope, and indeed he had no doubt, that the hon. proprietor felt a conscientious conviction that all this was mere calumny; but he had not informed the world whether that conviction arose from positive knowledge, or was merely founded on opinion. He supposed the hon. proprietor was prepared to produce a statement on this subject, signed and authenticated by Sir W. Rumbold, who, as the guardian of his wife's fortune, was bound to that lady to see that the trustees duly executed their trust. He hoped that Sir W. Rumbold and the co-trustees of the Marquess of Hastings could effectually remove this calumny.

Mr. Webb. Then the account might be authenticated by the hon. proprietor himself, stating what was the amount of the lady's fortune, and how it was invested. (A laugh, and hear, hear !)

The Hon. D. Kinnaid said, as we understood, that he had no right to be called on to disclose his own private affairs, or those of any other person with whom he might happen to be connected; but still, he would say, that the property was legally invested.

Mr. Bebb continued; he thought a figured statement might be produced which would set this matter at rest. He did not mean any disrespect to the hon. proprietor, but in human affairs he liked to be enabled to check and examine matters. (Hear!) The statement might be confirmed by a communication with the Governor of the Bank of England. If a statement of this description were not produced, then, notwithstanding the respectable character of the hon. gentleman, individuals would draw their own inference. (Hear, hear!) They would be apt to say, what an eminent character many years deceased (he alluded to the celebrated Lord Chesterfield) had said, namely, "that a number of concurrent circumstances, joined with a great degree of probability, would often sway his (Lord Chesterfield's) mind, before a declaration made upon honour, or even upon oath." (Hear, hear!) Men conversant with the world knew "that persons who were in embarrassed circumstances would often"—(Order, order!)

The Hon. D. Kinnaird. "I speak to order. I have a great respect for the hon. director; but I really must interfere; not only to protect this court, but to protect the hon. director from himself. (Hear!) I am persuaded that he is not aware of the extraordinary circumstances in which he has placed himself and me. If the hon. director mixed more in society, he would know, that when you appeal to a gentleman, and he gives his answer, you are bound to take it as true until you can disprove it. The indecency of arguing the point afterwards is evident. (Hear, hear!) I speak, not only for myself, but in behalf of the court. I cannot sit by, silently, and hear the probability of my having told a falsehood discussed before my face." (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Bebb said, it was not possible for him to prove or disprove an assertion without seeing the statement on which that assertion was founded, when that statement was produced, those who examined it were placed in possession of a check which enabled them to decide correctly. (Hear, hear!) He admitted that the noble Marquess had performed very great service for the Company, and he wished that the nine proprietors who signed the requisition had followed the course indicated by the resolution of the General Court of the 3d of March 1824: "That there be laid before this court all correspondence, and other documents, to be taken from the public records of this house, which regard the administration of the Marquess of Hastings, which may enable the court to judge of the propriety of entertaining the question of further remuneration to the late Governor-General."

He would have been glad if the hon. proprietors who signed the requisition for this court had followed this resolution; but gentlemen were free to follow their own course; they had narrowed the grounds of the question to the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings in the pecuniary concerns of the house of W. Palmer, and Co. of Hyderabad; and the hon. proprietor (Mr. Kinnaird) had taken a still more confined ground. But the question went a great way farther than the mere personal conduct of Lord Hastings. He would here say a few words as to what had been the conduct of the Bengal Government after Lord Hastings had quitted India. In the first place, he would draw the attention of the court to the final paragraph of the hon. proprietor's pamphlet, which ran thus: "That the credulity of the Directors, and the blind confidence of the Bengal Government, in the bare assertion of Mr. Metcalf, have been the means of enabling that person to effect the ruin of Messrs. William Palmer and Co., and to blacken the character of honourable and irreproachable men." Now, let the court mark what the Bengal Government actually did after the departure of Lord Hastings. But, before he went to that point, he would state what the opinion of Lord Hastings himself was, with respect to those transactions. That opinion would be found amongst those papers in a letter from the Bengal Government to the Resident at Hyderabad, drawn up by the Governor-General himself, or at least under his direction. If they turned to page 186 they would find, in the secretary's letter of the 13th of Sept. 1822, addressed to the Resident at Hyderabad, the following passage:

"Sir: I now proceed, by command of his Exc. the Governor-General in Council, to reply to your despatches of the 29th of July and 1st of August, of which the receipt was acknowledged under date the 24th ult. Their contents are calculated to excite sentiments of extreme surprise and displeasure in the mind of his Lordship in Council, at the conduct of the house of W. Palmer and Co., and of the minister Rajah Chundoo Loll: a conclusive judgment of course is not formed while there is a possibility that Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., who have had no opportunity to answer, might shew the existence of misapprehension in the statement. (Hear, hear!) But at present there is strong presumption that those gentlemen have been engaged in extensive pecuniary dealings, unknown to the Resident or the British Government, while they were professing to make a frank and unreserved disclosure of all such transactions existing between them. Even with regard to the loan of sixty lacs, an account of which is now submitted, there is ground to suspect the most culpable misapplication of the funds specifically assigned for payment of the principal and interest of that debt."

"Such was the opinion of Lord Hastings himself. Again, in page 286, they would find the following passage in the letter addressed on the 19th of November 1822, by the Secretary to the Resident: "I am also directed to communicate to you the following observations and orders of his Excellency in Council on another point noticed in your despatch, on which further information is indispensably necessary to a full understanding of the nature of the subject to which it relates. The point in question has reference to Mr. W. Palmer's statement in explanation of the large monthly allowances held by him and his brother, Mr. H. Palmer, and the stipends to the children of the former, from the Government of his highness the Nizam. On the subject of the allowance to Mr. H. Palmer, the statement of Mr. W. Palmer is entirely silent; it will be necessary, therefore, to ascertain whether the omission be accidental, or whether the house do not desire to offer any further observations in reply to the reference already made to them on that subject. With regard to Mr. W. Palmer's explanation of his own and his children's stipends, it is sufficient to remark, that it is extremely unsatisfactory, and that although the right of the Nizam to confer what allowances he pleases on those who are now, or have been in his service, or on their families, be unquestioned, it cannot be expected by his highness that the British Government should come forward to advance a large sum of money for the liquidation of heavy arrears on such account. In the special instance under consideration these arrears appear to have been accumulating in common with the other debts of the state at an exorbitant rate of interest." Such, observed Mr. Bebb, was the language of the Bengal Government, of which Lord Hastings was then the head. The letter went on to say, "If the above observations hold good in regard to pensions actually conferred by the Nizam himself in the free exercise of his independent authority, they must apply with still greater force to the acts of a minister, supposing the Nizam not to have been consulted in the appropriation of so large a sum of the revenues of the country in their present deteriorated state. Such an assumption of power on the part of Chundoo Loll while engaged with us, and enjoying our support, for the purpose of reducing establishments and expenses, which the state was unable to bear, could never receive the sanction of this Government, and cannot indeed be regarded otherwise than as standing wholly at the pleasure of the Nizam; such charges cannot be acknowledged by this government." At the time that despatch was written the council consisted of Lord Hastings, Mr. Adam, Mr. Fendall, and Mr. Bailey; Mr. Stuart, it should be observed, was at that time absent on account of ill health. Having brought the opinion of the Marquess of Hastings under the notice of the court, he would now inquire what had been done by the Bengal Government subsequently to the noble Lord's leaving India: they acted liberally; they acted in a manner worthy of their high and honourable character. They enabled the Nizam's Government to liquidate the just debt due to Palmer and Co., by purchasing a peishchush, or tribute from the Nizam, for which they gave him a full and fair consideration, as fair and as honest a consideration as any man purchasing an estate in this country would give. It appeared, from a statement made by Mr. Barnett, the Assistant Resident at Hyderabad, that the payments made to Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., on account of the Nizam's Government, from the 3d of April to the 21st of July 1823, amounted to 78,70,670 rupees. (Hear, hear!) This included the Aurangabad concern, and the Berar Suwar concern (with 24, or, more correctly speaking, 25 per cent. interest), and the 60 lac loan (excepting the bonus, which was very properly thrown aside), with 18 per cent. interest. After this, could any reasonable man say that the Bengal Government dealt hardly with this house? (Hear!) They had acted in obedience to the orders of their superiors, as well as in accordance with the dictates of their own judgment, and he denied that their conduct was in any respect other than just and liberal. (Hear!) He repeated the expression that they not only acted with justice, but with great liberality. It might be proper to mention, in this place, that it appeared the government had paid to that house about six lacs of rupees more than they were bound to pay them. (Hear, hear!) His hon. friend (Mr. Pattison) had cited a number of extracts from Sir C. Metcalf's despatches: he had selected a bit here, and culled a bit there, or which he had animadverted, without considering the situation in which Sir C. Metcalf stood at the time he was sent to Hyderabad. He succeeded a man of great intelligence; a man of great research; but who had been friendly to the house of Palmer and Co.: even his first assistant, Mr. Hans Sotheby, had been connected with the same firm; all were hostile to him, except his second assistant, Mr. Barnett. Above all, the minister Chundoo Loll was necessarily hostile to Sir C. Metcalf: he had, therefore, to find his way as well as he could; and, as circumstances arose, he stated them fairly, keeping back nothing whatever. (Hear!) Could it then be wondered at, situated as he was, that some trifling discrepancies would appear in his communications? (Hear!) But he would maintain, notwithstanding those petty variations, that, on the whole, the statements of Sir C. Metcalf were substantially true and correct. Looking to the situation which he had previously held under the Bengal Government, he was very properly selected on this occasion: his conduct in that situation had done him great honour, and the knowledge and experience he had acquired while in office, enabled him the better to unravel those intricacies in which the transactions of the house of Palmer and Co. were involved. As he had before observed, this question went a great way further than had been stated. The Bengal Government, by their vigorous acts, and the Court of Directors, by their scrutinizing eye, and by their wise and prudent measures, had rescued the inhabitants of the Nizam's territories from manifold oppressions. (Hear!) The plan which was going on under the direction of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., was carrying desolation in its train; (Hear!) if it had not been put an end to, very soon, at no very distant period (when the country had become so exhausted, and the people so discontented, that the poor peasants would no longer suffer their hard earnings, to be wrung from them), a scene would have been presented similar to that which had once been witnessed in the Carnatic. (Hear!) The creditors of the Nizam call on the British Government for assistance and relief; the inevitable consequence must have been, that another commission would have been formed in London for the purpose of settling the claims of the parties. This question, he repeated, went much farther than at first sight appeared: in truth (said the hon. director), it goes to this, if you, the proprietors by a side-wind, censure the direction sent out by the executive body, to the Bengal Government, which you will do by agreeing to the original motion, you will hold out any thing but encouragement for the due, prompt, and efficient discharge of their important duties. (Hear!) The highest ambition I have in the performance of that duty which I owe to the Company, is, to meet with your unbiassed approbation: if you refuse it, the effect must be disheartening. But, on the other hand, if you accord it to me and to my colleagues, by agreeing to this amendment, it will cheer our minds, it will give us confidence on every future occasion. (Hear!) If you now manifest by your votes, that you disapprove of those transactions, which the Directors have censured, it will be a lesson, it will be a sort of beacon for all future Indian Governments. It will shew to those whom you send out to that country, high in rank, authority, and influence, that they must not serve a friend at the expense of millions. (Hear!) Your approval of the conduct of the Executive Body will, I confidently repeat it, be a warning, a beacon to all Governors-General hereafter; (Hear!) and, without casting blame upon any person, I say, that men placed in such high trusts; men entrusted with such extensive powers; men possessing such extensive influence, ought to be most vigilantly watched (Hear, hear!), not only by the Executive Body, but, gentlemen, by yourselves. (Hear, hear!) Their actions, ought also to be viewed with a scrutinizing eye by the Board of Commissioners; and through them, by the Government of the country, and ultimately by Parliament. (Hear!) The question before us, Sir, goes fully to the length I have stated (continued the hon. director); its importance has induced me to speak thus fully, and I cannot conclude without expressing my thanks for the patient attention with which I have been heard. Before I sit down, I beg leave to bear my testimony, as an old servant of the Company, to the character of those hon. gentlemen whose names have been introduced on this occasion. I speak of them in order, as they appear on the pages of the papers, and not with reference to their rank. In the first place, I will mention Mr. Sherer, next Mr. J. Stuart (whom I speak of as one of the Company's servants, though he is now in this country); I will next name Mr. Adam, who is at present in India; Mr. Bailey, and Mr. Harrington; and I refer to all these, as most able, as most honourable men, as men who have in a fearless and spirited manner, discharged faithfully to their employers a very painful duty. (Hear!) With Mr. Adam, who held for a time the high situation of Governor-General of India, I have no personal acquaintance. I saw him in Calcutta, a very young man, but I never spoke a word to him. I knew his father, and respected him greatly: he was, for many years, standing council to the Company; and, in that capacity, as in every other, he conducted himself in a manner the most satisfactory. I shall now conclude with repeating, that notwithstanding all that has been alleged in disparagement of those gentlemen, I continue to hold them in the highest estimation for their able, honourable, and faithful conduct, as servants of the Company, and I sincerely hope that they will meet with that reward to which I think them justly entitled—your cordial support and approbation. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Russell rose to explain. He must, he said, in the first instance, be allowed to disclaim all participation in the pamphlet published by an hon. proprietor (Mr. D. Kinnaid), on which the hon. director (Mr. Bebb) had founded many of his observations. He was sure the hon. proprietor would bear him out in saying that he had no connection with it. (Order, order! Question, question!)

Mr. Debb. I am most anxious to hear any explanation the hon. proprietor may wish to offer, and I hope it will be satisfactory to my mind. I must state, in justice to the hon. proprietor, that, while he was Resident at Hyderabad, he performed great and eminent services for the Company. It is fitting, therefore, that whatever he has to say in explanation, should be attentively listened to.

Mr. Russell continued. He asked, whether the pamphlet in question was not prepared and published, without any communication, direct or indirect, with him?

The Hon. D. Kinnaird.—Certainly.

Mr. Russell. That point being settled, the next observation of the hon. director, on which he desired to explain, was, with respect to the money which he had placed in the hands of his friend and namesake, Mr. S. Russell, at Hyderabad. He had stated the fact before; and if he were not, at that time, perfectly understood, he must now beg leave, most decidedly and distinctly, to disclaim any knowledge or belief, that any part of that money was employed in an illegal or objectionable manner, (Hear, hear!) and his sole reason for withdrawing it was, lest it should be so employed. (Hear!) When he said objectionable, he meant, so far as the employment of his money might particularly affect him. For he wished to avoid even the idea of having any, the most remote, participation, in the transactions between the Nizam and the house of Palmer and Co. The hon. director had said, that Mr. W. Palmer had a dwelling within the residency walls: the fact was, he never had. Mr. S. Russell, his (the speaker's) namesake, had a private dwelling, a house of his own, within the walls of the residency, where Mr. Wm. Palmer and other persons often met; and when he (Mr. Russell) saw that extensive pecuniary transactions were carrying on, he forbade Mr. Wm. Palmer to go there. (Hear, hear!) The hon. director had alluded to the hostility which existed between him (Mr. Russell) and Mr. W. Palmer; now he would again say that that was not a feigned hostility. It was direct, open, and acrimonious. There were he believed twenty gentlemen in London, who would now come forward to affirm the fact, of their own positive knowledge. (Hear, hear!) The hon. Director had stated that this hostility was not of eternal duration. He had had, unfortunately, in the course of his life, hostilities with many individuals, but few, if any of them, he was very happy to say, were of that fixed and eternal nature to which the hon. director had alluded. (Hear, hear!) He did not desire that description of hostility—it was not in his nature, and was foreign to his disposition.

(Hear, hear!) But he must be allowed to state, that up to the present time the hostility between him and Mr. W. Palmer had been eternal. No personal intercourse—no interchange of civilities, had taken place between them for some time prior to the circumstance he had mentioned; and since that no communication of any sort or kind whatever had occurred between them. The hon. director had alluded to a note of his, (Mr. Russell's) which was to be found in page 734, in the printed papers; it was a private note, and, if he had been consulted he would not have given his consent to its publication. But, as it had been published, he would not withdraw his support from any one sentiment it contained. As to the familiar manner in which he addressed Mr. Palmer in that note, styling him "my dear Palmer," it was a circumstance very easily explained. He and Mr. Palmer had been intimate from their boyhood. For seven years he had been in constant intercourse with Mr. Palmer, when the rupture took place. For some years after he had no communication with him even by letter. He had even made it a personal request to Mr. Palmer, when a letter was addressed to him, that if he had any farther communication, other than of an official nature, it should be made to his (Mr. Russell's) brother, and not directly to him; and while his brother remained in India, that course was taken. A correspondence afterwards occurred on topics of a public nature, but the form was not always official. When he (Mr. Russell) wrote the note in question, he was in the country. Had he written it from the Residency, it would have been official undoubtedly; but as it was written privately, he did not think it was necessary to depart from those forms of courtesy, which, before the rupture with Mr. Palmer, had always been kept up between them. If the words "my dear Palmer," with which the note commenced, and the words "yours truly," with which it concluded, were selected to prove that no hostility existed between him and Mr. Palmer, he was ready, in contradiction, to shew that a settled hostility did exist. When the hon. director said that the object of this note was to induce the house of Palmer and Co. to disobey the orders of government, he would contend, that it was in fact directly the reverse. He (Mr. Russell) approved of Mr. Palmer's intention to lay the detailed accounts before the government. He thought then, and he still thought, that Mr. Palmer was wise in doing so; but he must candidly confess that he did not approve of the principle of calling on mercantile men to make public their money transactions. It appeared to him that such a course of proceeding was not meant to remove any single and tangible objection to a transaction, but was intended to seek out and discover discover objections if any such existed against the transactions of the house generally. His (Mr. Russell's) note alone related to that general principle, and not to the particular case on which it was brought to bear. (Hear, hear!) Some allusion had been made to the Nizam's country, when he was Resident at Hyderabad. The hon. Director had said that under the arrangements of the house of Palmer and Co. it was going to ruin; and in a late debate on this question, great stress had been laid on the difference between the character of Chundoo Loll, the minister, as drawn by Sir Charles Metcalf and himself.

Mr. Impey rose to order, but the calls of "go on" prevented him from being heard.

Mr. Bebb. I hope the court will not refuse the hon. proprietor the fullest means of explanation.

Mr. Impey said he would not unnecessarily interrupt any gentleman; and certainly, he would be the last man in the world to interrupt the hon. proprietor, because he had been a most deserving and meritorious servant of the Company. For his own part, he would be most happy to hear him in explanation; but he must object to his going into a history with respect to the administration of Chundoo Loll, and the state of the Nizam's territories. He would submit to the hon. proprietor himself, whether he was not out of order in proceeding from explanation to argument.

Mr. Russell said he was not going to describe the character of Chundoo Loll, but to defend his description of that character, which had been attacked. It had been stated with great vehemence, that the character he had given of Chundoo Loll was false. Now, he would ask, whether any man who had been called on to give a character of Chundoo Loll, Sir Charles Metcalf only excepted, had not given the same description as he (Mr. Russell) had done? Captain Sydenham, a gentleman whose talents and services were generally known, had recorded his opinion on the subject. He had stated that it would be the best scheme of government, both for the Nizam and the Company, to support Chundoo Loll, and to give to him the largest share of power in the administration of the Nizam's affairs. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Stuart here rose.

Mr. R. Jackson, who had also risen to address the court, said, he would not interrupt the hon. proprietor if he meant only to enter into explanation; but he could not agree to his making a new speech after having been already fully heard.

Mr. Stuart requested the indulgence of the court, and he was perfectly sensible that what he called for was really an indulgence. But after what had been said, it must be evident to every gentleman, that very serious and very painful imputations had been cast upon him. Now what he wished to ask of that hon. court was, to suffer him to give a simple statement with respect to the allegations contained in the pamphlet which had been quoted; if that request were complied with it would be extremely grateful to his feelings, and he was resolved, if the liberty were granted to him, not to abuse it. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. R. Jackson said that, with every feeling of delicacy towards the hon. proprietor, he could not help thinking that the ground, on which he urged his request was the most objectionable that could have been advanced. Because a pamphlet had appeared 24 hours ago, which pamphlet had now been quoted, the hon. proprietor claimed the right of answering certain statements contained in it. Why, there might be half a dozen other pamphlets on the same subject, and were they all to be answered in that court seriatim? Because Mr. Buckingham, for instance, had published some able observations on this question, were individuals to get up for the purpose of answering his arguments? In short, was every person who felt himself touched by the arguments contained in these pamphlets, to be heard in explanation by the Court of Proprietors. His hon. friend (Mr. Bebb) had been as much out of order as any man possibly could be, in taking up that pamphlet and reading it for an hour. As those productions had issued from the press, the best way of answering them, was through the medium of the press. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. S. Dixon said, that when he saw that pamphlet introduced, he wished it to be anywhere else except in that court; but, it having been alluded to by an hon. director, and the court having listened to it, he thought it was but fair that the hon. proprietor, on whom it reflected, should be heard. It should also be observed, that the hon. proprietor, who had last addressed the court, at some length, in explanation, had alluded to this pamphlet. The hon. proprietor (Mr. Stuart) had thrown himself entirely on the indulgence of the court; and when an individual, who had been assailed, made such an appeal to their feelings, he hoped the good nature of the court would always allow him an opportunity to vindicate himself. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. proprietor would be indulged with the liberty he requested, and that the same would be extended to any person who might chance to be attacked.

Mr. Poynder said, the distinction between the two cases was simply this,—that, in one case, the case of Mr. Russell, certain assertions were made in that court, and a specific answer was given; but the circumstances in the present instance were different; the name of Mr. Stuart was not not mentioned by any gentleman, in conjunction with that pamphlet. He thought, therefore, that Mr. Stuart could not be let in,—that he could not answer the pamphlet in that court,—and, therefore, that Mr. R. Jackson was correct in the view he had taken of the question.

Mr. Impey could not agree in the position advanced by the gentleman who just sat down. If it were, for instance, a pamphlet reflecting on John or Thomas, after a discussion in which they were interested had ended, then the court could have nothing at all to do with it. But how stood the case here? The hon. proprietor (Mr. D. Kinnsaird) made a motion, and then, in the middle of the debate consequent upon that motion, he, most imprudently, published a pamphlet, which reflected on one of the best officers in the Company's service. That pamphlet had been brought into court, and a portion of it had been read. Now, after this had been done; and, after having heard the other hon. proprietor (Mr. Russell), if Mr. Stuart was not also heard in answer to the improper imputations cast upon him in that pamphlet, the court would be guilty of injustice. (Hear, hear!)

The hon. D. Kinnsaird said, so far as he was concerned, he was ready to hear any kind of explanation which Mr. Stuart might think proper to give. The answer, it appeared, was to apply to a publication of his (the hon. D. Kinnsaird's), for which he was responsible, both in that court and elsewhere. The observation which had fallen from the learned gentleman (Mr. Impey), did not come from him with a good grace, and certainly might have been spared; because, on the least reflection, it must have appeared to the learned gentleman, that it was quite impossible; that he could have intended to publish the pamphlet at this particular period. The duration of this discussion, which was beyond all precedent, sufficiently disproved the idea, that the publication was meant for the present moment. No ordinary calculation could have led him to the conclusion, that the debate would be still going on when this pamphlet came out. The learned gentleman himself must know, that the pamphlet had been prepared long before the discussion even commenced. He had given in that pamphlet as fair, as honest, and as honourable a proof, that he wished the discussion, as he originally had stated, to be confined entirely to the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings; and he thought, that though the whole of those papers, and all these transactions should be considered, yet he had not mixed up their investigation in that pamphlet with the principal object to which he had directed his attention.

This was a public question, his pamphlet was public, and he hoped public answers would be given to it. The papers were before the world; and if he were wrong, and came to unfounded conclusions with respect to the conduct of Mr. Stuart, or any other man, he hoped he should be able to explain the ground upon which he proceeded, and to shew satisfactorily, that he was influenced by no mean or unworthy motives.

Mr. Pattison said, he rose to order, if order could again reign in that very disorderly meeting.—Since the hon. proprietor aimed at a speech, it would be as well, perhaps, if he were suffered to go on; it would probably be a saving of time. He must, however, say, that if the learned gentleman (Mr. R. Jackson) gave way, in courtesy, it would be a very great concession to the hon. proprietor, because Mr. Stuart was not going to defend himself against the author of the pamphlet, but against his own friends, who had brought the publication forward. Why, he asked, did the hon. director (Mr. Bebb) read extracts from that pamphlet?

The Chairman. "I rise to order. I think the hon. director is transgressing the bounds to which he ought to confine himself." (Cries of question, hear, and chair!)

Mr. Pattison. "I am speaking to order, and must take the liberty to say, in the course of the debate, Sir, you yourself have been sometimes out of order. I must say, that it is trenching on the right of the learned proprietor (Mr. R. Jackson) to allow Mr. Stuart to proceed; but as the learned proprietor, in a manner highly creditable to himself, seems inclined to give way, I, for one, should be glad to hear Mr. Stuart."

The Chairman. "I consider that I should not be discharging my duty, if I did not state what the order of debate was; and I ask Mr. Stuart whether he is about to explain? Explanation is all I think he can request to offer, and it is all that can be allowed. As to the pamphlet which has been produced, there are passages in it which very clearly allude to the hon. proprietor: now, we have already granted an indulgence to another hon. proprietor (Mr. Russell), who lately addressed us on certain points which he conceived to affect his character, and to require explanation; and I know not how we can justly refuse a similar indulgence to Mr. Stuart. His character has been attacked in this pamphlet, to which the signature of an hon. proprietor is affixed. The general court cannot be called upon to listen to the refutation of rumours without a known author; but if statements appear, with the name of a gentleman, affixed to them, and if those statements have been read in the course of debate, I think he is entitled to notice them in the way of explanation, and that we are in courtesy, if not in justice, called upon to hear that explanation."

Mr. Stuart wished to observe, in commencing his address to the court, that it was his intention to make some observations on the statements contained in the pamphlet of the hon. proprietor. The hon. proprietor had said, that he had confined his motion, and whatever observations he had to make, to the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings, with reference to that transaction, which was the unhappy cause of these discussions. Now, he thought that the hon. proprietor was bound, in candour, while the original motion was before the court—while, as yet, it was neither defeated nor carried, to abstain from publishing those statements, which cast more slander on the characters of public men, than any thing which had yet been brought under the notice of the proprietors. (Hear, hear!) Having received the indulgence of the court, for which he felt the sincerest gratitude, he would now, without making any formal speech, proceed to state those propositions of the hon. proprietor, by which his character was affected. He would also refer to the proofs with which it appeared that the hon. gentleman came forward to maintain those propositions, with his comments on them; and he would submit the whole to the candour, the justice, and the honour of that court. The first proposition of the hon. proprietor was, that the house of W. Palmer and Co. were the notorious objects of jealousy, because the members were not in the Company's service. (Hear, hear!) By the second proposition, he (Mr. Stuart) was accused of participating in this jealous feeling; and it was asserted, that, therefore, he joined in the attack which was to effect the ruin of that house. The third proposition was, that it was impossible to reach the house of Palmer and Co., without first destroying Mr. Russell's character for integrity, and, consequently, the value of his testimony in favour of the house; and that, therefore, efforts were made to remove Mr. Russell.

Mr. Stuart said, he would point to the page presently; it was in page 63, where a charge was made against him for having infused into the mind of Mr. Sherer poisonous suspicions relative to the house of Palmer and Co. He would beg leave that the clerk should be allowed to read the passage, as it would save his weak voice.

The hon. D. Kinnaird said, he would be very happy to read any passage in the pamphlet for the purpose of assisting the hon. proprietor.

The clerk then read the following passage:—"The letter of Mr. Sherer is the first recorded attack on the character of Mr. Russell. It is clear, that if the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. (the notorious object of jealousy, because the members were not in the Company's service) were to be attacked, it was impossible to reach it, without first destroying Mr. Russell's character for integrity, and, consequently, the value of his testimony in their favour. That was necessarily, therefore, the first outwork to assail or undermine. It is not, under the extraordinary conduct of Mr. Sherer, difficult to believe that he had been made acquainted with, and possibly attached full credit to, the poisonous suspicions which Mr. Stuart was bold enough to express to Mr. John Palmer, of Mr. Russell's corrupt connexion with the house at Hyderabad. It is singular, that Mr. Stuart should have been so anxious to have the opinion of Mr. Sherer, as if he had prophetically felt he should find a congenial view of the subject in that gentleman."—This, Mr. Stuart observed, was sufficient for his purpose; and he submitted to the court, whether the inference from this passage was not clear? whether it was not here alleged, that he had a design to ruin and overturn the house? and whether he had not, to effect that object, called in the assistance of Mr. Sherer? Why was this house to be attacked and ruined? because it was a notorious object of jealousy, the members not being in the Company's service. By whom was it to be attacked? By whom was it to be ruined? Such an object must be effected by somebody, if effected at all; and he (Mr. Stuart) was clearly pointed out as a man who entertained poisonous suspicions in his breast with respect to this establishment, and who was ready to infuse that poison into the breasts of others: what other inference but that which he had drawn, could follow from the passage which he had quoted? (Hear, hear!) A fourth proposition was, that, to accomplish the aforesaid object, that of ruining the house of Palmer and Co., he had conveyed home, in letters to "a leading and influential director," insinuations against Mr. W. Palmer.

The hon. D. Kinnaird. I stated no such thing.

Mr. Stuart. The charge was, that having spread my suspicions about Calcutta, I afterwards gave them currency in this house, either by my letters to a leading and influential director, or by means of some person at Calcutta, to whom I had stated my suspicions.

The hon. D. Kinnaird. I wish the hon. proprietor would read the words.

Mr. Stuart said, the words were these: "It is possible, that the same gentleman, who thought proper to spread his injurious and unfounded suspicions regarding Mr. Russell, about Calcutta, may have thought himself equally justified in communicating them to his correspondents at home."

It is matter of universal report, that Mr. Stuart was in the habit of corresponding with a leading and most influential director of the time, who had been openly hostile to Lord Hastings' original appointment, and to the policy his lordship was known to pursue. But whether Mr. Stuart did or did not communicate his injurious suspicions of Mr. Russell to his correspondent, or whether some person, to whom Mr. Stuart may have confided them in Calcutta, was the channel through whom they were received, and adopted at the East India House, it is to the writer of these remarks, as clear as the sun at noon-day, that these unworthy calumnies had been communicated, had there received ready belief, and were the real foundation of the foregoing letter. The belief in the foul conspiracy, slanderously alleged to have been formed between Lord Hastings, and Mr. Russell, and the house of Palmer and Co., will alone account for the tone, and the terms, and the orders of the despatch in question; no other theory could render it intelligible. The circumstantial in this, as in most cases, is of a nature that convinces more fully than any direct proof. Can an intelligible explanation be given of it in any other manner?"—Now, he demanded whether this did not sustain the proposition he had laid down? What did the hon. proprietor assert? He asserted it to be possible, that he (Mr. Stuart) might have written, to a director of the Company, those suspicions which he had previously spread at Calcutta; or, that if those suspicions had not been promulgated in that way, that they had been sent home through the medium of some person, to whom he had communicated them in India. Did not this assertion justify what he (Mr. Stuart) had said? He was, in the judgment of that hon. court, and he maintained, that his interpretation of this passage was perfectly correct. (Hear, hear!) Now, there was a fifth charge, on which he certainly felt some doubt, because he did not clearly comprehend what the hon. proprietor meant by it. He said, that in his (Mr. Stuart's) slanderous allegations, which so reached, and were so received at the India House, he (Mr. Stuart) had included the noble Lord in that foul conspiracy, to which the hon. proprietor referred, in language which he would not repeat. The hon. proprietor had here imputed to him the keeping up of a correspondence, and the circulation of slanders, which, having reached that court, had caused the writing of the letter, recalling the license to the house of Palmer and Co. He thought it was quite clear, that the hon. proprietor meant that he had communicated the slanderous allegations which were mentioned in that passage: Such were the imputations thrown out against him. He would now touch on the proofs, or, rather, the attempt at proofs, by which the hon. proprietor attempted to sustain them. In the first place, it was said, that a notorious jealousy existed against the house of Palmer and Co., because they were not in the Company's service. Now, like most of the other allegations of the hon. proprietor, this was nothing more than a pure and gratuitous assumption; and one of which every hon. proprietor, who had been in India, must feel sensible of the fallacy. (Hear, hear! from the hon. D. Kinneaird). "Good God, sir," said Mr. Stuart, "when was it known, that such a low jealousy existed?" (Hear, hear!) He submitted to the hon. proprietor, whether he would not hear him better, by abstaining from interrupting him. He was going to say, that no such jealousy existed; and he would appeal to any man, who had been in any part of India, whether any thing like this mean and despicable feeling, against those estimable individuals, who were occupied in mercantile pursuits, was ever manifested by gentlemen who were in the Company's service? (Hear, hear!) The Company's civil servants had been designated as having an esprit de corps, by an hon. and gallant general, who had entertained the court with a two hours' long speech the other day. That feeling, he was convinced, they possessed. They felt proud of the service to which they were attached, and should be sorry for any intrusion on the offices which were entrusted to them. But he could not but be indignant at the imputation of jealousy and malignity thrown against him in the pamphlet: he gave it his decided denial. The Latin proverb, Nemo repente fuit turpisimus, would apply with great aptitude in the present instance. The gentlemen in whose presence he was speaking, had known him long, and, therefore, could judge of his conduct. They must be aware, that if he were the man described in the pamphlet, as capable of hatching such a fiendish scheme—he could not find words less strong in which to designate it—they must know, he said, that he could not have been held in the respect he had been, nor have moved in the respectable society he did. That pamphlet put forward, in a prominent manner, the conversation which he had held with Mr. Wm. Palmer. Before, however, he proceeded further, he would desire the clerk to read the questions proposed to Mr. John Palmer, by the Governor-General in council (page 157 of the printed papers), on the 10th May 1822, and the answer returned to them. The documents were then read in the following terms:—"Question proposed by the Governor-General. Did you apprise me that a person of consequence had, in substance, expressed to you his persuasion of Mr. Russell's being connected connected with the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., in their transactions with the Nizam's government?—Answer by Mr. Palmer, "Yes, I did."

"Question.—Did I, upon that intimation, say, that such a supposition must not sleep uninvestigated, and that I should require Sir William Rumbold to attend the council on the morrow, to answer that point?—Answer. "Your lordship did say so."

Mr. Stuart. That is quite sufficient. Now, in page 61 of the pamphlet, the hon. proprietor had given the Marquess of Hastings' account of that examination. He would merely remark, that the hon. proprietor had put a wrong date to the letter which contained this account. He had dated it December 1822, whereas, in the printed papers, it was dated October 1822. From this document, he would desire the clerk to read a passage at page 107. The clerk then read as follows:—"The charge against me rests upon my having adopted a course of procedure, on grounds which I studiously, and almost avowedly, withheld from the hon. court. As a basis for that supposition, it is assumed, that Sir Wm. Rumbold was examined before the council, regarding the particulars of the dealings between the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. and the Nizam's government. No such examination took place: of course, the suppression of the information given by Sir Wm. Rumbold, on that occasion, is inaccurately presumed. It would have been idle, to require from Sir Wm. Rumbold expositions already before the board, in various documents, and sifted in repeated discussions. The appearance of Sir Wm. Rumbold was demanded by me, that I might put to him a single question. To explain this, I am compelled to state the circumstances of that sitting; I do it with pain, but I have no option. To all in this country, it would be absurd to expatiate on the character of John Palmer, esq.; but, since the statement is meant for submission to the hon. court, it is not superfluous to mention, that the above gentleman is at the head of the British mercantile interest in India, and that he is not more distinguished by that pre-eminence, than by the strict and manly cast of his uprightness. By the communication which he has, on my requisition, made to the council, it appears, that he had informed me of a very grave doubt, expressed respecting the probity of Mr. Russell. The suspicion purported no less, than that Mr. Russell had been secretly leagued with the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., in negotiating the Aurungabad and the last loan, whence exorbitant profit was to be drawn from the Nizam. It had long before been imparted to me, by several persons, that Mr. Stuart was strongly prejudiced against Mr. Russell, through artful misrepresentations from the father of a Moonshee, whom Mr. Russell had dismissed for mal-practices; but I had till then never imagined that any one could listen to an imputation on Mr. Russell's integrity. Though I was entirely unacquainted with that gentleman, all I had heard of his character made me confident the admision had been loosely hazarded. Nevertheless, when such an accusation was hinted against a person holding an important trust, a public duty obviously forbade my suffering such an insinuation to sleep uninvestigated, and I expressed that sentiment energetically to Mr. Palmer, who was somewhat reluctant to have it known that he had repeated Mr. Stuart's observations. In consequence, I directed that Sir William Rumbold should be requested to attend the council on the morrow. I did not specify my object, so that the summons might have been expected to apply to a misapprehension on the part of Sir Wm. Rumbold, in correspondence about the nature of accounts, which the board desired should be laid before it. On the entrance of Sir Wm. Rumbold into the council-chamber, I moved, that he should be put upon oath, and be asked, whether, in the transactions above alluded to, Mr. Russell had taken any step in concert with the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., by which he could, directly or indirectly, participate in its profits, or had any connexion with the house, whereby he could immediately or remotely compass, or gain, other than the interest of any money of his own, which he might have lodged in their bank? Mr. Stuart, then a member of council, was evidently, in the instant, sensible of Mr. Palmer's having communicated to me the conversation which passed between them. He started up, and eagerly objected to the proposition, on the ground that such a question, put upon record, would be degrading to Mr. Russell as exhibiting him in the light of a person obnoxious to a suspicion which no man who knew his character would for a moment admit. I could not press my motion without justifying my pertinacity by bringing forward the language held to Mr. Palmer, so much at variance with the present professions. I gave credit to Mr. Stuart for his having in the interval satisfied himself that his conjectures were unfounded, and I abruok from distressing a gentleman thoroughly honourable, though too prone to listen to defamatory whispers; I said, if it were understood in council that no doubt was entertained of Mr. Russell's purity, I should not agitate the matter further. Of course the motion dropt. Sir W. Rumbold however complained strenuously of not being permitted to vouch upon his oath that which he asserted upon his honour, namely, that Mr. Russell had not, in the above-mentioned transactions, any connexion with the house or cognizance of its procedures beyond what was involved in those references to him of which the particulars were necessarily laid before government. A considerable time after, it struck the members of the firm, that what had passed in council did not leave a registered exoneration of them from a suspicion so injurious to their reputation, as the possibility of their having seduced a public functionary to promote their interests unfitly. From that reflection, they sent to me the affidavit, a copy of which is annexed to this letter. I did not produce it at the time when it reached me; it was in my opinion unnecessary with regard to the character of the house, and as it would appear, levelled at some assertion, I thought it would be invidious to revive a subject which seemed to have gone by. Beyond what I have recited, any thing addressed to Sir Wm. Rumbold, or started by him before the council was incidental and unconnected. It was intimated by me that as Sir Wm. Rumbold was before the board he was open to be questioned on any particular. If any interrogatory was put to him, it must have been in a manner so light and so professedly colloquial, as that there was no thought of reducing what passed in that manner to writing; but nothing of the kind is retained by my memory. I am speaking of topics distinct from that which is represented in a minute of mine on the occasion, as that minute was transmitted home and was commented upon by the hon. court; its subject will not come within the description of information withheld. Sir Wm. Rumbold's offer to wait upon Mr. Stuart, at his own house, with the accounts, was included in that part of the discussion. Observations on that point shall be reserved till I shew it in context with matter which will define its bearing. Reverting to the forbearance which has entailed too rigorous a construction from the hon. court, I may truly say, that, if I acted improvidently for myself in not causing these particulars to be recorded on the proceedings of council, I still cannot regret a delicacy no less due to the hon. court than to Mr. Stuart. No foresight could have looked to the possibility of such an interpretation as I have experienced. My having refrained from gratuitously obtruding upon the hon. court a detail at once so superfluous and so unpleasant may perhaps now be thought not absolutely blameable."

Mr. Stuart resumed. The examination of Mr. John Palmer happened, he thought, about a year and a half subsequently to the period when these conversations took place. The latter was held on the 9th of October 1830, and the former on the 10th of May 1832. Now very little importance, he knew, was to be attached to reports of conversations given from memory, and why? Because, from the natural imperfection of memory, parts of a conversation were apt to get severed from their context, and thus the sense was distorted. He said this because the effect of his observations was not stated by Mr. Palmer in stronger terms than was warranted by the fact. He entirely coincided in the honourable character which the Marquess of Hastings had, in his letter, given of Mr. Palmer; but, in justice to himself he (Mr. Stuart) could not but say, that his memory failed him when he stated that he (Mr. Stuart) had expressed his conviction that Mr. Russell was connected with the house. Though he had but a very imperfect recollection of that conversation, he could at least assert that what passed had a bearing only on the subject of some reports which had got afloat. Mr. John Palmer was the brother of Mr. Wm. Palmer, and of course could not fail to be familiar with the whole of the transactions between the house and Mr. Russell. He must have been more so than he (Mr. Stuart), and it was therefore improbable that he (Mr. Stuart) should have endeavoured, by such a conversation, to do Mr. Russell so serious an injury. While upon this subject he would make a few observations on the manner in which the examination of Mr. John Palmer was conducted by the Marquess of Hastings. Mr. Palmer was merely asked questions of a general nature; the Marquess did not request him to repeat the conversation itself, but merely the conclusion he drew from it. Now what answer did Mr. Palmer make? He replied in three words, "Yes, I did." He (Mr. Stuart) considered he was justified in giving his opinion on the subject when he saw such an examination as that reported. He could assure the court he did no more than allude to the reports then prevalent. (Hear!) He would next make a few observations on the proposed examination of Sir Wm. Rumbold, as reported by the Marquess of Hastings, which made its appearance two years subsequently to the transaction to which it referred. His lordship was certainly constantly employed in a variety of most important affairs, and, therefore, they ought to make due allowance for any trifling inaccuracy which had crept into his statement; for they would easily see that the impression left by an event of comparatively small interest would be weakened by those weighty transactions. He wished this consideration to be kept within sight, because he must say he did observe several inaccuracies in his lordship's description of his behaviour on that occasion. He said that he (Mr. Stuart) started up. Now he (Mr. Stuart) recollected larded that on the introduction of Sir Wm. Rumbold it was proposed by the Marquess of Hastings, without assigning any reason, that he should be sworn. Of course he (Mr. Stuart) concluded his lordship adopted that course in order to elicit some evidence not to be applied to a public purpose, but for their own private information. Immediately on my finding out my mistake I opposed the proposal for putting Sir W. Rumbold on oath. He found, besides, that the question proposed by the noble Marquess to be put to Sir Wm. was not exactly what he had stated it to be. His (Mr. Stuart's) motive for opposing the swearing was in consideration to Mr. Russell, for he considered the whole proceeding to be unjust towards Mr. Russell. He wished the grounds to be distinctly stated, to shew the necessity of such a proceeding. The noble Marquess said his conduct was dictated by candour and delicacy towards him (Mr. Stuart.) He sincerely regretted his lordship's idea of candour and delicacy differed so entirely from his; but what was the true state of the case? The Marquess of Hastings had got possession of a confidential communication; Mr. Palmer it was evident did not wish that it should be applied to any purpose. The thing deeply concerned both his (Mr. Stuart's) honour and that of Mr. Russell. Now his lordship adopted a strange line of conduct, he comes to the council and without any preparation,—

A Proprietor thought the hon. gentleman not strictly in order. He did not conceive he should be permitted to impeach the Marquess of Hastings' character in this manner he was doing. (Cries of hear!)

Mr. Stuart would submit to the decision of the court. He did not think he was out of order in attempting to shew that the noble Marquess had not a correct notion of candour and delicacy: in that alone consisted the attack he had made upon him. He surely would be allowed to do that, in a case too in which his own character was concerned. The noble Marquess ought to have informed him of the line of conduct he intended to adopt. Such a course was due to candour and common fairness. As it was, he (Mr. Stuart) was placed in the situation of Mr. Russell's accuser: he was called upon as the impeacher of that gentleman's honour and integrity, and he would not submit to wear that character: it was for that reason he opposed the intended examination on oath of Sir Wm. Rumbold. He did not think the noble Marquess correct when he stated that he waived the question. His (Mr. Stuart's) impression was, that his lordship persevered in putting the question, and that the answer of Sir Wm. Rumbold, he must in justice say, completely cleared the character of Mr. Russell. He would, he repeated, bear testimony to the character of Mr. John Palmer:

he could not, however, help regretting that he had ever mentioned the reports that had come to his hearing, instead of burying them in his own bosom; then all the painful discussions which that imprudent step had originated, would never have taken place. On the other hand, he appealed to the justice of the court, whether the allusion he had made to reports, which were without question prevalent, deserved to have called forth the epithet an hon. proprietor (hon. D. Kinnaird) had applied to it. That hon. proprietor had stigmatised his allusion as "slandrous." He would submit that question to the candour of the court. The hon. proprietor, in his pamphlet, next spoke of Mr. Sherer's letter, and the hon. proprietor made a serious charge upon him (Mr. Stuart) in his observations on that subject. He would, however, have the letter read, as it would otherwise be difficult to understand the matter; he should, therefore, beg the clerk to read the letter, which was inserted at page 17 of the printed papers.

The following letter was then read:—
"To Sir C. Metcalf, Secretary to the Government, Political Department.

"Sir: I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, transmitting copies of correspondence with the Resident at Hyderabad, and requiring my opinion as to the expediency, in a financial view, with reference to the interests of the Nizam's government, and ultimately perhaps of our own, of the arrangements concluded at Hyderabad between the Nizam's government and the house of Wm. Palmer and Co.

"That arrangement," the Resident observes, in his letter to your address, dated the 28th of April last, 'was first suggested by Captain G. Sydenham to Messrs. Palmer and Co., proposed by them to me, and mentioned by me to the minister.'

"It appears that to enable Messrs. Palmer and Co. to establish a banking-house at Aurungabad, for the purpose of making a monthly loan to the Nizam's government of two lacs of rupees for the payment of the troops in Berar, the minister agreed to grant to those gentlemen assignments on the revenues of the country, to the amount of thirty lacs of rupees annually, the extra six lacs being required, in the words of the agreement, 'to cover defects in the revenues, to cover interest, and to give facility to the establishment to make the required monthly payments.' Mr. Russell adds, 'the conclusion of the arrangement has my entire concurrence.'

"I would beg, however, with much deference, to submit, in the first place, whether, under act 37 Geo. III. cap. 142, for preventing British subjects from being concerned in loans to the native princes in India, Mr. Russell was competent to give his sanction to any such arrangement.

arrangement. Section 28 of that act declares, 'nor shall any British subject, by himself or by any other person, either directly or indirectly, for his use and benefit, take, receive, hold, enjoy, or be concerned in, any bond, note, or other security or assignment, granted or to be granted, by any such native prince, after the 1st day of December next, for the loan or for the repayment of money, or other valuable thing, without the consent and approbation of the Court of Directors of the East India Company, or the consent and approbation of the Governor in Council of one of the said Company's governments in India, first had and obtained in writing.' Had the consent or approbation of any of the governments in India been obtained to the arrangements concluded at Hyderabad, between the Nizam's government and the house of Palmer and Co., the circumstance would necessarily, I conceive, have been adverted to in the correspondence before me.

"In regard to the necessity of this arrangement, Mr. Russell observes—'Considerable difficulties having been experienced at Aurungabad, in procuring adequate funds for the payment of the regular battalions and reformed horse in Berar, it became absolutely necessary to substitute some other system to that which had hitherto prevailed, and which had been rendered defective, principally by the mismanagement of the country, the improvidence of the government, and the increasing difficulties of the Talookdars, and in some measure, certainly, by the misconduct of Rajah Govind Buxsh.'

"But, how the evils here stated were to be obviated by the arrangement in question, the entire substance of which is given in paragraph 3 above, is surely far from obvious; though Mr. Russell styles it 'the only plan which afforded a prospect of efficiency.'

"It is true, that by granting assignments on the revenue for a special purpose, the government deprived itself of the power of dissipating the revenue so assigned; but Messrs. Palmer and Co. incur no obligation under this arrangement, to pay the troops; if at any time the mismanagement of the country, or the increasing difficulties of the Talookdars, should obstruct their means. Their fourth requisition expressly provides—'That the minister should furnish the best tunkhas, and that the aumils should be urged to adhere to regularity in their payments, as it will otherwise prevent the house, by a deficiency of its funds, from making the payments with punctuality.'

"In Palmer and Co.'s letter to Mr. Russell, of the 25th of April last, assuring him that they have never understood that a guarantee of any sort was afforded to them by the British government; or that any pecuniary liability whatever, on the part of the hon. Company, was involved in this arrangement; they observe—'We were by no means influenced to enter into our engagements at Aurungabad, with a view to any considerable pecuniary benefits. We could have employed our capital more advantageously, and our principal object was to recommend ourselves to the favourable notice of the supreme government, by making ourselves useful in promoting your public objects.' Again: 'We have no security for the liquidation of the orders granted to us on the revenues of certain districts beyond the good faith of the minister, and such an eventual support from your influence, as from the justice of our demands and the public utility of our agreement, you may deem it proper to afford us.'

"From all this it may, I conceive, be safely inferred, at least, that the assignments annually granted to Palmer and Co. have been hitherto realized by them with sufficient regularity; that if they neither looked for, nor have derived from, this arrangement 'considerable pecuniary benefits,' the twenty per cent. tunkhas required by them in excess of their payments to the troops, 'to cover deficits in the revenue, to cover interest, and to give facility to the establishment to make the required monthly payments,' has been found fully adequate to their purposes, and that the house has derived its estimated profit.

"But in this case there has been no want of funds, on the part of the Nizam's government for the payment of the troops; and the question occurs, whether those funds could not be rendered available for the purposes of the government, in a manner less objectionable than through the agency of a private house of business.

"Messrs. Palmer and Co. observe, 'that in a country where there are no regular courts of judicature, we never could have established an extensive mercantile concern without conviction that we should receive from the Resident that support which is essential to the transactions of any British merchant in this country.' Whatever support may be here alluded to, it is obvious to remark, that the absence of regular courts of judicature is an argument equally strong against investing any one, not under the immediate control of authority, with powers which, in such a country, may be so easily abused.

"Unless, therefore, the most urgent necessity can be shewn for an arrangement, which, to the influence of an extensive mercantile concern in such a country, adds that of obtaining assignments on its revenues, to the extent of thirty lacs per annum, the arrangement must, I conceive, be regarded as in the highest degree objectionable. In a financial view I am unable to discern from this correspondence, any necessity in this case.

"In order, however, to enable the government to form a judgment on this point, it may be advisable to instruct the Resident at Hyderabad to endeavour to obtain figured statements from Messrs. Palmer and Co. of the whole of their pecuniary transactions with the Nizam's government under this arrangement, exhibiting the following particulars, viz.

"1st. The sums paid by them in advance to the Nizam's government from time to time.

"2d. The interest thereon charged and received by them, specifying dates.

"3d. The tunkhas received and realized by them, specifying dates.

"4th. The payments made to them in cash at Aurungabad, under the third article of the agreement.

"5th. The discount and premium on different currencies admitted under the fifth article of the agreement.

"6th. The premium on bills admitted under the sixth article of the agreement.

"I have, &c.

(Signed) "J. W. SHERER, Accountant-General."

Mr. Stuart resumed:—They had heard the letter denounced by the hon. proprietor, as an attack on Mr. Russell's character. The hon. proprietor had even gone so far as to assert, that it was suggested by him (Mr. Stuart). Now he would ask any candid person, was there any cause to justify that assertion? Had the hon. proprietor any reason to put that construction on the letter? The hon. proprietor would oblige him by stating the grounds on which he founded his charge.

The hon. D. Kinnaird could only repeat what he had already said in the pamphlet, at page 59. (The hon. proprietor then read the following extract:—)

"Because the two letters of the Resident were laid before the Accountant-General, for the purpose of enabling him to understand the question submitted, he thinks proper to dedicate twelve out of the thirteen paragraphs, of which the letter consists, to matters totally distinct from the question in which his opinion was or could have been required. First, in utter ignorance that the house had received a license from the Governor-General in Council, three years before, exempting them, in the terms of the 37th Geo. III. from its penalties, he is pleased to inform them, that parties are prohibited by that act, from having any pecuniary transactions whatever with the Nizam; for, he adds, that 'he presumes, that had the house received such a license, the circumstance would have been alluded to in the correspondence submitted to him.'

He next solemnly intrudes his doubts on the political question, whether a private house of business be a proper channel through which to make payments to the troops, and further (assuming falsely such to be the fact) denounces the danger of entrusting to persons not under the control of immediate authority, in a country where there are no regular courts of judicature, powers which may be so easily abused. What powers he assumes or alludes to, he does not condescend to name. In point of fact, the house neither had nor exercised any powers whatever. Although he has, in his twelfth paragraph, flippantly denounced the arrangement as highly objectionable, the following words contain the only answer he is pleased to give to the question in which his opinion is asked—

Mr. R. Jackson must speak to order. He was sorry to interrupt his hon. friend, but he submitted it would be a more convenient course to appoint a day in which to discuss the question at issue between him and the hon. proprietor (Mr. Stuart) (Laughter). But, of courtesy, he gave way to the hon. proprietor, in order to his entering into an explanation with regard to a charge against him; but really some distinction ought to be drawn between a casual explanation and a discussion of an hour long calculated to mistify them and leave them in darkness.

The Chairman put it to the consideration of the hon. proprietor, whether a sufficient opportunity had not been afforded him for explaining.

Mr. Stuart would submit himself to the decision of the court; he was in their hands, and would bow to the general wish. He had intended to offer a few more remarks on the subject of the imputations which had been cast upon him, but he would sit down contented with what he had already said.

Mr. R. Jackson then rose and addressed the court to the question. Nothing could have overcome his reluctance to lengthen the present protracted discussion, had it not been for the hon. Chairman's amendment. He would have been quite satisfied to have let the question remain with the speech of the hon. introducer of the motion; and that of the gallant General by whom it was supported. But dear as was the character of the Marquess of Hastings to his friends, dear as the character of the hon. proprietor behind him (Mr. Russell) must be to that hon. proprietor, the whole question sunk into nothingness when the consequences of the amendment were taken into consideration; the attack upon their privileges contained in that amendment was the grossest which he had ever had the misfortune to witness. Let them reflect how the matter stood, and he thought the hon. chairman himself would shrink from the contemplation of his own amendment. Let them look to the way in which it was brought forward; in the first place was moved a mere proposition, declaring that nothing appeared in the Hyderabad papers to affect the honour of Lord Hastings; and and the hon. Chairman, in common with the rest of the court, surprised his approbation of the calm and temperate manner in which the last mover had introduced the question. Its terms had been published to the world; and every gentleman came to that court prepared to discuss it as thus announced. What course then did their Chairman take? He would venture to assert that an instance of similar conduct on the part of the Chairman could not be shown. When he (Mr. R. Jackson) was a young man, at a time when political feeling ran high in that court, he did indeed remember that a question of very great public importance was brought before the court, which had been, as now, specially convened; on that occasion the Chairman, immediately on the court's assembling, attempted to introduce a motion of his own; and what was the consequence? Every member of the court felt that if such a course was permitted, there would be an end to all freedom of debate. Every proprietor felt his rights to be endangered by so extraordinary a proceeding, and they, one and all, without regard to party, exclaimed against it: the Chairman felt the reproof, and did, what he (Mr. R. Jackson) hoped their present hon. Chairman would upon reflection do; he saw he had, in a moment of inadvertence, committed an act inconsistent with the deliberative functions of the general court, and he withdrew his motion. What was the usual way in which an amendment was introduced? Why, surely, not until after discussion and argument, could an amendment be proposed, without a violation of common sense! Did they ever hear of a case where an amendment was moved immediately after reading the original motion? In the present instance, without any notice of its nature, no sooner was the advertised motion put and seconded, than he, their Chairman, came forward with another motion which he called an amendment, entirely distinct from the question before the court, accompanied by an invocation, which, in that court seldom failed of success, with those to whom it was particularly addressed, that the chair might be supported. From that moment he (Mr. R. Jackson) perceived that the honour of the Marquess of Hastings was gone for ever, as far as depended upon that court.

Mr. Weeding. Did the hon. proprietor then mean to say that there was no honour in the court? He would have him to know that he (Mr. Weeding) was as independent a man as he (Mr. R. Jackson) was.

Mr. Patten entreated they would allow the hon. proprietor to deliver his sentiments without interruption, and to be treated with due civility.

Mr. R. Jackson felt assured that a protection which always extended to members of that court could never fail him; he meant that of the chair. In the Chairman he should always find a protector, and he hoped, if, in the heat of debate, he should be led into any undue freedom of expression, he (the Chairman) would excuse him. He felt confident he would never incur his displeasure, or be condemned to silence for delivering his sentiments in the plain way he had always been accustomed to do in that court. He contended, then, that if the example set by the Chairman were to be followed an end would be put at once to all real debate. No individual's character could strive for an hour against such influence, be it that of the Marquess of Hastings, of Lord Wellesley, of Lord Cornwallis, of Warren Hastings, or of any other person, if such a course were to be persevered in; if backed by all the influence of office, an influence which in the present instance was increased by the amiable character of the gentleman who filled the chair. The original motion went to declare that the court saw nothing in the papers before them, that at all affected the honour and integrity of the Marquess of Hastings; but their Chairman had added to this motion, certain other propositions, of which the court had not the slightest previous intimation, and had substituted for the words "honour and integrity," the cold, unkindly and half criminating word, "corrupt." He could not guess the reason why that word was selected in preference to others. The amendment said that there was nothing to charge the Marquess with being "corrupt," adding, "or any other member of the Bengal government;" and then proposed to approve of four accusatory despatches, in order to give them circulation throughout all Europe and India; and this too without the answers that had been given to them, although they occurred in the pages immediately succeeding. Justice was all that he asked for; equal justice. He wished the same measure to be dealt out to the Marquess of Hastings as to the humblest porter in that house; but if these accusatory despatches were circulated without the answers of the noble Marquess, it would be the height of injustice; such an act as every man in that court would shrink from committing towards his most menial servant. You, Mr. Chairman, acquit, you say, the noble Marquess of corruption, and yet you assert he has compromised his character; but where was the proof? He (Mr. R. Jackson) had looked with impatience for the instances of compromise, which he naturally supposed would be brought forward, but he had looked in vain. There was not a single instance of the noble Marquess having compromised his character—not an iota; not a tittle of evidence given by the hon. Chairman in support of his charge. The surprise he felt, on the strange introduction of the amendment, without the least reference to fact, was in some degree removed, when he saw three hon. gentlemen on the other side rise in succession, with so much appearance of preparation in its support he then immediately was convinced that instances of the kind of compromise to which the Chairman alluded, had been duly arranged to support his allegation. Another reason given for the amendment was, that the question had been forced upon the directors; this was most extraordinary! Who forced on this debate, or what forced it? why the lamentable, the unfortunate, the calamitous silence of the hon. Chairman's predecessor. He did not wish to speak disparagingly, but he must contend that it was the unaccountable silence of their former Chairman that compelled the friends of the Marquess of Hastings to bring the subject forward. It could not be forgotten that an individual rose up in that court, and, stating that a newspaper had charged Lord Hastings with having committed a defalcation to the amount of £300,000, appealed to the Chairman to say whether or no there was any truth in the statement? It might be said, that the hon. individual thus appealed to was thrown off his guard by the suddenness of the question, but be that as it might, the effects of his conduct were not the less lamentable. Instead of almost springing from his seat, and exclaiming, "ruffian and liar!" he shook his head with great solemnity, and said, "He was not at liberty to answer the question." From that moment the character of the Marquess of Hastings was degraded throughout India, throughout Europe, and wherever the tale could be heard. He sunk so much in the estimation of the unreflecting as to place it beyond the power of his friends in that court to raise him; and he (Mr. R. Jackson) believed that nothing short of a vote of the houses of parliament could reinstate him in the opinion of the world, after that suspicious reply. Was he not therefore justified in asserting that the hon. Chairman's predecessor was the man who had forced on this discussion? But what was it the hon. Chairman, and those who supported his amendment, were going to do? The first proposition in their amendment acquitted the Marquess of Hastings of corruption, and likewise called upon the court to acquit in the same terms the other members of the Bengal government. One of the members of that government, whom he had not the honour to know, was then present; but the name and family of another member of that government were very dear to him, and he must confess, if he stood there commissioned to defend him, if he were the brother of Mr. Adam, he should utterly disavow that part of the amendment; (Hear!) for what is its object, but to circulate through the House and India that Mr. John Adam had been acquitted of corruption? John Adam acquitted of corruption? Who had said that he was guilty of corruption? Moved there the tongue that dared charge him with corruption? That acquittal at least implied accusation and trial, and yet, he asked, where were the accusers of Mr. Adam? The hon. Chairman's amendment had diverted the whole discussion, and struck him (Mr. R. Jackson) the moment it was brought forward, to be a manœuvre of no ordinary skill. He immediately perceived the snare which was laid for the Marquess of Hastings—the net which was cast over the question; through which it would be impossible for him to escape without the loss of his honour, as far as the loss of the question could affect it. Did the hon. proprietor on the other side (Mr. Stuart) like the idea of being acquitted of corruption? If so, he (Mr. R. Jackson) was sorry their tastes on that point were so different. (Hear!) He was sure that no one who had ventured to charge him with corruption, would have been listened to for a moment. (Hear!) If the hon. gentleman is willing to have it published to the world, that he had been tried and acquitted of a charge of corruption, he (Mr. R. J.) had no objection: he thought it a strange choice, but there was no accounting for tastes! Before he proceeded to make his observations on the despatches of the Court of Directors, he must remark that the amendment did not proceed from the directors, as a body, but from the Chairman individually, as himself had declared. The hon. baronet, who had seconded the amendment, had declared that he was as ready as the hon. mover of the original question, or any other man, to bear testimony to the strict honour and integrity of the Marquess of Hastings; but why did not the Deputy-Chairman second the Chairman's motion as was usual? The circumstance must have struck the court as a little singular. He (Mr. R. Jackson) could give an answer to that question: he had chanced only that morning to read a just and manly eulogium on the noble Marquess, which had been delivered by the honourable Deputy, and that was the reason of his not seconding the amendment; for he did not wish to put his own words, and had seen no cause to retract those sentiments! But why did the hon. baronet second it? he will, when Deputy Chairman, had expressed his approbation of the noble Marquess's conduct, subsequently to the transactions under consideration. He (Mr. R. Jackson) had, of course, expected him to acquit that noble individual of every imputation on his character, when out came the real reason which the hon. baronet had for seconding the amendment. The hon. baronet had, it seems, a secret aversion was proposed, that if the noble Lord's motion was carried, some inquiry was meant to be asked for; but he would beg leave to tell the hon. member, that if that House were full of silver and gold, and his noble motion would bestow further consideration on the noble Marquess, he (Mr. R. Jackson) would not make that motion while there remained the shadow of an imputation on that nobleman's character; and if there was a man in the world, who, were he even reduced to the extreme poverty, and compelled to quit his palace and inhabit a hovel, would reject the proffered gift with contempt and scorn, it was the noble Marquess, unless his character was restored to him pure and unspotted (Hear, hear.) It was most unfair to circulate the four accusatory despatches without their antidote, namely his Lordship's answers. He intended, if the original motion should unfortunately not be carried, to move an amendment upon what would then become the main question—which should compass that object, and he anticipated that the hon. Chairman would give him his support. The world will then have an opportunity of judging between the parties. It would then be seen whether the noble Marquess had answered the charges of the Court of Directors. He would beg the court to remember the list of conduct adopted by the hon. member for Midhurst (Mr. J. Smith), than whom a more conscientious and upright man did not exist. That hon. proprietor had admitted that he came to the consideration of the question, with doubts or prejudices on his mind, and upon those doubts he had acted. When, some time ago, his hon. friend (Mr. D. Kinnaird) moved that the court should take into consideration, the propriety of making a further grant to the Marquess of Hastings, the hon. member for Midhurst rose, and made what he (Mr. Jackson) thought a very just remark—he said he should first wish to have cleared up some reports which were in circulation affecting the character of the Marquess of Hastings. He (Mr. J.) had seconded the hon. member in his view of the subject, and the consequence was, the printing all the papers which respected Lord Hastings' administration. (Hear.) Now the noble Marquess' friends very naturally thought, that if the papers were confined to those relating to the Hyderabad affair, it might be thought that the selection implied suspicion. At their request, therefore, all the papers, that had any relation to the noble Marquess's administration, were ordered to be included in the vote. The hon. member for Midhurst, had, without design, conferred the highest obligation on his country, in procuring the publication of the three volumes of his lordship's administration; it comprised such was and pure principles for the government of the India, empire, and unfolded such a series of facts respecting it, as were but little known, even to the best read men in that country. Blackstone was usually given to young lawyers to ground their stock of knowledge upon, and he would maintain that those papers might, with equal propriety, be given to young Indian statesmen, for if any thing was calculated to accomplish them in their profession, they were. (Laugh.) Gentlemen might smile, but he could assure them that, without any disparagement to the present Court of Directors, if every candidate for a seat in the direction, were obliged, as a necessary qualification, to certify their having studied them, the Company would not be lessably served (Hear.) "I have read," said the hon. member for Midhurst, "I have read through the papers, and have laboured to render myself thoroughly acquainted with their contents. Do you ask me if my doubts still remain? I answer, no; they do not. I am perfectly satisfied that the papers contain nothing to affect, in the slightest degree, the honour of the Marquess of Hastings. Am I asked, is the noble Marquess an honest or a dishonest man? I reply without hesitation that the honour of the noble Marquess stands unshaken for any thing that is contained in these papers." Now the (Mr. R. J.) thought this was a fair way of putting the question. That hon. member (Mr. J. Smith) went on to remark on the painful situation in which he was placed. "He had," he said, "been always accustomed to pay deference to the opinion of the hon. Chairman, but regretted he could not do so on the present occasion. He could not bring himself to agree to his amendment; he thought there was something unfair in it, it read as if framed with a double meaning," and such, continued Mr. Jackson, was evidently the case, because while it affected to clear the character of the noble Marquess, it in fact impugned it. The former part of the amendment pretended to acquit, while the latter part presented the dagger and the bowl. He could not but exclaim against the cruelty of giving to the world, what purported to be an acquittal of the noble Marquess, and appending to the instrument, four accusatory despatches. The hon. member for Midhurst had strangled such a proceeding as being disingenuous and unfair, and his worthy friend behind him (Mr. Dixon) had taken the same view of the subject. He had said, "it is true the amendment acquits the noble Marquess of dishonourable motives, but it carries in its tail such a sting, as might wound him to death." The gentlemen, who rose immediately after the bringing forward of that amendment, had spoken upon it with so great a degree of prudence, as to induce one to suspect they had prepared their speeches to tally with that which came upon most others by surprise, who were only prepared for the real question before the court. One of them in particular, his hon. friend (Mr. Poynder) had entered with great minuteness, into details respecting Mr. Russell and Sir Wm. Rumbold, and the house of Palmer and Co.; but when he came to connect those statements with the Marquess of Hastings, he entirely failed. That hon. proprietor must be aware that he did not advance onestep, unless he could apply such evidence to the original motion. Suppose all that his hon. friend had stated to be admitted—let it be granted that the affidavit was false—that the house of Palmer and Co. was as dishonest as he endeavoured to make it out to be; yet he (Mr. R. J.) asked what had all that to do with the Marquess of Hastings, unless a culpable knowledge of culpable facts, could be brought home to his lordship? He hoped, too, that his hon. friend (Mr. Carruthers) who spoke next, would not be offended with him if he removed the whole foundation on which he had built his proposed verdict of guilty; for he (Mr. R. J.) agreed, that the question was one of guilty or not guilty. The Marquess of Hastings was pronounced guilty by those who adopted the amendment. For, although his (Mr. R. J.'s) own opinion would not be in the least affected by an amendment, which he saw through the design of, he should have to deplore, that an assembly, which, not long ago, he had heard raise its voice in praise of the noble Marquess, when a vote of thanks was passed, describing to him the most transcendent qualities, should now be brought to condemn him; by passing, under the guise of an amendment, a vote so directly contradictory to their former resolution. Let the supporters of the amendment consider the painful consequences of adopting that resolution; let them consider what will be the effect of their verdict, for such they styled it. His hon. friend who had spoken first on the question (Mr. Poynder), had argued throughout, on the assumption, that the sole object of establishing the house of Palmer and Co., was to benefit the protégé of the Marquess of Hastings, Sir Wm. Rumbold. As he (Mr. R. J.) saw the importance of having the dates of all the transactions particularly specified, he called upon the hon. proprietor to state them. The position of the hon. proprietor was, that the license was granted to the house for the purpose of benefiting Sir Wm. Rumbold: if that were proved to have been the case, and if it were shown, that such a measure had operated to the disadvantage of the Company, he would admit, that the Marquess of Hastings had taken a step which was highly reprobable. (Hear!) In a minute his lordship, he said, "If I had shewn favour to Sir Wm. Rumbold, or any other person, in any degree to the prejudice of the Company's interests, in that degree I am corrupt." The house then applied for the sanction of government, in February 1814, for the purpose of extending their mercantile concerns. Sir C. Metcalf has stated, that this was all a pretence; but it so happened, that, upon obtaining the sanction of government, the house had introduced into the Hyderabad dominions, not less than £900,000 worth of British manufactures. When the house applied for the sanction, no negotiation was on foot, or thought of, for the admission of Sir Wm. Rumbold into the partnership. The sanction of the Bengal government was granted in 1814; and this sanction, said to have been given from motives of partiality or favouritism, was confirmed by the Court of Directors, who, in their first despatch to India, after they were informed of the reasons which had induced such sanction, said, "We see no objection to it." Now, shortly after this, Mr. John Palmer was applied to, to join the firm of Palmer and Co., of Hyderabad; but he declined, and recommended Sir Wm. Rumbold as a partner. The house then made overtures to Sir Wm., and he requested the sanction of his Lordship, before giving a decided answer. Singular as the fact may appear, contrasted with such statements as they had heard from the hon. proprietor, the Marquess of Hastings continued, for a whole year, to discourage the project of Sir Wm. All the letters of the noble Marquess, up to the beginning of 1815, were against the proposed connexion. One objection was, that Sir Wm. must not risk his lady's fortune, to whom his lordship was guardian; and again he reminded Sir Wm. of the danger of speculating in pecuniary transactions, and of his liability for all losses to which the firm might be subjected. Sir Wm. Rumbold, however, in the beginning of 1815, consulted with an old and valued friend of his father's, Mr. De Fries of Madras, and that gentleman spoke very strongly in favour of the proposal, and dwelt on the advantages likely to arise from the connexion. When the opinion of Mr. De Fries was reported to Lord Hastings, he, at length, gave his consent to the wishes of Sir Wm. Rumbold. Now, he would ask, what not that motive for the hon. gentleman's verdict be relinquished, which was grounded on the supposition, that the sanction of the Marquess of Hastings was given to the house, solely with a view of benefiting Sir Wm. Rumbold, who could not then, according to dates, be in his contemplation? His Lordship had, indeed, been loudly arraigned respecting the terms in which he expressed his permission to Sir Wm. Rumbold. The letter conveying his his consent had been the subject of much expectation, and all the supporters of the amendment agreed in saying, that it was "the only, the very keynote of their case." He (Mr. R.) would not argue the latter being a private case. In his opinion, it did not need that kind of defence, for it contained much that redounded to the noble Marquess's credit. It was such a letter as a kind and provident father would have written to his son, who was about to enter the world under such circumstances. When he first read that document, he exclaimed, "here is a characteristic specimen of the frankness of Lord Hastings, and of his unsophisticated mode of conducting himself in every action of his life." He would read them the letter; and when they considered it was written to a young and inexperienced friend; they would confess it did the writer honour.—"My dear Sir Wm. The account you have given of the house of Palmer and Co., at Hyderabad is very favourable; and, certainly, the details justify your inclination for going to that city, in order to inspect the books. I inclose you a letter to the Resident, couched in terms which will ensure to you his attentions and most earnest good offices. The partners speculate, that you being one of the firm, will interest me in the welfare of the house, to a degree which may be materially beneficial to them: it is a fair and honest calculation. The amount of advantage which the countenance of government may bestow, must be uncertain, as, I apprehend, it would flow principally from the opinion the natives would entertain of the respect likely to be paid by their own government, to an establishment known to stand well in the favour of the supreme authority here." Now, he (Mr. J.) thought, that when all the circumstances of the case were taken into consideration, the styling the expectation of the firm "a fair and honest calculation," was a very natural expression on the part of the Marquess of Hastings, in referring to the value or good-will of the concern. And what right had they to infer, that the Marquess had only Sir Wm. Rumbold in his mind when he penned the latter sentence? It was a well-known fact, that the house stood high in the favour of the government, before there was any idea of Sir Wm. Rumbold's connection with it. The friendly disposition of the government towards the house, had been shown by the granting of their public sanction, early in 1814, which sanction the Directors had approved. The letter continues:—"Perhaps a more distinct benefit may attend the firm from the consequent discouragement as competition with you, by any other British partnership, to which a similar proposed sanction would not be granted." The supposition of the amendment will have it, that this latter sentence increases the guilt of the noble Marquess twenty fold. They had been told by the hon. proprietor (Mr. Poynder), that he had spent nights and days in reading over these papers. He (Mr. R. J.) would give him credit for this fact: no man, who had not spent nights and days in their study, could have so adroitly picked out the text, and discarded the context, of every passage relating to the noble Marquess; every passage, which, by any construction, however forced, could be applied, to criminate his Lordship, was earnestly dwelt on; while every sentence, that rebutted the imputation was carefully kept back. It was not till after reiterated cries of "read on!" that the hon. gentleman prevailed upon himself to read the following passage, which, to any candid and intelligent mind, must seem to clear up the whole.—"It is on the ground of service to the Nizam, at the request of our Resident, that I have consented to let the good wishes of the government for the prosperity of this firm, be signified—no new establishment could have such a plea." And what were these services which the house had rendered to the Nizam? That house had been instrumental in bringing about those glorious events for which that court had already thanked the noble Marquess. They afforded their aid in rendering efficient that force, which had crushed the Pindarrees; who, to the number of 40,000, were, for three years together, devastating a peaceable country, and carrying fire and sword into the heart of central India! They assisted in the destruction of the combined Mahratta force; which, had it not been put down, would have put down us! Had any other British firm contributed to these great ends as the house of Palmer and Co. had done? Who else had furnished pecuniary means towards the annihilation of those hostile powers which threatened destruction to our empire in India? Could they, he asked them, as men of honour, from any thing that letter contained, bring in a verdict of guilty against the Marquess of Hastings? Could they say that the sentence last read, which assigned such high grounds for the sanction given to the house, in fact implied corruption! and yet they must so conclude, or deeply debase themselves by their verdict of guilty! The hon. gentleman (Mr. Poynder) had drawn most of his conclusions, and grounded many of his statements on those made by Sir C. Metcalf, wild and contradictory as they were; for instance, in one of those statements it was insinuated that money had been given by the Nizam's acting minister to Sir W. Rumbold. Speaking on this subject, Sir Charles says, in his despatch, that he had strictly examined Chandoo Loll as to whether he had ever made presents to Sir W. Rumbold, adding, (or in words to that effect), "I admit that the minister solemnly denies it, but Mr. George Rumbold, his brother, received something; and according to my opinion of Sir William, he was not very likely to go without his share of the booty." Now this was the sort of evidence on which the hon. proprietor proposed to find his verdict of guilty against Lord Hastings—it put him in mind of the fable of the "wolf and the lamb." A wolf, wishing to destroy a lamb, accused it of having done him an injury at some particular time. The lamb, in defence, put in a most convincing plea, namely, that he was not born at the time specified by the wolf. Then it must have been your father, said the wolf. This charge, however, was also refuted. No matter, said the wolf, it must then have been your grand-father, and that is in substance the same—this was conclusive, and the victim fell! (Great laughter.) Another statement of Sir C. Metcalf's had been read with peculiar emphasis by the hon. gentleman. Sir Charles stated, that he had no doubt but that Mr. Russell was secretly connected with the house—"I certainly have no evidence of the fact," said Sir Charles, "nor is it in my power to obtain any; but I have an impression that amounts to a secret conviction, that he is a partner, and that I firmly believe." And I, said the hon. proprietor, echoing the sentiment—and so do I believe it too!—(Heur!) He must confess to the hon. gentleman, and he looked for his forgiveness, that after he heard that sentence, his attention to his speech flagged. He could no longer listen to an address in which conclusions were drawn from assumptions like those against a second person, in order thereon to found a verdict of guilty against a third, namely, Lord Hastings!—it was monstrous! He would now proceed (Mr. J. said) to offer a few observations on what fell from his hon. friend (Mr. Carruthers); and he anticipated that if he could shew that he had been as much in error as the gentleman who preceded him, he would shrink from his intended verdict of guilty! He supposed that he should not be injuring his (Mr. Carruthers's) line of argument if he quoted some of his observations from the Times newspaper. His hon. friend was there made to say, "It must be recollected that the license was granted for the benefit of the Nizam, not for the benefit of Messrs. Palmer and Co." Indeed! for the benefit of the Nizam! then what becomes of all the scandalous assertions, that the license was granted for the exclusive advantage of Sir W. Rumbold? One of the most strenuous supporters of the amendment had thus contradicted their favourite allegation—that which they called the arch and the keystone of their case. The report of his hon. friend's speech went on in the following manner—"Messrs. Stuart and Adam proposed that the money should be found by the Bengal government—that appeared to him (Mr. Carruthers) a sound proposition; but it was not approved of by the Marquess of Hastings. It was then proposed by Messrs. Stuart and Adam, that the money should be raised by competition, under the guarantee of the government, there being in 1820, a great glut of money in the Indian markets. That likewise appeared to him (Mr. Carruthers) a sound and reasonable proposition; but he still found the Marquess of Hastings opposing every measure proposed for the relief of the Nizam, and refusing the government's guarantee, except to the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co." Now if he could prove the whole premises here advanced by his hon. friend, to be entirely erroneous, he was sure he was the last man in the world to pronounce a verdict of guilty. The first assertion here was, that the Marquess of Hastings had opposed the proposition of taking money from the public treasury to advance to the Nizam. He (Mr. R. Jackson) was ready to admit that he did so; but for what reason? It was, as the Marquess said, because that course was illegal—and what was the step which the noble Marquess did take on that occasion? He referred to the advocate-general for his opinion on the legal point, whether he might be allowed to lend the Nizam money out of the Bengal Treasury. The opinion of the advocate-general was directly against the legality of such a proceeding. Now, he asked his hon. friend, if the Marquess of Hastings in the teeth of the law officer's opinion, had relieved the Nizam's distresses in the way proposed, would he not have been assailed in language such as this;—"What! has he acted in opposition to the opinion of the first law officer, after having applied for it? There must certainly be rank corruption at the bottom of such conduct." His hon. friend next said, that there was a proposition for raising the money at Calcutta, by competition under the guarantee of government; but that this plan also met with the disapproval of his lordship. This he (Mr. R. Jackson) admitted, as well as the other charge; and he contended, that his lordship acted rightly in so disapproving of the suggestion. It was a well known fact that the Bombay government excited much displeasure on the part of the Court of Directors on the occasion of its having sanctioned a similar transaction. The Marquess of Hastings therefore very properly refused to contravene the express orders of the Court of Directors. And as to his lordship's having exclusively confined the guarantee of the government to the house of Palmer and Co., it was distinctly and flagrantly erroneous. Lord Hastings had not only expressly refused that house a guarantee, but insisted on, and obtained, a written declaration from them, that they did not consider themselves as possessing such a security. His hon. friend, however, was not satisfied with the reasons assigned by Lord Hastings; he would have it, that the noble Marquess had refused to listen to the propositions of Messrs. Adam and Stuart, because he wished to favour Sir W. Rumbold. It was not his (Mr. R. J.'s) intention to contend that the Marquess of Hastings was a faultless statesman. (Hear!) For what man could be styled so? He admitted there were parts in his lordship's conduct, from the policy of which he differed. To instance one fact, his proposal to build a Christian cathedral, with money obtained from a Mahomedan prince; the course, pursued by the Court of Directors, in putting a stop to that project, met with his entire approbation. (Hear!) Much as he held the character of Mr. John Adam in esteem, he could not but think he acted incorrectly, in appointing a minister of the gospel, to a situation in the Stationary office; and again, he thought the Court of Directors had done rightly in depriving the reverend person of his place. In his opinion, also, Mr. John Adam, had, at one time, allowed himself to be led away by the splenetic representations which Sir C. Metcalf had made, connected with the subject they were discussing. He had, however, since made the amende honorable to himself. His strong mind, had, at length, burst from the trammels which had been imposed on it, and in his two last letters to the Court of Directors, he frankly intimated that he had not time to go over the incessant despatches from Sir C. Metcalf, and that he therefore handed them over in masses, for the delighted perusal of the hon. court. Mr. Adam could no longer sacrifice the public business to the never-ending detail of Sir C. Metcalf's communications. He believed, that his last letter but one to the Court of Directors, consisting of about ten short paragraphs, enclosed upwards of thirty communications from that individual; and his last letter, consisting of half a dozen lines, covered forty-two enclosures from this formidable correspondent. The Burmese war had found the Bengal council different employment. Right glad he was that he possessed Mr. Adam's aid, and that he shipped off Sir C. Metcalf's despatches by the bale; to those who felt it no derogation to peruse such language, and record and even repeat such opprobrious epithets, as never had before appeared in their public correspondence with their servants. His hon. friend, however, who professed to have read the papers so attentively, ought, in candour to have stated to the court, that the directors, in their succeeding despatch, expressly approved of Lord Hastings' refusal of his assent, both with respect to the Bengal treasury and the guarantee. Though it was for this refusal, that the hon. gentleman proposed to vote his lordship guilty. He (Mr. R. Jackson) would now say a few words on his hon. friend's (Mr. Poynder's) observations, with respect to the affidavit. His hon. friend did, indeed admit that the affidavit was a true one, but charged it with displaying much of mental reserve, and evident evasion; and gave it as his opinion, that, had the form so shrewdly suggested by Sir C. Metcalf been followed, Messrs. Palmer and Rumbold must have been entrapped into perjury. The affidavit was, however, strictly true; for, at the time it was sworn, Mr. Sotheby had left the firm a year and a half. Now the Court of Directors quarrelled with it only on the ground that it was extra-judicial. Let them (the directors) not however think too lightly of extra-judicial oaths, when they considered, that, till the year 1793, the only oath of office between them and the proprietors was extra-judicial. The violation of this oath was not made perjury till the act of 1793. He now came to the speech of his hon. friend (Mr. Freshfield) who followed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carruthers), and he begged his forgiveness, for not noticing more than one point in it; as all the others were, in fact, the same as taken by those who preceded him on the same side. One, among the many objections which that hon. proprietor had to urge against the noble Marquess's conduct, was, his having received from Chundoo Loll, a complaint, respecting the oppressions, which, as a minister of the Nizam, he considered himself to be suffering from Sir C. Metcalf. It was, according to his hon. friend, a highly reprehensible step on the part of the noble Marquess, to communicate with Chundoo Loll, except through the Resident, of whose tyranny he complained. Indeed! Was it indecorous in the noble Marquess to receive a petition from a prince, who thought himself injured, through any other channel, than the hands of the person who was charged as the oppressor? He (Mr. Jackson) was extremely concerned to find the directors supporting that opinion. Had he himself a seat in the House of Commons, before three months had passed, he would endeavour to obtain a declaration of parliament, as to whether those princes called independent and styled our allies, when goaded and trampled on, should not be allowed to convey their complaints to the ear of the Governor-General. Though the noble Marquess had not entirely approved of the way in which the Nizam had communicated his complaint, yet he gave him the assurance of his protection, and that his case should undergo the

the strictest investigation. He thought the conduct of Sir C. Metcalf much to be questioned, in employing very young persons in situations of great authority in the Nizam's dominions. On this subject, the Marquess of Hastings made the following observations, in his minute, inserted at page 311 of the printed papers. "I am thoroughly inclined to concur in the character given by Mr. Metcalf to Mr. Wells, for talents and disposition; yet that gentleman when he was raised to so proud an exaltation, had not been a year and a half out of college, and another of the young gentlemen had left it not a year." Now these young gentlemen, and others like them, went so far as to set aside the most solemn contracts between the sovereign and his people! The Marquess of Hastings further observes: "Let us ask ourselves what would be expected were youths so little experienced in the world to be empowered in England to superintend a country? Would not intoxication from such early pre-eminence and revolting superciliousness, and irritating misapplication of authority, be anticipated. How much greater was the probability of such consequences, when those persons were placed over a population which they viewed as of inferior race, with the habits of which they were unconversant, and which they would not estimate as entitled to the mildness and patience requisite towards Englishmen! The two, however, to whom I have alluded, though not of an age which would have allowed such a trust's being confided to them in our own territories, had to look forward towards judicial or revenue appointments in the hon. Company's service, when their years should be more matured, and may be thought to have formed their minds in some degree, as well as to have sought acquirements, with regard to that prospect. This supposition, light as it would be to rest upon, could not have place in a corner of his Majesty's thirteenth light dragoons, entrusted with a similar charge. It is not to be wondered at that he should have taken upon himself to annul the five years' settlement just made by the minister in person with the cultivators of the district, substituting a settlement of his own."

This Nestor! this experienced veteran in state affairs! took upon himself to set aside a solemn act of the Nizam's government, negotiated by the minister himself! Was that the way to treat an independent ally? If so, then bitter and blighting were the fruits of our alliance; and Holkar and Scindia reposed on beds of roses, compared with the objects of our friendship! Sir Charles Metcalf, he contended, had broke through all his instructions, the moment he entered upon his office of president; instructions, too, which he had been instrumental in drawing up for the guidance of his predecessor. He, together with his boys, traversed the whole country, broke down its laws, and set up laws of his own in their stead. Was it then to be wondered at that the minister should apply to government for redress? The minister did complain, and by that act accomplished his own ruin! When they compared the characters given to Chundoo Loll by Sir Charles Metcalf, before and after the minister had made this complaint, they could not but see that the last character had been dictated by the wounded spirit of an ambitious man, who had been foiled in his projects, and who had consequently determined upon the destruction of those who had offended his pride and crossed his purpose!

He would now, Mr. Jackson said, proceed to the four accusatory despatches. If there were any gentlemen who, having read those documents, as well as the answers to them, with the minute attention they demanded, and yet could still remain of opinion that those answers did not refute all the charges advanced, they were certainly justified in returning what his hon. friend had called a verdict of guilty. But if there were any in that court who were ready to vote for the circulation of those despatches through India and the world, without having read and attentively considered the noble Marquess's replies and explanations, he could only apply to them the language of an eloquent member of that court (Mr. Russell)—"Let them go home and sleep, if they can; I could not sleep under such circumstances." He only demanded equal justice to be dealt out to the Marquess of Hastings. Let him be treated with the same justice as one of their meanest servants—he asked no more for him; but he demanded as much. To him (Mr. Jackson) it appeared quite impossible that that court would sanction the dissemination of accusations against the noble Marquess, which related to transactions that happened six, eight, and ten years ago, and consequently were known to the Court of Directors long before they, by a solemn act, expressed their approbation of the noble Marquess's administration, and deplored its approaching close! As to the last of those transactions, namely, the sixty lac loan, unless it could be shewn that the Marquess of Hastings was aware of any impropriety in the measure, it was immaterial to prove that it was an usurious transaction, he being ignorant of that fact. As to the amount of interest which was obtained on that loan, great difference of opinion prevailed. It was thirty-three per cent, according to Sir C. Metcalf's statement: while the house who instituted the transaction assert that the rate of interest, including the bonus, was only twenty and a half per cent; and this certainly agreed with the idea which the Court of Directors had of it, who, in their despatches, state that the interest was twenty and three-quarters per cent., including the bonus. Now, could any man conscientiously say that that was an exorbitant rate of interest out of the British dominions, when they had it in proof that, previous to the Nizam's connexion with the firm of Palmer and Co., he, the Nizam, had frequently paid as much as sixty per cent.; and an hon. baronet had produced accounts to shew that the British government itself had paid thirty per cent. interest?

The first of the despatches was dated 21st May 1820, and was a reply to a letter from the Marquess of Hastings, of the 3d January 1817. It says, "In paragraphs 264 to 287 of your letter from this department, dated the 3d of January 1817, you have drawn our attention to an application from Messrs. Palmer and Co., British merchants at Hyderabad, and to the proceedings on your part to which it gave rise." He would call to the recollection of the court what those proceedings were. On the Marquess of Hastings applying to the Advocate-General for his opinion as to the legality of granting the license to Palmer and Co., that gentleman stated that it was perfectly legal. He needed only to refer to the aid afforded by the house in the Mahratta and Pindarry wars, to shew what use was made of that license. For his conduct in those affairs they owed the noble Marquess eternal gratitude, and they had given that illustrious man their thanks for those achievements. The despatch then proceeded to detail the objections which the court had to the sanction which had been given to the loan.

The letter they were called on, by the amendment, to approve, went to condemn in the strongest terms the letter of license which had been granted to the house of Palmer and Co. four years before. That letter was of the utmost consequence; it might have been good in itself, under the then impression of the court, but, he would ask, whether they ought to circulate the reproof to the world, without at the same time giving the letter, which Lord Hastings wrote in reply? He would put it to the court, whether in an attack, on even the meanest person, they would wish to circulate the indictment, without also giving the defence? The despatch to which he particularly alluded, was dated May 1820. The answer from Lord Hastings was on the 16th of December in the same year. He would beg to read an extract from that answer. It was the political letter from Bengal, and was to be found in pages 34 and 35.

"In sanctioning certain negotiations of the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. with the minister of the Nizam, the Governor-General in Council, conceived himself to be acting consonantly to the purview of the 28th clause in the statute 37 Geo. III. cap. 142. As that enactment leaves not only to the Governor-General, but to any Governor in Council the amplest discretion, it was inferred, that the legislature intended the power to be exercised according to considerations of public expedience, and the Governor-General in Council most respectfully submits, that he is unapprized of any restriction, which confines the employment of that power to cases of exigency; though, were the substantiation of an exigency necessary, he apprehends it can be satisfactorily displayed." (Cries of hear, hear! from several of the proprietors!)

Mr. R. Jackson asked whether they had already made up their minds to circulate the charge, without at the same time giving publicity to such an answer? (Hear, hear!) In page 36 of that answer would be found the following paragraph, viz.

"It was the conscientious aim of the Governor-General in Council, to uphold and preserve entire those native States, which were connected with the British government by pledges of amity. An imminent danger of disorganization threatened the Nizam's government, from the mutinous spirit of the troops through grievous arrears of pay, and through the insubordination of the feudatory chiefs, each of whom practised dreadful exactions over the Nizam's subjects. Anxiety to cure these evils led to the following measures.

"On the first establishment of the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. in Hyderabad, the nature and extent of their dealings do not seem to have been exactly defined; it was not until they applied for a sanction in 1816, that their past transactions appear to have been examined; the scrutiny was very favourable for them, exhibiting indeed particulars which strongly enforced the presumption, that the distresses of the Nizam's government would have come to a crisis, had it not been for the assistance rendered by the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. A conviction of this fact caused the grant of the sanction, for which the house applied, and it at the same time led to the employment of that instrument more effectually.

"In 1816, and the beginning of the succeeding year, the probability of a serious contest with the Mahrattas became visible.

"The submission of the men to a requisite strictness of discipline was alone to be obtained by securing to them the actual discharge of their pay monthly, this was provided for the minister, by an arrangement with the house of Wm. Palmer and Co., on terms of unprecedented moderation for that part of India, with the sanction of this government."

His lordship went on to add, in page 37, "Suffice it to say, that the question never was the inadmissibility of the arrangement with Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., and the facing preferably the bursting of the storm, but the possibility of obtaining the loan on cheaper terms elsewhere: a hope which seemed to the Governor-General quite nugatory, and dangerously delusive.

What the result of the measure sanctioned has been, will appear from the letter of the Resident, dated the 1st of September 1820, namely; the reducing the expenses of the public establishments at one stroke, by 25 lacs annually, is no inconsiderable advantage; yet it bears no comparison with the benefit secured to the state, by the discharge of these troops, who were the scourge of the country, and could not be disbanded till their arrears were paid. This too has been followed by the removal of all the chiefs of all the districts, through whose connivance the systematic plunder was exercised, so that the general population of the territory has profited signally by the reform." He (Mr. J.) again asked, after hearing this, what course would the court adopt? All he demanded from them was, that after hearing of such signal good effects from these arrangements, if they would still persist in calling upon the public to condemn unheard, the man by whom such arrangements were effected? Let them but send forth the answer with the charge, and he would not complain, as he thought he could answer for the conclusion of any unprejudiced man. (Hear, hear!)

The next letter which they were called upon to approve and to circulate was that of November 1821. He admitted that the charge there made was very strong, and one which would have confounded him with despair, if he had not found a satisfactory answer from the highest authority; namely, the very functionary who was betrayed into the charge. He would here confine himself to a very small part of the accusation contained in that despatch; but it was a part which the noble Marquess had evidently felt most poignantly. In page 78, paragraph 53, it was said, "We have looked with anxiety for some attempt to justify or to palliate a proceeding which, so far as our recollection serves, is without a parallel in the records of our India governments; but in your letter it is reported, as if it were a circumstance needing no comment." Let the court recollect to whom this language was addressed; not to an ordinary clerk of the Company, but to one who was invested with the highest authority in the Company's service, and in whom its honour was bound up, as being their most dignified representative. He would take this occasion of saying, that if they did not pay more respect to these distinguished individuals, who were invested with the government of an empire; if they did not direct their clerks to qualify their phraseology, and couch their despatches in more civil terms, it would, in time, be found that no gentleman of rank and character would feel disposed to accept of office in India. This was a vice of long standing; he remembered a despatch being addressed to the good Lord Cornwallis, in such terms as must have been revolting to the feelings of any gentleman. He remembered another despatch being written from that court to Lord Wellesley, but it was in language so coarse and offensive, that, when sent for inspection to the Board of Control, that board refused to transmit it, and in the subsequent discussion of that court, it was termed, "the intended despatch." It was absolutely necessary that some reform should take place on this point. But to return to the extract—it said, "We have looked with anxiety for some attempt to justify or to palliate a proceeding, which, so far as our recollection serves, is without a parallel on the records of our Indian governments; but in your letter it is reported as if it were a circumstance needing no comment; and it is only through the following passage, in the minute of the Governor General, recorded in your consultations of the 1st of January 1820, that we have been able to acquire a knowledge of the motives of this novel and most irregular procedure:—"When Sir William Rumbold was called before the council, he explained that the supplication of the house for government dispensing with the delivery of a copy of the account, had this sole motive: the accounts once put on the proceedings of council must be transmitted home, so that the transactions of the house would be subjected, in London, to the inspection of persons liable to form all kinds of false deductions from total ignorance of the habit, of the country, and of every circumstantial particular; at the same time he offered to explain every part of the transactions verbally on oath to the council. He further proposed to wait upon Mr. Stuart, at his own house, and there submit the accounts to his examination. The validity of the objection to produce the accounts in council, struck me immediately, and I believe was similarly felt by two other members." The despatch then continued, "This apology is meant to apply exclusively to the suppression of the accounts, and not to the suppression of Sir W. Rumbold's explanation (for which no apology is made), although if admitted in one case, we do not see how it can be rejected in any supposable case; it is the language not of a responsible, but of an irresponsible government: it is not an exercise of the license of acting without instructions, and reporting the proceedings, for the information and sanction of the authorities at home: it is the assertion by your government, of a power to act without the obligation to communicate to any superior superior authority the means of judging of your acts, and consequently the assertion of a power to elude all check and control. It is not an assumption of a discretionary power, on the part of the local government, to suspend the execution of instructions from home; it amounts to the assumption of a power to do what you please, and to communicate to us, just so much of what you have done, as you may see fit. And, on what ground does this assumption rest? that we are not qualified to draw right conclusions from the information which is laid before us; but that, from ignorance of all that we ought to know, it is not only unnecessary, but unsafe to put us in possession of the materials of knowledge. We should be unworthy of the station we hold, if we did not strongly condemn such proceedings, defended by such allegations."—The court (Mr. J.) said, had done right in condemning such conduct, if the facts alleged were true; but ought they, in common justice, to publish, by their vote for the amendment, the despatch of censure, and pass unnoticed the explanations which had been given in answer to it, and which he would read? It should also be recollected, that the proceedings, which they were now called on to approve, had not been unanimously agreed to by the Court of Directors. They had already heard of the able dissent of their former Chairman (Mr. Pattison), to which three of as honourable gentlemen as any in the court, Messrs. Elphinstone, Mills, and Daniel, had added their signatures, from their conviction, that the course which had been pursued was unjust to the noble Lord. The answer of the noble Lord, in defence of his character and government, was an able exposé of the whole of the transactions to which the court had referred, in their letter of censure, and was, in his (Mr. Jackson's) mind, a most full and satisfactory answer to the whole of that charge. The noble Marquess began by stating as follows:—"The letter from the hon. court, dated 25th of November 1821, is a body of such serious charges against me, that, in justice to myself, I must enter formally upon an explanation of circumstances, which have been strangely miscomprehended. Where the animadversions are only impeachments of my judgment, I feel it incumbent on me to bow to the censure with entire submission: where the hon. court impugns my constitutional principles, and assigns to me incorrect motives, a greater degree of latitude may equitably be allowed. Not meaning, for reasons which shall be given hereafter, to follow the exact series of the hon. court's observations, I hasten to the article which is meant to affect me the most materially.—In paragraph 53, the hon. court is pleased to charge me with assuming the power of setting aside its authority, and claiming for myself a privilege of action subversive of the system established by the legislature, for the administration of affairs in these territories. I beg leave to disclaim the ever having harboured a pretension to powers of such a description. The sense which I believe myself to entertain of my public duty towards my country, and of my solemn engagements to the hon. court, would, I trust, suffice to prevent my indulging a license of that nature, through any fallacious views of momentary expedience; confident still further, that the warmest recognition of special obligation to the hon. Company, is never absent from my mind, I may assert, that my gratitude, operating with common-place honesty, renders it totally impossible, I should ever, in thought or deed, have invaded the hon. court's supremacy. The charge, however, is broadly made, and my simple asseveration cannot be accepted, to balance the detailed reasoning by which crimination is attached to me. It will, indeed, be shown, that the fact on which the argument is founded, has been altogether misapprehended; yet, as so forced and arbitrary a conclusion would not be deduced, even had the fact been literally as was imagined, unless the charge referred to some habitual disposition in me, the existence of that disposition shall be brought to the test; I shall call upon the members of council to declare, as men of honour, whether they have ever discovered in me, any want of management, or apparent inclination to evade an order from the hon. court, which could, without distinct injury to the hon. Company's service, be fulfilled?—whether in the case of instructions from the hon. court, the most irreconcilable to existing circumstances, consequently the most embarrassing, they have ever heard me remark upon the impracticability of the orders, with any irreverent levity?—whether on the contrary, they have not observed in me, an invincible solicitude to warp the exigencies of the juncture, as far as possible, to the hon. court's wishes, so as that the latter might be satisfied to the utmost extent safely practicable?"

"To the two first of these questions we can have no hesitation in replying distinctly and unequivocally in the negative; while we can, with no less truth and sincerity, declare, that in every instance which has come under our observation, your lordship's conduct has been invariably governed by the principles stated in the last question.

"The tenure of your lordship's questions, has necessarily prescribed the limit to our answer, and has restrained us from bearing testimony more at large to the marked deference and attention to the wishes of the hon. court, which your proceedings have uniformly manifested, and to the constant anxiety evinced by the general spirit of your administration, to uphold their dignity and authority."

Could there be any doubt (asked Mr. J.) of the course which the court ought to pursue with the knowledge of such facts before them? Would it not be highly unjust to allow such a charge to go forth unaccompanied by such a reply? This despatch was sent two years after the sixty lac loan; four years after the Aurungabad contract; five years after the granting of the license, and seven years after the sanctioning of the house; all of which it condemns. Was it fair or just to Lord Hastings that they should send forth his condemnation to the world, by approving and publicly referring to such a letter of censure, without at the same time referring to the explanation and defence here put in by the noble lord? Would any man among them act so by his neighbour or his servant? The court had condemned the practice of raising money for the use of the native princes, except in particular exigencies, and in cases where it was deemed necessary to assist a prince in alliance with the Company. The Governor-General had the power under the act, of granting a license to European merchants, to enter into contracts for supplying the sums required. The Nizam was exactly in the condition which was here provided for by the legislature. The money was absolutely necessary at the time, for the effectual organization of his troops; and if that was admitted, how could the granting the license be impugned? and yet, shocking as was the idea, it imputed to his lordship more sordid and vulgar motives: but its terms, it seemed, were objected to. Was it to be argued that government should have refused to allow the loan, because the interest exceeded twelve per cent., and that too in a country where the Company itself had ordered their provincial judges to allow, in causes, from 30 to 30 per cent.? Such a principle would be absurd, and in many supposable cases, extremely dangerous—perhaps fatal! Suppose, for instance, while we were engaged in the Burmese war, some of those chiefs who were almost habitually engaged in conspiracies against us, were to revolt; and that the Nizam and the Nabob of Oude, were to adhere to the Company's interests, but were prevented from assisting us from the want of funds; would that be a ~~good~~ reason to talk of refusing to sanction any loan which was above 12 per cent.? They might as well talk of two and a half per cent. Under such circumstances, were the exertions of our allies to be rendered abortive by an adherence to this rule?

Mr. Pattison (the director), in explanation, said that whatever opinion had before existed as to the law regulating the rate of interest, that law was now defined; and it was declared that in future no loan could be admitted, or money lent in any place, whether in or out of the Company's dominions, at a higher rate of interest than 12 per cent.; and that all transactions in which more than that sum was taken, would be considered illegal. And, in the letter sent out, it was directed that instructions to this effect should be issued to our different settlements in the east; but those instructions were so modified as not to have a retrospective effect. It was true that those instructions referred to transactions at Hyderabad; but they were only intended to operate for the future.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. Jackson.—The third despatch which they were called on to approve, related, in some degree, to the hon. director's observations; it was dated 9th April 1823, and was a mere envelope to certain legal opinions which the directors thought it necessary to send out. Why that despatch was one of the four which the amendment called upon the court to approve, he could not conjecture, unless it was with the unfair purpose of raising an inference, that the noble Marquess had wilfully violated an act of parliament, though the present construction was so new, that it could not have reached India until twelve months after the noble lord's departure, and three years after the sixty lac loan which raised the question, although for twenty-eight years the directors had themselves acted under the same construction as had governed the noble Lord and the Advocate-General of Bengal. Supposing the present construction to be the true one, application must be made to parliament to explain and amend the act, as has been suggested by Mr. Canning, or great misfortunes might ensue from our Indian allies being unable to raise the funds necessary for military equipment, and English subjects being forbidden to aid them, except on so low a rate of interest, that it was absurd to talk about it. He (Mr. J.) said the fourth despatch was dated 21st Jan. 1824; and it was well known that it had been dissented from by one of the Court of Directors, who naturally enough felt that it would be most unfair to send out a despatch, which was a mere echo of Sir Charles Metcalf's orders, and almost every paragraph of which the hon. director had felt himself able to refute. It was indeed remarkable that, throughout Sir Charles Metcalf's voluminous accusations was scarcely to be found one direct tangible charge;—it was all, "I have heard—it is reported—it is whispered—there is a current opinion—people say—I have an impression," &c. &c., although these insinuations had been thought of weight sufficient whereon to pronounce pronounce ruin to fame and fortune, by a verdict of guilty, from a gentleman who professed himself to be in habits of weighing evidence and contemplating testimony.

His (Mr. Jackson's) object would be, that the publication of the four despatches should be accompanied by their proper antidote, namely, the explanations which his lordship had given. The court should recollect what had been already done with respect to the administration of the noble Marquess. A vote of thanks had been passed to him, professedly on the ground of his general administration; and, without saying that there might not have been errors or mistakes in that government, during nine long years of trying and critical events, the Court of Directors had come to a unanimous vote on that occasion; as had likewise the Court of Proprietors—each lamenting his lordship's determination to resign the government. And let it be remembered that this was three years after the sixty lac loan; seven years after the Amingabad contract, and six years after the granting of the license. He would ask, with what face could they now send forth charges of six or seven years old, when they had in the meantime interfered with a vote of thanks, professedly grounded on his whole administration? To shew the feeling which seemed to actuate the Court of Directors, when that vote of thanks was proposed, he would read what had been said by the then Chairman, when he called upon the Court of Proprietors to adopt the sentiments of the Directors.

The learned gentleman then read the following extract from the proceedings of the Court of Proprietors, on the 29th of May 1822.

“The Chairman acquainted the court, that it had been convened for the special purpose of laying before the proprietors, a unanimous resolution of the Court of Directors of thanks to the most noble Marquess of Hastings.”

“The said resolution was read, being as follows:—

“At a Court of Directors, held on Wednesday the 15th May 1822, “Resolved unanimously, That this court highly appreciating the signal merits and services of the most noble Marquess of Hastings, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, and Knight Grand Cross of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath, and Governor-General of India, are anxious to place on the records of the East-India Company, their expression of deep regret, that family circumstances have led to a declaration on the part of that distinguished nobleman, of his wish to be relieved from the duties of his exalted station.

“And this court, being desirous that the sense they entertain of the conduct and services of the Marquess of Hastings, should be promulgated previously to his departure for Europe, have further “Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this court be given to the most noble the Marquess of Hastings, K. G. and G. C. B., for the unremitting zeal and eminent ability, with which, during a period of nearly nine years, he has administered the government of British India, with such high credit to himself, and advantage to the interest of the East-India Company.

“The Chairman then rose and said, the business which the proprietors were assembled to consider, was one that required but very little introduction on his part: the merits of the noble person, whom they had that day met to thank, were acknowledged on all hands to be of the most exalted and signal character, and therefore he was persuaded, that the Court of Proprietors would concur in the deliberate sentiments which the Court of Directors had recorded of those merits. It was usual on these occasions, to state to the proprietors the preliminary vote, to which the Court of Directors had agreed, and it sometimes happened, that that vote was proposed to the Court of Proprietors for their adoption. But that course would not now be taken, as it was considered more gratifying to the proprietors themselves, as well as more complimentary to the noble individual in question, to leave it entirely to the court to take such steps as might appear best calculated to attain the object they all had in view. The object of the vote which the Court of Directors had come to, was not to praise any particular act of this noble person's administration, but to place on the record of the Company, their opinion of his general conduct, during a period of nine years. On that account, they had not deemed it necessary to produce any papers; for the history of the noble Marquess was to be found in every document which had been transmitted from India for several years past. The noble Marquess had formerly received in two instances, votes of thanks from that court; and on a third occasion, the strong feeling of regard which the proprietors entertained towards him, in consequence of his various services were further expressed by a pecuniary grant. The two first votes were for particular services; the one for the Nepulsee war; the other for the war against the Mahrattas and Pindarries; both of which contests had been brought to a successful and glorious conclusion. In both instances, the papers relative to those important transactions had been laid before the proprietors. In the third instance, the court had come in a munificent vote of money; and on that occasion, it was not considered necessary cessary to produce any documents, because the reward was granted for services already well-known, and duly appreciated. The present resolution might then be considered a summary of his lordship's administration; it might be viewed as a tribute of praise paid to the noble Marquess, previous to his departure from that country, which he had for nine years governed so ably, and he hoped the general court, would, on the motion of some hon. proprietor, unanimously agree to a similar tribute of respect. The result of his lordship's administration was to be seen in the general pacification of India, in the flourishing state of the Company's finances, and in the total absence of any thing which appeared likely to disturb the existing tranquillity.

"Only that morning he had received from his lordship, a very clear exposé of the finances of India. And, in truth, it appeared from the last financial letter that there was a surplus of nearly a crore and a half of rupees. He was happy to say that he had received a letter of a very recent date, not from the noble Marquess himself, but from an old and intelligent servant in one of the governments; in which it was stated, that there was hardly the most remote probability of the renewal of war. The general diffusion of knowledge, and the general good-will which prevailed throughout the country, to the British government, had removed every apprehension of war. India now enjoyed profound peace, and that which should always accompany peace (though, such was the lot of human nature, they were not constantly united), content and prosperity. In the midst of India, all was tranquil and prosperous. He had next to observe, that the noble Marquess had achieved a very great saving to the East-India Company, in a financial operation, by the removal of the payment of interest, on a very large loan, from the home treasury to the treasury of Bengal. Many persons had certainly suffered by this measure, but circumstances rendered it necessary; and the consequent saving had placed the home-treasury in a state of great comparative affluence. The loan of 1811 had been transferred to that of 1821; the interest of the loan of 1811, which was payable by the home-treasury, at the rate of 2s. 6d. for the sicca rupee, was, by the transfer, now paid in India, by a rupee not worth more than 2s.; by which, a saving of not less than 150 or £200,000 per annum was effected. At the same time, he must be allowed to state, that when the court felt it necessary to make this change, it was not with a view to any profit of this kind; the measure was taken up by them on grounds of general policy. The profit was, certainly, a considerable advantage; but still that was not the object which the court contemplated; their design was to relieve the home-treasury from an operation which it was not able to bear; but, he thought, as a great saving had been effected, it was a matter of fair congratulation to the Company, and a transaction highly honourable to the noble Marquess, who, by a single stroke of his wand, had, like a powerful magician, brought the business to an immediate conclusion; so that, in a few months, nay, in a few weeks, the home-treasury was relieved from the payment of interest, to the amount of £1,000,000 per annum. This would, in the end, operate very beneficially; it could not be immediately reduced to money, but still, it must be considered as money's worth. When the Company were under some alarm, on account of the number of drafts that were suddenly made on them, occasioned by the commercial circumstances, which rendered the payments of those drafts very desirable, the noble Marquess adopted the most prompt and decisive measures. In former years, those bills did not exceed 3 or £400,000, but they amounted, in the year to which he alluded, to £1,800,000. Feeling it necessary that the Company's treasury should not suffer by so extensive a claim, application was made to the Bengal government, to set them right in this difficulty. No sooner did the noble Marquess receive the letter of the Court of Directors, than with a magic-like rapidity, he shipped a million of money on board the Company's vessels. These were transactions of a pecuniary kind, and, consequently, of less importance in the eyes of thinking men, than those efforts which were attended by a great moral effect. But, if they looked to the effect of the government of the noble Marquess, on the moral character of India, they would find the result of such a nature, as must call forth the highest and most lasting praise. Having, during a period of nearly nine years, conducted the affairs of the Company, with unabated zeal, and with almost unexampled ability, it did appear, to the Court of Directors, nothing more than proper, that they should express their warm gratitude to the noble Marquess. Their purpose was a clear and plain one; there was no contingency in the vote; it was a positive vote of regret for the loss of his services. He had, he felt, very imperfectly stated the sentiments which actuated the Court of Directors, on this occasion. He was, he knew, very unequal to make a set and formal speech; but, he trusted, he had said enough to shew, that the act of the Court of Directors was nothing more than a just and well-merited tribute of gratitude to the Marquess of Hastings, for his many and valuable services." (Hear, hear!) Could this, exclaimed

Mr. Jackson, be the same person, whom they were now recommended to condemn! and respecting whom gentlemen gravely talked about pronouncing a verdict of guilty, relating to transactions which were well-known, long before this vote of thanks was passed, and which had been regarded, as fully and satisfactorily explained? In order to arrest a course of such injustice, he should, if the present amendment were carried, and it should become the main question, move that the following words be added:—

“And that this court further expresses its approbation of the despatch to the Bengal government, dated 5th June 1822, conveying the unanimous thanks of the Court of Directors to the Marquess of Hastings, ‘for the unremitting zeal and eminent ability with which, during a period of nine years, he has administered the government of British India, with such high credit to himself, and advantage to the interests of the East India Company; at the same time expressing their deep regret that family circumstances had led to a declaration of his Lordship’s wish to be relieved from the duties of his exalted station.’

“And also conveying the unanimous thanks of the Court of Proprietors, enumerating the great merits of the noble Marquess, referring to their former repeated votes of thanks, and expressing the high satisfaction with which they witnessed their executive authority again coming forward, at the termination of a career so useful and brilliant; to express and promulgate their sense of his Lordship’s exalted merit, and their deep regret that domestic circumstances should withdraw him from the government of their Asiatic territories; at the same time desiring the Court of Directors to convey to the Marquess of Hastings, Governor-General and Commander-in-chief, the expression of their unfeigned admiration, gratitude, and applause.

He would submit this amendment as an act of justice to the noble lord, as an act of justice which would be due even to the humblest individual. (Hear, hear!) Let them circulate their accusatory despatches as widely and as industriously as they pleased, he bid defiance to them, if accompanied by the recorded answers to which he referred; without which, this glorious man must suffer in fame and reputation, by the act of those through whose ranks his praises had so recently echoed, and who voted him their thanks by acclamation!

Mr. P. Moore said he would give his support to the amendment moved by the hon. Chairman, not because he had read the voluminous papers before the court, but because he had not read them. As a friend to the Marquess of Hastings, he thought it was extremely injudicious that the character of that noble personage should be mixed up with proceedings with which in reality he had nothing to do. Several other distinguished servants of the Company had been put as it were upon their trial, who ought never to have been brought before the court on this occasion. The hon. gentleman before him, his learned friend, Mr. Jackson, had attacked the character of Sir Charles Metcalf, who was not there to answer for himself; and the characters of other absent gentlemen had been attacked by other proprietors. Against such a course of proceeding he would protest, and he stood there to protect those who were the children of the Company, who had grown up in its service, and who were now absent on its business. As a general principle he would object to the practice of allowing a guarantee loan to the native powers. If such a practice were permitted, the Company’s treasury would be soon exhausted. One large sum had been already paid in this way out of the treasury of Madras, and when a whole bundle of the Grenville party came into power the other day, the first thing they did was to come down to the House of Commons, and ask them to make good £300,000 to Mr. Prendergast. He would assert that such proceedings were bad, and ought to be discountenanced. As to my Lord Hastings, he believed he was inveigled into those transactions; but still he was responsible for them, and he (Mr. Moore) did not mean to deny that responsibility. The question was, were they to put a stop to these practices, or were they to have their funds paid over to make good the losses of Palmer and Co.? That firm would, very likely, go to the Board of Control, and say, “We are ruined; we received a guarantee from the government in India, and it is not fair that the East-India Company should make good our losses.” We have many seats in parliament, parliament, and can be of use to you ; do, for God's sake, give us a lift !" (A laugh.) The Company ought not to be exposed to even a chance of such a misapplication of its funds ; and, therefore, he fully approved of the letter of the Court of Directors, which went to prevent all future loans to native powers in India. He gave his full support to the hon. Chairman's amendment ; and he did not think that the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings was in any way implicated by it. (Hear, hear !)

There were now very loud and general cries for adjournment, and also several calls for closing the discussion. In the midst of these,

A Proprietor rose and moved—" That the debate be adjourned."

The Rev. Mr. Simpkinson (we believe) suggested the addition of the words, "sine die." They had already heard too much of that subject, and he thought it was not right that they should be agitated by it any longer.

A Proprietor expressed his hope, that every member who presented himself might be heard on this important subject.

The Chairman, referring to what had fallen from the Rev. Mr. Simpkinson, said, that no amendment could be moved on a question of adjournment, though it was competent to every member to speak upon it. However inconvenient the further adjournment of this question might be, he would not object to it ; yet, he must say, that the discussion had already gone to a very inconvenient length ; it was also, in his judgment, injurious to the noble lord himself to have the discussion so long protracted. He must beg also to observe, that the intention professed by the learned proprietor (Mr. Jackson) of offering another amendment when the present should be disposed of, would, if carried into effect, be productive of a further delay, to the hindrance of the general public business of the Company.

The cries of " Question, question !" were now renewed, and were mixed up with those of " Adjourn, adjourn !"

Mr. S. Dixon observed, that it might be inconvenient to protract the discussion ; yet, if they called for the question, they were bound to hear every member who wished to speak upon it.

Hon. D. Kinnaird said, that he was anxious to offer a few observations to the court on the question of adjournment. As the individual who had introduced the subject under discussion, and might be held in some sort responsible for its result, he was of course extremely anxious to omit no precaution which might tend to its success. It would be remembered by the Chairman, as well as by many hon. gentlemen near him, that in the original address which he had the honour to make to the court, he prefaced his motion with but few observations. He took that course with a view to the opportunity which he looked for of explaining himself the more fully in reply ; and if the proposal of adjournment were opposed, then the time for entering into that explanation had arrived. Now, although there could be no hour of the day or night, at which he should not be ready, and was not ready, to enter at full length into the merits of this question, yet he must own that in his view of the case, that particular moment did not appear to be quite the most convenient for doing so. As that which he had to submit to the court would necessarily occupy a considerable time, he should be sorry to intrude much upon their attention at so late an hour ; but he had a duty to perform, which he could not allow himself to neglect. Under such circumstances he confessed that he should feel much more confidence, if allowed to commence this task on a future day, than if he were to go through it before an audience already fatigued with a long and arduous debate. Under these circumstances he felt bound to support the motion of adjournment.

Mr. Weeding observed, that considering the length of time which this debate had already occupied, he certainly felt himself bound to oppose any further adjournment. It would be a great tax upon the time of the members, who had been attending the court for so many days, to call upon them, unless in a case of absolute necessity, to come down again on the following day, or on Thursday. The hon. member (Mr. D. Kinnaird) said that he was ready to enter into the question at any moment, and his (Mr. Weeding's) wish was that the hon. gentleman should do so now ; if he did speak, he should find him (Mr. W.) a patient and attentive hearer.

Hon. D. Kinnaird said, his only object was to address the court when not already fatigued with a protracted discussion.

Mr. Weeding observed, that the hon. member's object would not be at all forwarded by the adjourning the debate ; how did he know that on the next day he would get an earlier opportunity of reply, than he had on that occasion ? He could not secure beginning early, even if they did adjourn, as twenty persons might come down and speak before him ; he had no claim to precedence, and therefore, he wished him to proceed at once with his reply.

The Chairman said that, in that case the court would have to divide, and all gentlemen who were not proprietors, must therefore withdraw.

Mr. Freshfield did not rise to offer any personal opposition to the adjournment, but he thought there was not so great a difference of opinion between them, as to call for a division.

The

The Chairman said, that if the motion for an adjournment was contested, he had no alternative but that of dividing the court upon it; at the same time, if any arrangement could be come to without a division, he should most willingly accede to it. For himself, he had no power to act individually; but, if he might be permitted to express an opinion, he certainly did think, considering the long and fatiguing debate they had already had that day, the case of the noble lord would be most fairly dealt with by an adjournment of the debate.

After a short conversation, in which several proprietors took a part, the motion for an adjournment was agreed to.

The Chairman said, it would be necessary to fix the day to which the debate was to be adjourned. Upon that point he and the directors were at the command of the proprietors. They would be in the court on the following day, and ready to go on with the discussion, if necessary; but the effect of such a course would be to stop the regular business of the Company, and certainly put a great number of persons to inconvenience. Thursday, as it appeared to him, would be a more convenient day for resuming the debate.

It was agreed to that the discussion should be resumed on Thursday.

A Proprietor suggested, that in order to ensure getting through the discussion on that day, the court should meet at eleven o'clock, instead of twelve.

The Chairman said, that such an alteration would, he feared, lead to mistakes, as notice could hardly be given to all the proprietors in proper time—the regular hour would be best.

Court adjourned to Thursday, March 3.

East-India House, March 3.

HYDERABAD PAPERS.

A Special General Court of Proprietors of East-India Stock was this day held, pursuant to adjournment, at the Company's house in Leadenhall Street, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of "the Hyderabad papers, now before the proprietors, as far as they respect the conduct of the most noble the Marquess of Hastings, late Governor-General of India, with reference to certain pecuniary transactions of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. with the government of his highness the Nizam."

The Chairman (W. Astell, Esq.) having stated the business on which the court was assembled, the original motion and amendment were, as on the former days, read, when—

Mr. S. Dixon rose, and assured the court that he did not intend to detain them long. He had already expressed his opinion on the subject under consideration, and he now could not refrain from expressing a wish; he should rejoice to say a hope; that some means should be devised, perhaps by a communication taking place between the hon. proprietor (the hon. D. Kinnaird) and the hon. Chairman, of bringing the discussion to an amicable conclusion. Whether the original motion, or the amendment should be carried, he was convinced a very great degree of unpleasant feeling would rest in the minds of many persons. He sincerely wished that some middle course could be adopted, whereby to come to a decision on the subject. He was afraid, if they proceeded to decide on the question as it stood at present, whether in favour of the original motion, or of the amendment, that the ultimate consequences of their decision would be very mischievous to the Company's interests. They ought to pause before they gave to the legislature any ground for interference. He had no doubt, that there were many persons who would be glad of an opportunity to overawe the East-India Company in the House of Commons. (The hon. proprietor was interrupted by cries of order.)

A Proprietor observed, that as the hon. proprietor had already spoken on the question, he conceived he was decidedly irregular in thus offering any proposition to the notice of the court. (Hear!)

Mr. Dixon replied, that he had not moved any thing. All he had done was to hint what he knew to be the wish of many proprietors. (Hear, hear!)

General Thornton rose, and declared he would second the motion. (Loud cries of order.) The recommendation he meant of his hon. friend. (Order, order!)

The Chairman said, he hoped some attention would be paid to regularity. He would remind them of the strong desire, which was expressed last Tuesday, that the discussion should be closed on that day. He was convinced, that if these irregular and desultory discussions were persisted in, the debate would never come to a termination. He requested, that if any gentleman wished to speak to the question, he would immediately begin. He would take this opportunity of repeating to the court, what he had stated on a former day, that the Company's interests were materially affected by this protracted discussion. The general business of the court was not only interrupted, but what was of a very essential consequence, the tea sales were interfered with. Those sales were usually held in that room, and the dealers had expressed to him, through their Chairman, their anxious hope that they might not again be turned out of the place where they ordinarily assembled. The sales were now obliged to be carried on in an adjoining room, which was not sufficiently sufficiently capacious for the purpose. The dealers hoped, if the debate should again be adjourned, that the adjournment might be for a week at least. Gentlemen ought to consider that these proceedings would affect their dividend. (Hear!) He would suggest that the discussion be concluded this day, and he thought it right to observe, that he for one would not consent to any further adjournment, though he should sit there till midnight.

Sir Harford Jones then proceeded to address the court on the question. The court, he was sensible, after the protracted discussion which had taken place on this question, could not be very much inclined to listen to any speaker who offered himself to their notice. He assured the court, however, that what he had to say, should be compressed into as few words as possible. No man entertained a higher notion of the honour, integrity, and ability of the Marquess of Hastings than he did, and he only wished he could bring himself to think, that in the affair they were considering, that the noble lord had acted with his usual discrimination and wisdom. It was indispensably necessary, in order to form a just idea of the motion and amendment, to consider the real quality of the Nizam. He had heard him called an independent prince. If he were so, it was not by the grace of God, but by the permission of the East-India Company. The political relations in which that prince stood with respect to them, and in which they stood in respect to him, should likewise not be lost sight of. He was, with respect to them, in a state of tutelage, not in a state of alliance; and, he (Sir H. Jones) therefore concluded that his interests ought to be as carefully looked after as their own; they must share in all his advantages, and must, more or less, partake of all his embarrassments. The loans which he sought for were prima facie evidence of the embarrassed state of his government, and if this position was admitted, as well as that which he (Sir H. Jones) had before advanced, as to their liability to be affected by that embarrassment, he must come to the conclusion, that it was the duty of the Bengal government, to take care that the Nizam was assisted on the most moderate terms, and not involved in greater difficulties by the negotiation of so disastrous a loan as that of Messrs. Palmer and Co. It had been shewn that their treasury was, at the time, in a most flourishing condition; then why, he asked, was the Nizam allowed to borrow money at such a ruinous rate of interest, when they had such means at their command, and while the act of parliament entrusted the Governor-General with powers to assist their ally? He told them, he would not detain them long, and would compress what he had to say into few words. Were he to talk till midnight, he did not think he could say any thing more to the purpose than he had done, and he should therefore conclude with expressing his determination, on the grounds he had stated, of giving his support to the amendment.

Sir Alexander Johnston said, the character of the noble Lord, to whom the present question related; the high and the responsible situation he held in India, and the nature of the papers which had been laid before the proprietors, were circumstances which rendered the present a question of considerable importance. It was of importance to the efficient administration of the Company's affairs in India, that a Governor-General, who had repeatedly received the thanks of his country, should feel confident, that, whatever difference of opinion might have occurred between him and his council in India, his character for integrity, at least, would be protected in this country. It was of equal importance to the commercial interests of India, and, through them, to the commercial and manufacturing interests of Great Britain, that a Governor-General, who had boldly protected a great commercial house, established, under the sanction of government, in the very centre of India, for the express purpose of promoting the liberal views of a commercial treaty; the general interest of trade, and the introduction of British manufactures amongst the natives of the country; should feel confident, whatever difference of opinion might exist as to the policy of the measure, that his motives, at least, would be protected from secret and unfounded calumnies in this country. It was for these reasons, that, although he had not had the honour of attending this court on any former occasion, yet he had felt it his duty to attend it on the present; and, after having read every paper which had been printed, and listened to every argument that had been urged on the occasion, to submit shortly the grounds upon which he felt himself bound, by every principle of justice and honour, to support the motion which had been brought forward by the hon. proprietor (the hon. D. Kinnaird). The arguments which had been urged by the hon. director within the bar (Mr. Pattison), by the hon. proprietor on his right (Mr. Jackson), and by the hon. member for Midhurst (Mr. J. Smith), were, in his opinion, conclusive against the adoption of the amendment: on that point, therefore, it was unnecessary for him to trouble the court. The only question at present was, "did the Hyderabad papers contain any fact respecting the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings in the Hyderabad transactions, which authorize them to alter the high opinion which they had hitherto expressed of his honour and integrity?"

In order to form a fair and impartial judgment of the whole conduct of the Marquess of Hastings, in the Hyderabad transactions, it was necessary to consider those papers first, with reference to the political objects the noble Marquess had in view; secondly, with reference to the line of conduct which he observed in collecting the information upon which he acted; and, thirdly, with reference to that line of conduct which he observed, in choosing the means by which his measures were carried into effect. With respect to the first point, it was established by these papers, that the political objects which Lord Hastings had in view, in the Hyderabad transactions, were to enable, by means of a loan, the Nizam's government to render efficient, as allies to the British arms, a considerable body of his troops, which, for want of regular pay, were in a state of mutiny and insubordination; and also, to enable, by means of a loan, the Nizam's minister (a friend to the British government) to introduce such a reform into his country, as would increase his prosperity, and make it a permanently useful ally to the British interests in India. That these were wise and great political objects, was established by the report which was made at the time to Lord Hastings, by the political Resident at Hyderabad; a gentleman who had been appointed to the situation, not by Lord Hastings, but by his predecessor (Lord Minto); a gentleman who had been, for twenty years, intimately acquainted with the affairs of Hyderabad; who had been, for fifteen out of those twenty years, actually political Resident at that court; whose talents and local information were universally acknowledged in India; and whose talents and local information must be acknowledged in this country, by every person who heard the able, manly, and luminous speech, which he made in this court some days ago. With respect to the second point, in collecting the necessary information, to enable him to act, it was Lord Hastings' duty, as a statesman, and as a faithful servant to the East India Company, to consult the Advocate-General of Bengal, as to the legality, and the political Resident of Hyderabad, as to the policy, of the measures which he was about to adopt; and, after causing the measures to be fully discussed in council, to carry into effect such of them as had been determined upon, either by the whole council, or by the majority of the council; the opinions of each member of the council being faithfully recorded for the information of the Court of Directors. It was established by the Hyderabad papers, that Lord Hastings did, in as far as related to the legality of these measures, act in strict conformity with the advice of the Advocate-General of Bengal; and that, in as far as related to the policy of the measures, he did also act in strict conformity with the advice of the political Resident at Hyderabad; and that, after having caused the measures to be fully discussed in council, he carried into effect the principal one of them, the licence to the house of Palmer and Co., with the unanimous concurrence of every member of his council, and the others with the concurrence of the majority of the council; the opinions of each member of council, both for and against the latter measures, being faithfully recorded for the information of the Court of Directors: it was, therefore, established by these papers, that the line of conduct which Lord Hastings observed, in collecting the information upon which he acted, was precisely that which it was his duty to observe as a statesman, and as a faithful servant of the East-India Company.

With respect to that line of conduct which Lord Hastings observed, in choosing the means by which his measures were to be carried into effect; it was again the duty of Lord Hastings, as a statesman, and as a faithful servant of the East India Company, to take care that the means which he chose were such as were the most palatable to the Nizam's government, through whose agency the measures were to be carried into effect; that they were such as had been advised by the political resident of Hyderabad, upon whose co-operation the success of the measures depended; that they should be such as were in strict conformity with the spirit and objects of the existing treaty of commerce between the Nizam's Government and the British Government; and, finally, that they should be such as were, considering all the circumstances of the case, the most economical that could be adopted. It appeared, by the Hyderabad papers, that the Nizam, partly from the services which he had received from Mr. Palmer himself, before he was a member of the house, and partly from the benefits he had derived from the house, reposed great confidence in the firm, and he himself proposed that the loan should be negotiated for him through the house; it also appeared by the papers, that the political resident of Hyderabad had officially pointed out to Lord Hastings the house of Palmer and Co., as the only house which, from the confidence it had obtained amongst the Shroffs, and other native monied men of the country, could raise the loan for the Nizam's government. It also appeared, that the house of Palmer and Co. had been established at Hyderabad under the sanction of the British government, for the express and avowed purpose of carrying into effect the views of the treaty of commerce which had been concluded between the Nizam's government and the British government; that it had expended a considerable derable capital in opening an inland navigation, of nearly 400 miles, for the conveyance by water, instead of by land, of the cottons of Berar and the Teak wood, which grows near the Godavery; that it had made an expensive establishment near the mouth of the Godavery, at Coringa; that it had actually built at that port a ship of the Teak wood, that it had brought thither by the inland navigation which had been mentioned; and that it had been the means of introducing into the Nizam's country two hundred thousand pounds worth of British manufactures, the use of which had become so general amongst the upper classes of society in that country, that the political resident reports his having seen many chiefs at the court of the Nizam dressed in English shawls, muslins, and other descriptions of English manufacture. It further appeared, from the report of the political resident, made at the time to Lord Hastings, and confirmed by what he stated to the proprietors in this court a few days ago, that the terms upon which the loans to the Nizam's government were negotiated by Palmer and Co. were fair and moderate, which was corroborated by the statement also made the other day in this court by Sir C. Forbes, one of the most distinguished and best informed merchants who ever was in India, and who had proved to the proprietors, by the most unanswerable evidence, that those terms were not only moderate, but were such as a cautious house would have been unwilling to take; in support of which he had proved to the court, that his own house at Bombay, under similar circumstances, received ten or twelve per cent. more interest from the Bombay government than Palmer and Co. had received from the Nizam, for money which they, the house of Forbes and Co., had lent the Bombay government—not upon the precarious security on which Palmer and Co. had lent their money to the Nizam's government, but upon the direct and avowed security of the Bombay government itself; and that even this loan had been considered so little desirable by the house of Forbes and Co., that, although it had the option of lending the Bombay government 100,000 rupees upon these terms, it only lent it 18,000. It was therefore established by these papers, that the line of conduct which Lord Hastings observed in choosing the house of Palmer and Co. as the means by which his measures were to be carried into effect, was precisely that which it was his duty to observe, as a statesman, and as a faithful servant of the East India Company. The principal objection which had been urged in the course of this debate against the conduct of Lord Hastings in the Hyderabad transactions, arose out of the construction which had been given to a private letter, which was written by Lord Hastings to Sir Wm. Rumbold, in January 1815; from which it had been inferred, that Lord Hastings was biassed throughout the Hyderabad transactions by a desire to serve Sir Wm. Rumbold. In the construction of this letter, the proprietors should consider the persons by and to whom it was written—the time at which, and the object for which, it was written. The person by whom it was written was the trustee of Lady Rumbold's fortune; the person to whom it was written was Lady Rumbold's husband; the time at which it was written was when Lord Hastings was in camp, in the hurry of a campaign; the object for which it was written was to explain to Sir Wm. Rumbold (in answer to a letter which Sir William Rumbold had written to Lord Hastings, asking his opinion upon the subject) the probable advantages which he (Sir Wm.) might fairly calculate upon, in becoming a partner in the house of Palmer and Co. Lord Hastings, in his reply, in substance, told Sir Wm. Rumbold, that the countenance of the British government had been given to the house of Palmer and Co., at the request of the political resident at Hyderabad, in consequence of the services which they had performed for the Nizam's government—that the same countenance was not likely to be given to any other house, no other house having the same claim for such countenance—and that Sir Wm. might, therefore, in becoming a partner in Palmer and Co.'s house, calculate upon the advantages—the one was, that the countenance given by the British government to that house would secure for it the confidence of the people of the Nizam's country—the other was, the improbability, for the reason above stated, that the house of Palmer and Co. would have any competitor at Hyderabad. The above, he thought, the fair and gentlemanlike construction which a private letter, written under such circumstances, by a man of Lord Hastings' high and gentlemanlike feelings, was entitled to receive. If, however, any doubt should occur from this letter as to the conduct which Lord Hastings would adopt in any case in which Sir W. Rumbold's interest might be concerned, that doubt must be removed by a reference to the proceedings in council, of 17th June 1820, by which it appeared that Lord Hastings, although strongly impressed with the policy of the measures which he proposed, offered to retire from council, and waive his right of voting upon the subject, lest he might be supposed to be influenced in his opinion by the regard which he entertained for Sir W. Rumbold; and that the members of council, who differed from him as to the policy of the measure under discussion, and who, from their situation, as members of council, were the best possible judges of his conduct.

conduct, recorded on the minutes of council the high sense they entertained of his character; and the impossibility of their believing that his opinion could be biassed on the occasion, by the regard which he entertained for Sir Wm. Rumbold. Having now fully discussed the Hyderabad papers, both as they referred to the political measures which Lord Hastings adopted in the Nizam's country, and as to the means by which he carried those measures into effect, he felt himself bound to conclude, that these papers did not contain any fact which authorized the proprietors to alter the high opinion which they had hitherto expressed of the honour and integrity of the Marquess of Hastings; and he therefore felt himself bound, upon every principle of justice and honour, to give his vote in favour of the resolution which had been brought forward by the hon. proprietor (the hon. D. Kinnaird).

Mr. Darby did not recollect that a discussion more discreditably to the proprietors had ever occurred in that court. (Hear!) He hoped they would allow him to be heard, and he would thank them; but to cry "hear!" every moment was the very way to drown his voice, and prevent him from being heard. He complained that the question had been mixed up with improper personalities; an attack had been made on their Chairman, who certainly ought to receive their earnest support (cries of "No!"). He must be permitted to proceed: he contended it was a most indecent attack: he was sure there was no one in that court, who pretended to have a regard for the Marquess of Hastings, who was a truer friend to him than he (Mr. Darby), and he believed he had known him as long as any one. Indiscreet friends were said to be worse than open enemies, and he was sure the adage was verified in the present instance by the conduct of some of those gentlemen who had undertaken his lordship's defence. The character of that nobleman needed no defence: no charge was made against him; he was not criminated in the slightest degree; for he (Mr. Darby) most solemnly declared, had such been the case, he would instantly have left the court, so great was the respect he bore his lordship. But the fact was, no such thing was in contemplation; and he was sure their worthy Chairman would be the last person who would manifest a hostile feeling towards the noble Marquess; his only wonder was, why they should be defending a man against whom no attack had been made. Did the noble Marquess want such a defence as that to support his character? and if he did, would he thank them for attempting to defend him by vilifying others? A most respectable gentleman (Mr. Stuart) had been described as one who had set up a factious and persevering opposition to the Marquess of Hastings; that charge had, however, been partly wiped off by the candid admission of the hon. proprietor who had last addressed the court. Was it charitable to call a man a factious opponent, because he differed with another? Was the treatment which Sir Charles Metcalfe had received, in the course of the debate, fair? He was sure those gentlemen who had so harshly spoken of him, would be sorry for what they had said hereafter. There was another thing on which he wished to speak; he was a very old fellow; perhaps he might be allowed to beg of gentlemen, if they would make speeches, not to let them be quite so long. (Hear!) He thought it a most shocking waste of time, when it was considered that this debate had lasted for many days, and the few members who had spoken had been endeavouring to defend a man who was not charged with any thing. The Chairman had something better to do than to sit there and hear them talk: they seemed to be more anxious for the length than for the goodness of their harangues; their motto seemed to be non quare bene sed quam diu. If he thought the amendment had a tendency to criminate the noble Marquess, he would vote against it; but as it did no such thing, he would give it his support. He repeated, no man had greater respect for the Marquess of Hastings than he had. If his lordship were here on the spot, he was sure, for he flattered himself he had a little knowledge of his character, he was sure no man would be more averse to the original motion than himself. He was confident his zealous and imprudent friends would not get any thanks from him; he would be the first to blame them, for endeavouring to make him out a person who had never committed an error, even of the most trivial nature. He would say to them, "I never did a wrong thing intentionally; but I might have done so and so if I had had more time for consideration." His indiscreet friends, however, were not satisfied with this consideration. When he (Mr. Darby) was a child, one of his copies at school ran thus:

"Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see, Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be."

He believed, on his honor, that if his lordship could, he would put an extinguisher on the proceedings of his self-styled friends. He would withdraw the motion; the amendment would then go to the wall, and the court would then be restored to peace again.

Mr. Impey agreed, that if the hon. proprietor's suggestion of withdrawing the original motion and the amendment, and adjourning sine die was followed, it would be the best course that could be adopted. (Hear, hear!) No exertions on his part should be spared to bring about so desirable a result, if he thought he had any hope of prevailing prevailing on the hon. gentleman who had introduced the proposition to withdraw them. (Cries of "No, no!") If there were the least inclination on the opposite side to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman who had last spoken, he would sit down and not say a word on the subject. He fully concurred with the last speaker in the opinion that it was a great evil to protract speeches beyond what the necessity of the case demanded; but, on the present occasion, he was sorry he could not comply with the wishes of the hon. proprietor, in compressing all he had to say into an nutshell. When he looked at that huge mass of documents, and thought at what length those who had addressed the court on the subject of them had spoken, he found it impossible to be very brief himself; he trusted he should meet with the same kindness and indulgence he had always experienced from the court. In rising then to address the court on this momentous question, he begged it to be distinctly understood, that he entirely concurred in the general opinion that there was nothing in the huge mass of papers, which had been laid before them, to justify the imputation of corrupt motives to the noble Marquess. (Hear!) He would go further and declare, in his conscience he believed, that, throughout the whole of the Hyderabad transactions, he had never cherished for a moment the idea of private advantage to himself; and, perhaps, it might be some consolation to the noble Marquess, amidst the great trouble and vexation to which he had been exposed, that not only his personal friends, but those to whom he was only known as a public character, were convinced that whatever blame had been or might be attached to his conduct, he was fully acquitted of such base principles of action: every person was agreed that he was not actuated by such mean or selfish views. He was sorry he could go no further than this; he thought the two or three last speakers, on the other side, had totally misrepresented the question which they had stated, as one merely regarding the personal honor and integrity of the noble Marquess. Had it been thus narrowed he would have given it his vote; but the question, as contained in the original motion, was this:—"Is there any thing in these papers which, in the slightest degree, affects the personal character of the Marquess of Hastings?" Now "personal character" was a very extensive expression; it implied the part a man played in life, and embraced all his public and private acts. If it were intended to infer that the conduct of the noble Marquess, with respect to the transactions under their consideration, was not reprehensible, or that he did not merit the censures passed upon him by two Courts of Directors, which were sanctioned by two Boards of Control, and by a large majority of a third Court of Directors, with the unanimous assent of a third Board of Control, to that proposition he must say he could not agree. He must, therefore, vote for the amendment; which, let it be recollected, cleared the noble Marquess from all corrupt motives. He regretted that he had not possessed sufficient influence to have induced the court, on the first day of this discussion, to come to a vote, acquitting his lordship of corrupt motives, and at the same time approving of the despatches of the court of directors. He sincerely lamented that this discussion had ever taken place. He thought that the noble Marquess had been placed in a most cruel situation. Had his enemies so placed him? Where were they? It was quite clear that it was not with the desire of the Court of Directors that this subject was brought forward; because, with a perfect knowledge of these transactions, they, in 1822, unanimously passed a resolution, thanking him for his eminent services, and expressing their regret at his leaving India. (Hear, hear!) Was it not then, he said, evident from this, that the Court of Directors, not unmindful of the great services his lordship had rendered to his country, felt that though they were well acquainted with these transactions, that they sought to bury them in oblivion? Whom had he to blame but his friends, who, with a thorough knowledge of this blot, and aware that opposition would be made to a motion for further remuneration to the noble Marquess, did, notwithstanding, bring such a proposition forward? That proposition was rejected, and what followed? Why, the public papers put forth a libel on the noble Marquess, for they are used to libel men of all descriptions every day. Now the imprudent friends of his lordship called on the Court of Directors to contradict this libel. They, very properly, refused to do so; they determined not to interfere in the matter. The next proceeding of his lordship's friends was to put a question to the Chairman in this court; and how could he, consistently with his duty, answer what the Court of Directors had refused to answer? The scene which then occurred must still be fresh in the memory of many gentlemen. He had never before witnessed such a scene of violence, he had almost said of outrage; and what was the consequence? The mass of papers before them were called for; and had that not been done, they would still have remained in the dark. He maintained, therefore, that the noble Marquess had nobody to blame but his friends for this cruel debate; and now, not content with endeavouring to clear his character, they want to throw odium on those of others. His hon. friend (Mr. Patterson) he saw shook his head; but he would ask him, were they not informed by

by one of the earliest speakers on this question, that he would impeach Mr. Adam? Had not a charge of factious-opposition been brought against the hon. gentleman near him (Mr. Stuart)? had not the character of Sir C. Metcalf met with the rough treatment? He did not charge the hon. director, whom he was proud to call his friend, with this conduct. He had not used such language, but the hon. gentleman opposite had. If one man strikes another, did he expect to escape without being struck in return? and if the friends of the noble Marquess will drag him into the midst of a set of angry combatants, did they think that he would return unhurt? (Hear!) It was natural for those who had been attached to his lordship from private friendship, or obliged to him in public life, to step forward in his defence. There were many such gentlemen in that court; and he was far from blaming them for doing so; he was so far from blaming, that he applauded them for it. Let them display all the zeal they could in supporting his lordship's character; but let them not, in doing him justice, do injustice to others. (Hear!) For himself he was quite impartial in the matter. He had no feeling of hostility or friendship for the Marquess of Hastings. He had both spoken and voted for the munificent grant of £200,000, which had been made to him by the Company; and if he was now constrained to blame him for the part he took in the Hyderabad transactions, he would not bring a railing accusation against him. He trusted, no expression or word would fall from him in the debate, that could justly give offence to that nobleman, or the dearest of his friends. He had read with much pain the papers which detail these transactions: he could not but consider it a stain on the British character, that a prince, their ally, a prince who was under their protection; nay, as an hon. proprietor had expressed himself, under their tutelage, should have been fleeced of a revenue of seven lacs of rupees per annum, in perpetuity, by the act, not of his own minister—for Chundoo I-oll was not his minister—but by a man whom the British government had appointed to act for him, and by the proceedings of a British commercial establishment. By acts directly in the face, both of the law and of the policy which ought to govern the country, which acts obtained the sanction of the Governor-General. For that conduct, his lordship had received the unanimous censure of the government at home. It was with the extremest reluctance he proceeded to discuss how far this conduct affected the personal character of the late Governor-General. The question before the court was, whether the noble Marquess had been unduly influenced by his connexion with Sir Wm. Kumbhold, in favouring the firm of Palmer and Co.

He thought every proprietor, who purposed to address the court on this question, should have read and made himself thoroughly acquainted with the contents of the Hyderabad papers; but it was not to be expected that all the proprietors should have laboured through so enormous a mass. Many were prevented by other important avocations from giving those papers the requisite degree of attention. Many subjects not connected with the present topic of discussion were embraced in that large volume, and in offering the remarks he intended, he would endeavour to steer clear of all points which did not bear upon the question: he would also guard himself against making attacks on the characters of other people; he would only detail their acts, and it was not his fault if their characters were affected by those acts. Facts were the only things he would bring before the court: he would first, however, stop a while to make a few comments on the law and the general policy adopted with regard to India; for to that point it was important to direct the attention of the court. As soon as their possessions in India had become extended and considerable, parliament, in order to protect the natives of that country, both princes and subjects, from oppression, enacted two wise regulations. The first was contained in the Regulating Act of 1773, and prohibited all British subjects in India from contracting for, or receiving more than 12 per cent. interest for money. The second, which was in a statute of the 37th of the late king, forbade all pecuniary transactions between British subjects, and the native princes or governments of India. The particular object the legislature had in view, in adopting this last regulation, would be to protect the native princes against that species of oppression, which resulted from pecuniary transactions. Before this act was passed the great profits to be derived from pecuniary transactions with the native princes, held out one of the great inducements to oppression and extortion to the servants of the Company. The attention of the chief men of this country was first attracted to this subject by the Nabob of Arcot's affairs, and by the consideration of them, the country became acquainted with the nature of the pecuniary transactions with the native princes which prevailed in India. It then was made known, that the native princes were accustomed to borrow money at a most exorbitant rate of interest, and this together with fictitious debts, soon reduced them and their dependencies to the utmost distress and misery. The Rajah of Tanjore, and the King of Oude, had been reduced to the same state of distress. Now, parliament, to put a stop to proceedings of this nature, passed this wise enactment, forbidding British subjects to enter into pecuniary transactions with with the native princes of India. The privilege of making special exceptions to the act was however reserved to the governors of our presidencies and the Court of Directors. Circumstances it was evident, might arise, which would make it advisable to resort to a practice, which at other times would be highly censurable, and with that consideration was the exception, which he had mentioned, made. It was not his (Mr. Impey's) intention, in offering these observations, to make an accusation against the Marquess of Hastings of breaking the law, because those legislative enactments were not viewed in India, in the same light, as by the authorities at home. His intention was to shew the court that general policy, adopted by this country towards India, which had for its object to prevent the occurrence of pecuniary transactions between British subjects and the native princes. The noble Marquess could not fail to know, that it was his duty to pursue the line of policy pointed out by the legislature. This he had not done; and what followed? The same effects, resulted to the Nizam as followed the transactions entered into with the Nabob of Arcot. Debts, to the enormous amount of above a crore of rupees, had been contracted by him with a British house of agency. And how was this to be paid off? Who was to make it good? It must come out of the coffers of the Company; but the East-India Company would not be the only sufferers by this affair. The successors of the Nizam, if he should have any, would be deprived of an annual revenue of above £70,000 sterling. He would proceed to detail the causes of these unfortunate results. The Marquess of Hastings proceeded in the early part of 1813, to assume the duties of the office of Governor-General of India. In his suite, as a part of his family, was a young gentleman of the name of Sir William Rumbold, who had married a ward of his lordship, and went to India in order to seek his fortune. He would not stop to blame his lordship for taking out such an individual: one who was not a servant of the Company—who had no fixed situation. It might truly be said, he was going to seek and pursue fortune, whichever way she might take her flight. He could not but consider, that the Marquess of Hastings had committed a very unfortunate act in taking with him Sir William Rumbold; and it should be a warning to future Governors-General. At that time Mr. Wm. Palmer was already known at Hyderabad; he had been truly said to be the son of a most distinguished officer of the Company. A more meritorious servant had, he believed, never belonged to the Company, than his father, Gen. Palmer. Mr. Wm. Palmer had, at first, entered into the military service of the Nizam; but, subsequently, in conjunction with a Mr. Samuel Russell and some others, he had engaged in commercial transactions. Now, it was notorious that he had, before the arrival of the noble Marquess in India, directly in the face of the law, engaged in pecuniary transactions with the Nizam's government; and this was the first clog that Mr. Wm. Palmer fixed on himself. This gentleman formed, in the year 1814, an establishment at Hyderabad, under the denomination of Wm. Palmer and Co., and in that year a proposition was made to Sir Wm. Rumbold to become a partner in it. (Hear!) Now, any one would naturally ask, why the house should have made this application to Sir Wm. Rumbold? for that gentleman had no money but what he borrowed. He had not the least knowledge or experience in commercial affairs; and even if he had, could not reside at Hyderabad, in consequence of his having official duties to attend to at Calcutta. Let them look at what took place in India in connection with this subject; the first object they would meet with was the celebrated letter of the Marquess of Hastings. How imprudent must the conduct of his Lordship's friends appear, when it was considered that they were aware such a document existed on the records of that house! To that letter the noble Marquess stated, that the partners of the firm speculated, by their connexion with Sir Wm. Rumbold, on interesting him in their favour. Now, what did he mean by this? Did he mean they wished to interest him in favour of their house, on account of their public services? on account of their encouraging the introduction of British manufactures into India, and establishing a regular mode of discipline among the troops of the Nizam? Did they wish his Lordship to interest himself in their favour, on such grounds as these? No! it was because Sir Wm. Rumbold was to become a partner in the house. (Hear, hear!) He regretted the late Resident at Hyderabad was not in court.

The hon. D. Kinnaid said, he could explain the cause of his absence.

Mr. Impey replied, he did not wish it. The Chairman observed, that the hon. proprietor should be allowed to explain.

The hon. D. Kinnaid said, the reason was a very melancholy accident that happened in his family.

Mr. Impey was very sorry to hear it. He was going to allude to what had been stated by the late Resident. He had said, that Mr. Palmer and himself were not on good terms. His words, in his letter to the Court of Directors, were these:—"It has been asserted, that a secret understanding exists between me and the house. I appeal to the members of the house, who are the most competent judges of my proceedings, whether, so far from considering me friendly towards them, they did not look upon me as absolutely hostile; and, I believe, that Mr. Palmer formed the connexion with Sir Wm. Rumbold, for the express purpose of resisting the opposition which he expected to receive from me. This was the late Resident's opinion, with respect to Sir Wm. Rumbold. According to his statement, a commercial house at Hyderabad had introduced Sir Wm. Rumbold into the firm, for the purpose of counteracting the efforts of the representative of the British government. In his (Mr. Impey's) opinion, there could be no clearer evidence as to the motive for introducing Sir Wm. Rumbold into the house. There had been, it appeared, much discussion previously to the forming of the connexion. The Marquess of Hastings at first opposed it, and reluctantly gave his consent. In consequence, Sir Wm. Rumbold, in April 1813, proceeded to Hyderabad, and signed a deed of partnership: it was important to state with whom. The names of the partners were, Mr. Wm. Palmer, Mr. Hastings Palmer, Bunketty Doss, a native, Dr. Currie, and Mr. Hans Sotheby. Now, when Sir Wm. Rumbold entered into the partnership, he was placed in this difficulty: the constitution of the Company required that all persons who enter their service should covenant not to engage in any commercial or pecuniary dealings. As there were two of the Company's servants in the firm, it became necessary to conceal their names: for, if they were known, the sanction and favour of the government could not be given to them; but the house, having engaged Sir Wm. Rumbold as a partner, commenced those operations on which the Court of Directors had so strongly pronounced their censure. Before, however, he entered into a detail of those proceedings, he would say a few words on the actual state of the Nizam's court at that time. The noble Marquess and his friends had contended, that the Nizam was an independent prince, and that, therefore, he was empowered to engage in what pecuniary dealings he chose, without the interference of the Company. Now, a proposition more directly in the face of fact and evidence than this, had never been broached. Long before the noble Marquess went to India, the Nizam had renounced all concern in the government of Hyderabad, and had no more sway there, than he (Mr. Impey) had. The minister who conducted the affairs of state, having died, the Nizam had appointed as his successor Mooneer-ool Moolk; but the Nizam was compelled by the Company to sign a treaty, by which that minister was excluded from any share in the government:—so much for the Nizam being an independent prince. Chundoo Loll is the next important personage; he had been, for sixteen years, the absolute ruler of that country, with no other check than that which was imposed by the Company: he was, in every sense of the word, the Company's minister. He (Mr. Impey) was unwilling to speak in harsh terms of him; he should be sorry to treat him, who was at so great a distance off, in the way Sir Charles Metcal and others had been treated. His character had been described in different terms; but it seemed agreed, that he was a man of ability, indeed the only person of ability in the country, and that he was devoted wholly to the interests of the Company. On the other hand, he is timid, suspicious of intrigues to subvert his authority, and ready to make any sacrifice to maintain his power. Was not such a person, he asked, likely to be influenced in favour of Messrs. Palmer and Co., when he knew that one of their partners was so nearly connected with the Governor-General, and when they were able to produce notes in the hand-writing of the Governor-General, containing his sentiments with regard to the dealings between them and the Nizam? (Hear!) He must next advert to Mr. Russell, and no one could be less disposed to mention the name of that gentleman with disrespect than he (Mr. Impey). Mr. Russell was undoubtedly an able and useful servant of the Company; he had rendered them great services—so had the Marquess of Hastings: he had a right to consider his conduct as well as that of the noble Marquess. Though he had stated that he was not on good terms with Mr. Wm. Palmer, yet he never opposed his views but in one solitary instance, and then his efforts were counteracted by the influence of Sir W. Rumbold. The first in order of the three transactions, which have drawn censure on Lord Hastings, was the license exempting the house of W. Palmer and Co. from the penalties enacted by the law passed, in 1797; the Aurungabad transaction was the second, and the 60 lac loan the third. Now to speak of the license: Mr. W. Palmer, wishing to enter again into pecuniary transactions with the Nizam's government, thought it prudent first to obtain a license, which would absolve him from the penalties of the act above named. For this purpose he applied to the Resident, Mr. Russell, who transmitted the proposition to government, with Mr. Palmer's letter and his own recommendation. The letter stated: "We believe that the penalties we allude to were imposed by act of parliament, with a view to prevent European subjects from acquiring privately too much influence at native courts, and from taking advantage of the necessities of native governments, to extort exorbitant interest from them. We feel confident that our transactions cannot lead to either of these

these objects, and that their immediate operation has no taint of that quality; so that we are precisely in the situation which the act contemplated, in giving power to the Governor-General in Council to exempt from the penalties. Our transactions have always been open and public, and whenever we have considered them as connected with the government, they have been directly with the minister, who possesses the confidence and support of the British government." Thus it was admitted, that the house had had pecuniary transactions with the Nizam before the time when the application for the license was made; yet the government never inquired what these transactions were or the names of the partners: the application was successful, and the license was granted. Now on this point three objections arose: in the first place, it had been said, that it was never the intention of the legislature, in enacting the law, that a license should be granted for private purposes or private patronage, but only on such important occasions as when the interest of the Company were at stake. In his opinion, this was the object of the law in question; however, in this it was possible that the Marquess of Hastings might be misled. The next objection was the granting of the license without the names of the partners being specified. He (Mr. Impey) doubted whether such an instrument could be of the least avail in a court of justice. It was natural to inquire, whether the names of the partners were known to Mr. Russell and the Marquess of Hastings? He had taken great pains to inform himself on this point: he had carefully looked through the papers, and could not find when they first acquired that knowledge; but he had found a fact, which he called on the supporters of the motion to answer, if they could: he found that, the fact of Mr. Hans Sothely being a partner in the house, was known to the Marquess of Hastings at some period of his government, and yet he omitted to inform his council of it. (Hear, hear!) He went further: he even, under that concealment, gave to that gentleman a high and confidential employment—that of agent at Moorsheadabad. Notwithstanding all that had been said of the desire of the house to let their transactions lie open to public view, yet it appeared that great anxiety was manifested to keep them a secret from the government at Calcutta; or, if that could not be done, at least from the government at home. The granting of the license took place in 1816; and the third objection to this proceeding was, that the first mention of it, in the records of the Bengal government, occurred in January 1817, and that the Court of Directors never heard of it until May 1818. The delay in communicating the fact to the authorities at home, might possibly have been accidental; but, viewed in connection with the other circumstances, it was a strong imputation on the noble Marquess, and one which called for a clear and decided answer. When, however, they did get information of it, the chairs were occupied by two experienced Directors, who were well acquainted with all the transactions connected with the Carnatic affairs, and foresaw that the same game would be played over again: the same scenes would occur at Hyderabad as had produced such melancholy results at other places. The Court of Directors became alarmed at the prospect, and, without one dissentient voice, they unanimously agreed to send out an order to revoke the license and put a stop to these transactions. This was the language used by the Court of Directors:

"We have to observe, in the first place, that the power which you have thus thought fit to exercise, could not have been granted by the legislature, in contemplation of such an use as you have made of it.

"It was obviously intended for the purpose of meeting extraordinary exigencies, not of generally licensing an illegal traffic; and we have great doubts whether such a license as you have given (a general license, without a special case of necessity, and without limit) would be held to be legal, and would be found effectual for the protection of Messrs. Palmer and Co. against any prosecution under the act.

"But waving this discussion, we desire to be informed whether the resident has availed himself of the power reserved to him, by acquainting himself constantly and thoroughly with the nature of the pecuniary transactions of that house with the Nizam's government; and, in the next place, whether he has reported to you respecting them. In the event of his having done so, you will not fail to transmit the report for our information.

"After the experience which we have had, both in Oude and in the Carnatic, of the dreadful abuses which resulted from the pecuniary dealings of British subjects with native princes, and the jealousy manifested by the legislature of all such transactions, we can by no means approve of the indulgence which you have extended to Messrs. Palmer and Co.; and we positively direct, that the instrument by which that indulgence was conveyed, may be, immediately upon the receipt of this despatch, revoked and cancelled, and that the countenance of our governments may be strictly confined to those objects of a commercial nature, which they professed originally to have in view."

This despatch was one of those in which the sanction of the court was called for. It was unanimously adopted by the Court of Directors, and was sent for confirmation to the Board of Control, of which Mr. Canning was then President. Now, at that that period; the despatches sent out to India, to his certain knowledge, received the strictest attention from the Board; and it was unlikely that this attention should not be extended to a despatch of such importance; that an exception should be made to this despatch, in which the conduct of the Governor-General was censured: yet, he repeated, it was confirmed by the Board of Control, and sent out to India. (Hear!) The Aurungabad transaction followed in order: it was an engagement entered into by Messrs. Palmer and Co., by which they were to supply the pay of a part of the Nizam's troops, amounting to two lacs per month, and the government of the Nizam in return were to give them assignments on the revenue, to the amount of thirty lacs, to pay off the whole debt. Whether this arrangement were good or bad, fair or unfair, it mattered not to him, his argument would stand in the same force. The contract was sent to Calcutta, backed by the opinion of the resident in its favour, for the sanction of the government; and here he must stop awhile, to say a few words on this term "sanction." The friends of the Marquess of Hastings contend that none of the transactions of the house of Messrs. Palmer and Co. were guaranteed by government; now, in the present case, did not a proposition come from the resident to the council for its sanction, and is not the sanction ultimately granted? It had been said there was a difference between a sanction and a guarantee. He would not spend any argument on that point; he could perceive no substantial difference, and thought it right to make this remark, as it was the first time he had come to the word "sanction." On this occasion began Mr. Stuart's memorable opposition to these transactions: though he did not come there to praise any individual, yet, as he had alluded to the hon. proprietor on his right, he could not forbear to give him a due share of commendation, as he had done to Mr. Russell, the late resident whom he (Mr. Impey) had styled a meritorious servant of the Company. He recognized in Mr. Stuart, one of the ablest and most independent servants in India; a man who had forced himself by his services and talents into a seat in the council; and he (Mr. Impey) hoped the Company would still benefit by his abilities. (Hear!) It was he who first objected to the Aurungabad transaction. He said, when the question was under the consideration of the council, "I know nothing of this contract. I must first see a figured statement, and be informed of the rate of interest, to be charged before I can give my consent." The council felt the force of this reasoning, and sent a despatch to Hyderabad, desiring that Messrs. Palmer and Co. would forward to them a copy of the agreement and figured statements of the terms. At this stage of the proceeding, the influence of Sir W. Rumbold came into play. Then were the services of that gentleman found to be most useful; and he could not be called a sleeping partner, but became the most active partner in the firm. He came from Hyderabad to Calcutta and wrote to the secretary to government, deprecating the demand for accounts; and on what grounds? He first asserted, that the Nizam was an independent prince, and that therefore the government had nothing to do with any contracts he might enter into; and next, he contended, that it was unfair to compel a mercantile house to produce the accounts of its dealings with customers. The Nizam, by-the-by, was not the customer of the house; but let that pass. He (Mr. Impey) contended, that the requiring their accounts, was imposing no hardship on the house. In this country, commercial establishments are obliged, on all fit occasions, not to produce copies merely of their accounts, but their original books. Could the Marquess of Hastings, he asked, have allowed himself to be imposed upon by such pretexes as these, if some undue influence had not been at work? It was, however, the case, that such flimsy pretexes prevailed upon him. The accounts, however, soon arrived at the council; they were laid on the table, but it seems were not to be recorded: and why not? Because people in England might misunderstand, and make absurd objections to them. Sir Wm. Rumbold himself said as much as this. When Mr. Stuart found they were not to be recorded, he refused to inspect them at all. The measure was then adopted in council, and the Governor-General gave his sanction to the contract, though nothing whatever had been communicated, respecting the rate of interest to be charged. The guarantee of the government, was certainly involved in that act, and the result had proved this; for they had been obliged to pay the money. He had now come to the sixty lac loan: at the time that transaction took place, the Hyderabad Papers stated, that the Nizam was indebted to the house of Palmer and Co. to the amount of about 60 lacs. The balances had arisen out of four accounts, and these balances the late Resident assured them had been all sanctioned by government. This, he (Mr. Impey) denied. He contended, that the sanction of government had, at that time, been given to nothing but the Aurungabad contract; and even to that, when the partners' names were not known, and therefore it was given under a concealment, and was, in fact, no sanction at all. He contended, that if their names had been known, no sanction could have been given by government, and on this ground, he held that they were to be considered un-sanctioned balances. It was of material advantage to the house to obtain a sanction to all their balances, by including them in one sanctioned account. The agreement between Chundoo Loll and the house was stated to be, that a sixty lac loan should be contracted for, and that the house should advance £600,000; for which the Nizam was to give them assignments on his revenue, to pay off the whole debt at the end of six years. This plan they carried to the Resident, that he might obtain for them the sanction of the Bengal government; and what answer did he give them? He said such a plan could never be sanctioned by government, and he refused to forward it. The house then sent it privately to the Governor-General, and he laid it before some of the members of council. He subsequently wrote a letter to Mr. John Palmer, expressing his astonishment, at the refusal of the Resident, to forward such a plan. This letter the partners showed to the Resident. Now, what was to be argued from this? Why, it was evident, that the views of the Resident had been superseded by Sir Wm. Rumbold's influence. He (Mr. Impey) did not intend to blame Mr. Russell for the line of conduct he pursued, after he had seen the Governor-General's letter. He naturally was unwilling to oppose himself to such powerful interest. Sir C. Metcalf, by not following so prudent a course, had got himself into hot water; but that gentleman had, for his consolation, the merit of having overturned a system, which was in the highest degree ruinous to the Company's and the Nizam's interests. Subsequently, the plan was, in consequence of this note, sent by Mr. Russell to Calcutta; but when it was laid before the council, Mr. Stuart was found at his post to oppose it, with his former objections; namely, that no particulars were given. He drew up a minute, which he (Mr. Impey) would not detain the court by reading. In this document he declared, that it was the duty of the British government to protect the Nizam's interests, and ascertain that he would be benefited by the transaction. He would not read the answer of the Marquess of Hastings; but his lordship observed, that as it was a question in which he felt a near concern, and as it was possible his judgment might be warped by a bias, he declined to take any part in the discussion. Now, he would ask the whole court, the friends, and enemies of the noble Marquess, whether the line of conduct he then drew out for himself was not most wise and honourable? (Hear, hear!) The majority of the council, however, coincided in the opinion of his hon. friend (Mr. Stuart) that no sanction ought to be given until the particulars were furnished. Had the matter been concluded there, the plan would have fallen to the ground. He did not know where Sir William Rumbold was at the time, or what he did; but the fact, the melancholy fact was that the Marquess of Hastings revoked his resolution of abstaining from taking part in the business, and gave his casting vote for the measure without examination.

Mr. Stuart thought it of material consequence that the court should be put in possession of the true state of the case. When the proposition of the sixty lac loan was brought before council, both himself and Mr. Adam certainly opposed it. The Marquess of Hastings then declared that he would take no part in the discussion, in consequence of the interest he took in Sir Wm. Rumbold. In Mr. Fendall's minute, approving of the plan, he expressed his regret at this circumstance. The noble Marquess then revoked the resolution he had formed of not taking part in the discussion. He did not, however, oppose the majority of the council, but voted with Mr. Fendall; and the question was carried by his casting vote.

Mr. Impey proceeded, by saying that his hon. friend had not rightly understood him. He either did say, or meant to say, that, in the first stage of the business, the Marquess of Hastings declared he would take no part in the discussion. In the next, that the majority of the council were opposed to the plan, but that ultimately the noble Marquess carried it by his casting vote. He (Mr. Impey) admitted that the two minutes on this subject, by Mr. Stuart and Mr. Adam, which had been read in the course of the debate, were in the highest degree complimentary to the noble Marquess. The writers of them had expressed their reliance on his candour and his honour, and they declared their conviction that his judgment could not be influenced by any undue bias. The noble Marquess had, however, previously declared that there was a bias on his mind. ("No! no!" and cries of, "read!") He did not wish to fatigue the court by reading long extracts; the friends of the Marquess might read what they pleased; all the papers were before the court.

A Proprietor.—The words are, "There might be a bias."

Mr. Impey continued. It was of very little consequence whether his lordship said there was or might be a bias on his mind, which might affect his judgment. What he (Mr. Impey) asked was, whether, as an honest man at the head of the government, the Marquess of Hastings ought not to have stuck to his original resolution of abstaining from taking any part in the discussion? The Court of Directors, when they heard of these proceedings, was filled with indignation. (Hear!) This feeling was universal. Even the hon. director on his his left (Mr. Pattison) shared in it. The Chairman at that time, Sir Thomas Reid, drew up a despatch in which the whole proceedings were commented upon in the severest terms of condemnation. What followed this, on the part of the noble Marquess? Why, he sent a private letter to the Chairman of the Company, instead of answering the despatch of the Court of Directors, as a Governor-General in Council. (Cries of "No!") He maintained this was the fact. The letter was among the Hyderabad papers, and would prove it. In that letter, the noble Marquess assumed that the despatch was not the act of the Court of Directors; but that it had been foisted upon them, and that they had signed it, in utter ignorance of its contents. His lordship, after advancing this assumption, God knows on what grounds, went on to say, that it contained nothing but false statements. He believed those were his words; he would, however, read the passage, which was inserted in page 124:—"It may be thought that I cannot but be astonished at so strange a perversion of circumstances; I am not, however, surprised. I should have been so, could I ascribe the tenor of the letter to the real judgment of the hon. court: but I repeat, with every solemnity of profession, my being certain that what the hon. court subscribed, was palmed insidiously on its unsuspecting candour." (Hear! from Mr. Annand.)—He wished the hon. proprietor to hear, and to answer him, if possible. Now, in order to conclude this part of the subject, he would read to the proprietors the political letter to Bengal, in answer to the letter of the Marquess of Hastings, of the 20th of October 1822. The letter, to which he now called the attention of the court, was dated the 5th of November 1823, and was signed by the Court of Directors. Its contents were these:—"Our late Chairman has communicated to us a letter, addressed to him by the Marquess of Hastings, on the 20th of October last, in reply to the letter addressed by us to the Governor-General in Council, on the 24th of November 1821. This letter, according to the intimation which has been repeatedly conveyed to you, is properly only a private paper. It is addressed to the Chairman, and not to the court, as it ought to have been, if it was meant to be a public document; and it bears the signature of the Governor-General singly, instead of being subscribed by all the members of the government. Nevertheless, as the letter contains matter which we cannot, in justice to ourselves, suffer to pass unnoticed, we herewith transmit a copy of it for your information. It is not our present intention to enter on the subject treated of in this irregular communication; but it is necessary that we should pronounce entirely void of foundation, the belief professed by his lordship in that letter, that our political despatch, of the 28th November 1821, did not faithfully and truly express our sentiments on the transactions of which it treated. 'I repeat,' says his lordship, towards the conclusion of his letter, 'with every solemnity of profession, my being certain that what the hon. court subscribed was palmed insidiously on its unsuspecting candour.' A declaration more offensive to the constituted authority at home, could not well have escaped from his lordship, and one more at variance with fact, never was hazarded by any one. We should be wholly unfit for the situation in which we are placed, if, on any occasions, we could voluntarily subscribe our names to a despatch, the contents of which were not the result of our deliberate convictions; and the particular despatch in question was, in fact, the result of much investigation, and more than ordinary deliberation. Having, from the peculiar circumstances of Lord Hastings' letter, been led to notice it, contrary to our general intention in regard to private papers, we have to apprise you, that, in future, irregular communications of this nature will be disregarded in our official correspondence." Up to this point, it appeared, that every step which had been taken in the Hyderabad transactions, by the Marquess of Hastings, had met the strong, clear, distinct and unanimous censure of two Courts of Directors, and two Boards of Control—there seemed to be no difference of opinion. Up to the period which he had just referred to, all were unanimous at home, with respect to their sentiments on those proceedings. Subsequent to that period, a great many transactions took place, which were recorded in these papers. If he were to attempt to meddle with those transactions—if he were to endeavour to do them justice—not only the sun, but the moon and stars would go down before he had finished; he would not, therefore, enter at any length into those subjects. It did appear, with respect to those transactions, that they were only a corollary of what went before. It was recorded, on the authority of about twenty directors, that the noble Marquess was quite wrong in these treasures; and it also appeared, that his hon. friend (Mr. Pattison), whose name was affixed to the letter of 1821, did not censure the noble Marquess, but protested against the proceedings of the Court of Directors: the Board of Control, however, agreed with the majority of the Executive Body. With respect to his hon. friend, he never did, and never would speak of him either in public or in private, without declaring the esteem in which he held his character. He was a man of whose talents he had a very high opinion, and of whose inflexible integrity no person could entertain a doubt. So much did he value the acuteness of mind mind, and purity of principle, by which his hon. friend was distinguished, that, if this were a question of which he (Mr. Impey) knew nothing; if it were a question which he had not closely examined, he should be inclined to think it highly probable that his hon. friend's opinion might be correct to be guided by it and to vote with him; but he could not adopt his sentiments in this case. He had fully considered it, and he found that his opinion and the opinion of his hon. friend were opposed to each other. His hon. friend had stated very fairly, that he was satisfied with the answers which had been given to these charges—that he was contented with the explanations that had been offered, relative to these transactions; and that, therefore, he had altered his opinion. He gave his hon. friend credit for his sincerity in making that declaration: he would not impute to him any blamable inconsistency, because he had adopted, on reflection, sentiments different from those which he previously entertained. He had a right, upon mature consideration, to change his opinions; and he had an equal right, having done so, to avow his sentiments and to defend them. The court could not, however, decide on the merits of his hon. friend's protest without examining it—they could not approve of the despatch, or of the protest which it called forth, without duly weighing all the circumstances; and, having done so, those who were in favour of the despatch, would of course, vote for the amendment; and those who approved of the protest would uphold the original motion. He now came to the history of the two last years of the Marquess of Hastings' administration; during which, being opposed to all his council, he carried all his measures by his own despotic authority—by that authority, which was very properly placed, for wise and useful purposes, in the hands of the Governor-General. Sir C. Metcalf was called upon to execute the orders of the Company, as contained in those despatches, which had been so often referred to. The orders were to put a stop to all transactions between the Nizam and the house of Palmer and Co., and to wind up the affairs between those parties immediately. His attention was particularly directed to the sixty lac loan, which appeared to him to bear a fictitious character. In the course of the inquiries of Sir C. Metcalf, he demanded of Chundoo Loll, what effects had been produced by this sixty lac loan; and he was answered, that it had produced great effects; but he saw that the account given by Chundoo Loll, was a fallacious representation; and he stated, that, so far as he had an opportunity of observing, he did not perceive that any good effects had been produced by that arrangement. Another order, sent out by the Court of Directors was to call for the accounts of Palmer and Co. These accounts, after long delays, were furnished; and, on their being produced and examined, Sir C. Metcalf and the government, thought that the whole of the sixty lac loan was a fictitious proceeding. Chundoo Loll had not received a single rupee; and that the loan was fabricated for the purpose of gaining a sanction for old balances to a large amount. Money, it seemed, had been advanced, which Chundoo Loll had never stated; which he had, in fact, kept concealed, and those claims were now put in as part of this sixty lac loan. The Marquess of Hastings was, at that time, still at the head of the government; and he received this information as any honest man would do, with very great indignation. This was proved by the noble lord's animadversions on the conduct of Palmer and Co. and Chundoo Loll, which he would hereafter read. At this time the minister had leaped into the gulf, and it was absolutely necessary to preserve the Nizam, that the connexion between Messrs. Palmer and Co. and Chundoo Loll should be dissolved. At an earlier period of these transactions, the Marquess of Hastings, had refused to advance money out of the Company's treasury for the use of the Nizam's government; but now, when the business was brought to an end, when these transactions were terminated, the noble Marquess was ready to advance a million of the Company's money, for the purpose of paying off Palmer and Co. (Hear!) He had here a word to say, which, if not absolutely necessary to explain the conduct of the noble Marquess, might, at all events, be introduced with propriety. Messrs. Palmer and Co. were not before the court, and that they would ever come before it, he thought, was an extremely improbable supposition. It was, however, exceedingly good policy, in the friends of Messrs. Palmer and Co., to mix up their case as far as they could with that of the Marquess of Hastings. His lordship would be a very useful ally to them, if their case could be connected with his: but, that the Marquess of Hastings, or his supporters could desire to mix up his case with that of Messrs. Palmer and Co. could never, even for a moment, be imagined. (Hear, hear!) No true friend of the noble Marquess could think of mixing up his character with transactions that were, to say nothing more of them, coupled with considerable doubts; and, he believed, when those doubts were removed, that the transactions of Palmer and Co., with the Nizam's government, would assume a very different aspect from that which the friends of the parties had described. The late Resident at Hyderabad (Mr. Russell) had made a speech to the court, which was deservedly applauded by the gentlemen who surrounded him, on account of the great ability which it displayed. They need not, however, look to the speeches of that hon. proprietor for proofs of his talent and ability—he had made them sufficiently conspicuous while acting as a servant of the Company. (Hear!) The whole object of that speech was to bring the Marquess of Hastings before the court, along with Messrs. Palmer and Co. Now, he would ask, whether it was friendly to the Marquess of Hastings to proceed in this way? In the accusation of any man, it would be thought harsh and unjust to mix up any transactions in which he might have borne a part, with the proceedings of another individual, whose conduct was admitted, or supposed not to have been good. They had been adjured, if they had any sense of justice, not to anticipate the case of Messrs. Palmer and Co., not to condemn them unheard, which it was said, they would do, if they agreed to this amendment. He could not see this; what was to hinder them from bringing their case, in any way they pleased, before the public? It was asserted that they had been greatly injured by these proceedings—that they had suffered a loss of £500,000. If they had suffered, through the conduct of the servants of the Company, or through the directions given by the Company in England to the government in India—they might still have redress, but not in that court, the case could not be heard here: the Court of Proprietors, was not a court of justice; they could not look over those accounts, and give a decision on them; the parties could go into Chancery. (Laughter.) He could tell the court, that the proceedings there might be more summary than they imagined. Were the parties to apply to Chancery, the original book must be produced, which was a very important and desirable thing. If they had any grievances to complain of, the courts of justice were open to them; and they were certain of obtaining pure and perfect justice, if they had sustained any injury. Notwithstanding the ability displayed by the hon. proprietor (Mr. Russell) in his address—and certainly it was distinguished by many very acute comments—he could not bring himself to view it as a wise speech; and he confessed to the hon. proprietor, that he was not persuaded by any part of it, not even by that part of it which more immediately referred to Mr. W. Palmer. He thought it was a very unwise thing for the hon. ex-resident to mix up his character, in any way, with the proceedings of Messrs. Palmer and Co. It had been said, that some improper connexion subsisted between the hon. proprietor and the house of Palmer and Co.; but he (Mr. Impey) was very far from asserting that the conduct of the hon. proprietor had been in any respect unfair or objectionable. The conduct, however, of Messrs. Palmer and Co. was under consideration; and, until it was cleared up, it was not wise in the hon. proprietor to mix up his character with theirs. He would tell the hon. proprietor, why he was not convinced by his arguments. It was because all that the hon. proprietor had advanced was founded on the statement, the published letter of Sir W. Rumbold: he took that statement for his text, and on it he made his comments. Now, he (Mr. Impey) could not rely on the statement published by Sir W. Rumbold. (Hear!) His first reason was, because it had been stated by the Attorney General, and by their own law-officer, that the account of Sir W. Rumbold, did not agree with the account of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co.; they were quite inconsistent with, and could not be reconciled to each other. (Hear!) Now, for the examination of accounts, either in England or in India, this Company possessed as efficient apparatus as could possibly be met with any where. Those accounts had been examined in India; they had also been transmitted for examination to this house; and the opinion entertained in India was that the sixty lac loan was a fictitious transaction—that nothing had been paid towards any such loan. On an examination of the accounts, there was one point on which he founded his opinion, that this view of the transaction was correct; to him it certainly appeared very strong indeed. By order of the government, Sir C. Metcalf called on Palmer and Co. for an account of what sums were advanced on the sixty lac loan. Now, if they would turn to "Account C, folio 1," page 661, they would find, under the head "Chundoo Loll's new account, in account current with Messrs. Palmer and Co." that the first item was, "To Rajah Chundoo Loll, transfer amount at his credit, rupees 52,00,000." He this account really what it might, it professed, at least, to be a statement of what was advanced by Palmer and Co. to Chundoo Loll, on the sixty lac loan. The first item, as he had observed, was "transfer amount at Chundoo Loll's credit, rupees 52,00,000"—and then came "compensation on loan, and premium on interest reduced, (in other words the bonus) rupees 8,00,000"—which made up 60,00,000. Such, it appeared, was the famous sixty lac loan. If he were appointed judge or arbitrator in this case, it would not appear to him, looking at this account, that any thing had been really advanced. (Hear!) There might be some error in the entry; but, as it stood now, the transaction seemed to have been fictitious. On this account, comparing the statement here given, with that of Sir W. Rumbold, he could not say much much attention to the explanation sent forth by that gentleman. There was another circumstance, in the conduct of Sir W. Rumbold, which prevented him from attending very readily to his statement, unless it were corroborated by other authorities. He was attacked in the public journals, for having taken twenty-four per cent. interest;—and what did he do? He directed the Attorney-General to apply to the Court of King's Bench for a criminal information for a libel. That application was accordingly made, and the judges asked, "Has Sir W. Rumbold, denied this transaction?" (Hear, hear!) At that time he had not denied it; but, afterwards he certainly did deny it; and there was now, on the file of the court, an affidavit that the house never took twenty-four per cent. interest. (Hear!) If this were the fact, and he had no doubt of it, what became of the statement of the late resident? (Hear, hear!) And what confidence could he, or any other gentleman, place in the assertions of Sir W. Rumbold? (Hear, hear!) He felt that he had gone at very great length into this subject, and nothing but its extreme importance could have induced him to do so. He hoped, however, the court would see the necessity of investigating this question in the fullest possible manner. His learned friend on the opposite side had complained, that the Chairman had, on this occasion, taken an active part against the Marquess of Hastings. An idea seemed to be entertained, that because his hon. friend sat in that chair, he was not to exercise his undoubted right as a proprietor. This was a very unfair and preposterous doctrine; the high situation which he filled did not compel him to cast aside his character as a proprietor of East India stock. He surely had a right to express his opinion, when he saw that the weight and influence of the noble Marquess had brought down so many persons of consideration to support that nobleman's cause. His learned friend had said the court was called on, in this case, to record a verdict on the honour and integrity of the Marquess of Hastings. The strict question was not, whether there was any thing in these transactions, that reflected on his integrity? but, whether there was any thing, in that large book, that reflected, in the least degree, on his personal character? They were not, however, called on to give a verdict in a judicial sense. It would be for them, by their decision this day, to declare also whether they did, or did not, approve of the conduct of the directors. The circumstances under which the subject was introduced to them, demanded this. As, then, they were called on for a verdict, it was necessary to inquire what a verdict was? A verdict was true judgment; and, in this instance, that true judgment must be formed on the documents before the court. Here were all the despatches of the Court of Directors, and here were all the answers of the Governor-General. It was their duty to examine both, and to give a just verdict, after having impartially weighed the evidence. Having stated some very strong reasons why he could not agree with the original question, he would now state why he thought the proprietors ought to support the amendment. In his opinion, they would not do justice to the government of India, nor to the Court of Directors, if that amendment did not meet with their support. (Hear!) A speech had been made, early in the debate, by an hon. proprietor (Mr. Hume), who was a member of the legislature, which excited his astonishment, in no trivial degree. They were all struck with the mild and conciliatory manner, in which the hon. proprietor now in his eye (hon. D. Kinnaid) brought forward this motion. (Hear!) The speech of the hon. proprietor to whom he had alluded was as opposite as possible in its character to that of the hon. mover. The hon. proprietor had used terms as offensive and as irritating as could be conceived. He had dealt in imputations of an unjust and unpleasant nature as could be imagined. He was not at present in court; public business, no doubt, detained him elsewhere. He regretted the circumstance, because he felt it necessary to make some observations on that hon. proprietor's course of proceeding. That hon. proprietor was a great reformer, and a sworn enemy to all jobs; and, to preserve the consistency of his character, he came among them, at his leisure hours, to support what appeared to many the grossest and most enormous of all jobs. (Hear!) He thought he preserved his consistency, in the eyes of the public, as a foe to jobs; while, in the face of that court, he supported one of the grossest, most palpable, and most perfect jobs, that was ever known. (Hear, hear!) What were the arguments by which the hon. proprietor supported the amendment? It would be really difficult to discover his arguments; but it was easy enough to follow him through his assertions. He said, first, that the court had been taken by surprise; and then that a trick had been resorted to by the hon. directors, who moved and seconded the amendment. He next observed, or insinuated, that the hon. Chairman had shewn the cloven foot. Were these, he calmly asked, observations worthy of such an assembly? (Hear!) How could the hon. proprietor talk of the court having been taken by surprise? The Hyderabad papers had been before the proprietors for months. There was no surprise; and it was astonishing, that, after four or five public debates, relative to the production of papers, the hon. proprietor should should stand up, and make use of those offensive expressions, imputing trick and finesse to the hon. Chairman. (Hear!) He had been pleased to say, that the hon. Chairman had shewn the cloven foot. Could anything be conceived more offensive or disgusting than the application of such language to the hon. Chairman? (Hear!) Where was the cloven foot? The papers were in the hands of all the proprietors, and they would, no doubt, form their opinion on them, without any reference to the sentiments of this, or of that individual. Why, he should be glad to know, ought they to confine their vote to the Marquess of Hastings? Were not the Court of Directors and the Indian government also before them? (Hear!) The friends of the noble Marquess demanded his acquittal from the proprietors; but, on the other hand, they were called upon to look to his colleagues in the Bengal government, and also to have some consideration for the Court of Directors. (Hear!) The amendment met this, which was the just view of the case. It declared, that no corrupt motives had actuated any member of the Bengal government, and it declared the court's approval of the conduct of the executive body. There were some parts of the hon. proprietor's speech, which afforded strong arguments for agreeing with the amendment. He declared, that he would "impeach" Mr. Adam. Here the hon. proprietor himself shewed "the cloven foot"—here he proved his own aptitude for "trick." (Hear!) The hon. proprietor wanted to get a vote in favour of the Marquess of Hastings—and that done, he would turn round and attack those independent individuals, who had felt it to be their duty to oppose the noble Marquess. (Hear!) Was it fair, was it ingenious to procure a vote in favour of the noble Marquess, and then to turn round, and use it as an instrument to persecute and distress others? (Hear!) The character of Mr. Adam had been spoken of in that court, as it deserved to be spoken of—he was described as a most upright and honourable man. He was sure that Mr. Adam was afraid of no impeachment; and he would venture to say, that, if the hon. proprietor chose to attack Mr. Adam, because he had fearlessly performed his duty, that gentleman would find able, effectual, and disinterested defenders in this court and elsewhere. (Hear!) The hon. proprietor had already been shamefully defeated by his (Mr. Impey's) learned friend, in an attack which he had made on Mr. Adam; and, if he renewed his attack, it would be only the renewal of his own defeat and disgrace. (Hear!) The hon. proprietor appeared to be a great friend to Messrs. Palmer and Co.; for the whole tenour of his speech was a defence of that firm, and not of the Marquess of Hastings. (Hear!)

How did the hon. proprietor shape his argument? First, he advanced the old fallacy, that the Nizam was an independent prince; and secondly, that the transactions were intended, and were in fact, well calculated for the benefit of the Nizam's territory. Now, he had looked over all that book, and he could see nothing which proved to him, that the Nizam had been benefited, in any material degree, by any part of those measures. This, however, was nothing to the purpose; for, however the money was applied by Chundoo Loll, that circumstance had nothing to do with the original compact, which must stand or fall on its own merits. (Hear!) The hon. proprietor argued, that the bonus was fair, because the English government and the Indian government, both recognized bounties; or, in other words, that Palmer and Co. had a right to exact bounties, because in ordinary loan transactions a bonus was proper. But, what had that to do with the present question? In the first place, the bonus was concealed; and, if it had been the fairest transaction in the world, that circumstance must throw discredit on it: in the second place, there was no appearance of any consideration having been paid. The interest was to be lowered from twenty-four to eighteen per cent; but, what did they find at last? They found that this bonus was to be paid, on account of the reduction of the interest. (Hear!) The hon. proprietor next told the court, that the military allowances granted to Palmer and Co., were all fairly earned: Mr. Wm. Palmer, if this were the case, must have been a very eminent soldier; he must have performed great military services. The Nizam, being an independent and most liberal prince, not only rewarded him but his children, his moonshees, his dependents, and his servants, to such an amount that the arrears only amounted to £115,000. (Hear!) What was the Marquis of Hastings, with reference to his services, when compared with Mr. Wm. Palmer? The noble Marquess received a grant of £60,000 for his eminent services, but Mr. Wm. Palmer and his family, claimed £115,000 for arrears only. (Hear!) That gentleman must have performed services greater than any that had been achieved in India, since the time of Alexander the Great, to deserve such a liberal remuneration. (Hear, hear!) Those services never would have been heard of in India, or in this country, but for the examination that had been made into their commercial or banking transactions. (Hear!) On the subject of those military allowances, he thought it would be sufficient for a great many proprietors, if he placed, in opposition to them, the opinion of the Bengal government; it might be enough for others, if he quoted the opinions of the Attorney-General,

General, and of their own law officer, who had been consulted on the occasion; but, for the full satisfaction of every gentleman in that court, he would read the opinion of the Marquess of Hastings himself; and, founding himself on that opinion, he called for their unanimous vote against Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. (Hear, hear!) In page 286, they would find, under date of the 19th of Nov. 1822, the public despatch of the Marquess of Hastings to Sir C. T. Metcalf, in which was the following passage, relating to these military allowances: "The point in question has reference to Mr. Wm. Palmer's statement, in explanation of the large monthly allowances held by him and his brother, Mr. H. Palmer, and the stipends," (here, observed Mr. Impey, the military services of Mr. W. Palmer were entirely put out of the question) "to the children of the former, from the government of his highness the Nizam." On the subject of the allowance to Mr. H. Palmer, the statement of Mr. W. Palmer is entirely silent; it will be necessary, therefore, to ascertain whether the omission be accidental, or whether the house do not desire to offer any further observations in reply to the reference already made to them on that subject. With regard to Mr. Wm. Palmer's explanation of his own and his children's stipends, it is sufficient to remark that it is extremely unsatisfactory, and that, although the right of the Nizam to confer what allowances he pleases on those who are now, or have been in his service, or on their families, be unquestioned, it cannot be expected by his highness that the British government should come forward to advance a large sum of money for the liquidation of heavy arrears on such an account." Thus, said Mr. Impey, had reference to the possibility of the Company's being called on to supply funds for the discharge of this allowance account. "In the special instance under consideration, these arrears appear to have been accumulating, in common with the other debts of the state, at an exorbitant rate of interest." Such, observed Mr. Impey, were the words of the Marquess of Hastings. "If the above observations hold good in regard to pensions, actually conferred by the Nizam himself, in the free exercise of his independent authority, they must apply with still greater force to the acts of a minister, supposing the Nizam not to have been consulted in the appropriation of so large a sum of the revenues of the country, in their present deteriorated state. Such assumption of power, on the part of Chundoo Loll, while engaged with us, and enjoying our support, for the purpose of reducing establishments and expenses, which the state was unable to bear, could never receive the sanction of government; and cannot, indeed, be regarded as otherwise, than as standing wholly at the pleasure of the Nizam. Such charges cannot be acknowledged by this government." (Hear, hear!) He would now read two short passages, in one of which the opinion of the Marquess of Hastings, with respect to the bonus was very clearly stated. In page 187, they would find, in the public despatch of the noble Marquess, dated the 13th of Sep. 1822, and addressed to Sir C. Metcalf, the following remarkable passage:—"The conduct of the house of W. Palmer and Co. with respect to the bonus, is considered by the Governor-General in Council, to be in the highest degree reprehensible; and the concealment, both by the house and by the minister, of the real conditions of the loan, while they were seeking the sanction of the British government to the arrangement, and professing to put it in possession of the details of the transaction, admits of no excuse or palliation, and justifies the reference of a culpable collusion between those parties." (Hear, hear!) Now, without affecting to undervalue or injure the character of Mr. Russell, of whom, as a meritorious servant, he would always speak with the highest respect; he felt it necessary to state, what the Governor-General said, in the same despatch, relative to that gentleman. His lordship's words were these:—"The Governor-General in Council concludes, that the affair of the bonus was not made known to the late Resident; but his lordship in council cannot acquit Mr. Russell of very blameable neglect of duty, in not satisfying himself that the amount of the loan was properly appropriated; or, at least, in not reporting the misapplication to government, as soon as he became apprised of it, as with ordinary vigilance he must have been." (Hear!) He was already conscious of having too long occupied the time of the court; but the very great magnitude and importance of the subject, to the Company and to the interests of India, generally, must plead his excuse. He would shortly point out to the court, the relative situation of the parties to this question, and having done so, he felt he might safely trust the ultimate decision, to the usual good sense of the proprietors. "We have now before us, the Marquess of Hastings, a man of high birth and rank, of considerable talents, of powerful connexions in this country, who had been entrusted, for nine years, with the despotic government of India. He has performed very high services for the Company, and he has received very high rewards for those services. The distribution of the patronage of the Bengal provinces, by which he could increase his friends and connexions, was committed to his hands. Placed upon this very lofty pinnacle of honour, adorned with splendour, and armed with power, it appears, that in one particular instance, he

he has, perhaps, been inveigled (to use the expression of an hon. proprietor) into the adoption of conduct, of which the Court of Directors cannot approve. He has pursued that conduct, not from corrupt motives—not from any idea of personal advantage. (Hear, hear!) I am ready to admit this fact;—I am ready to admit that the noble Marquess was actuated by the motives described on the other side; that he erred from pure good nature; from incapacity to resist solicitation; from too great an anxiety to serve his friends. But the Bengal government and the Court of Directors here, felt it to be their painful, but their bounden duty, to resist, to control, and to visit with censure, conduct which appeared to them mischievous and reprehensible. The proprietors of East-India Stock, are now called on to approve of that control and that censure; and it is my decided opinion, that they are bound by every motive of honour and interest, to support the servants of the Company, both at home and abroad, on this occasion. (Hear!) If the amendment be negatived, what encouragement will be held out to the government of India to perform its duty in future? what encouragement will be afforded to the directors, to watch over and protect our interests, and the interests of India hereafter? (Hear!) I think I have said enough to convince every impartial person, that the court ought to agree to the amendment, which will strengthen the hands and increase the confidence of the government abroad, and of the directors at home. I shall now sit down, satisfied, whatever may be the result, with the consciousness of having discharged my duty. (Hear!)

Sir A. Johnston said a few words in explanation.

Mr. Edmonstone said, that he should detain the court but a very short time. It was not his intention to enter into a discussion of the main question. His only object in rising was to explain some circumstances, which the hon. and learned gentleman who had just addressed the court, had, in his very able and luminous speech, unintentionally placed in an erroneous point of view. He (Mr. E.) proposed to advert to those circumstances, because they had reference to the time when he himself had the honour of being a member of the Bengal government, and were consequently circumstances to which he could speak from his own personal knowledge. He believed he was correct in saying, that the learned proprietor had stated, that when the house of W. Palmer and Co. obtained the sanction of government in 1814, it was then known that they had engaged in pecuniary transactions with the Nizam's government. He (Mr. Edmonstone) begged to say, that this was not so. At that time, the government had no knowledge of any such transactions, neither was there in the papers any statement that could bear out the supposition of the house of W. Palmer and Co. having at that time (1814) engaged in them. The sanction of the government was granted for the establishment of a commercial and banking concern, which was also to act as a house of agency; and in that character the establishment of the house was approved of, and confirmed by the Court of Directors. Its establishment, as a house of agency and commerce, was thought at the time likely to be productive of essential benefit to the Nizam's government, and, from our connection with that government, of advantage to our own. A commercial treaty, as had been observed by another proprietor, existed between the Nizam and the Company; and it was believed that the transactions of the house would materially assist in giving effect to the provisions of that treaty. There was no doubt that much benefit had been derived, as was expected, from the commercial operations of the house, and the conviction of this fact was a principal cause for granting the licence of 1816; but he ventured to affirm, that if the government could have anticipated that the house would have engaged in transactions of such magnitude as those which subsequently took place, the licence would not have been granted. (Hear!) Under these circumstances, how was it possible, with any justice, to impute improper motives to the Marquess of Hastings, in granting the licence which had been requested by Palmer and Co.? The learned proprietor had adverted to the illegality of this licence, in a manner which must have impressed his hearers with the idea, that, at the time of granting it, the government was aware of its illegality. (Here Mr. Innes said No!) Such at least resumed Mr. E. was the inference which the tenor of the learned gentleman's observations was calculated to suggest; and indeed the fact had been distinctly indicated by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Poynder) who, on the first day of the debate, alleged "that the licence was granted for the express purpose of contravening the act of the 37th of the king." He (Mr. E.) was now satisfied by the professional opinions delivered in this country, that the licence was not legal; but no blame attached to the government on that account, as the licence was granted in concurrence with the opinion of the Advocate-General, the legal adviser of the government, who was consulted on the occasion, and was himself the framer of it. Therefore, so far as this point was concerned, the government could not be considered to blame, in acceding to the application of Palmer and Co. He (Mr. E.) having had the honour of being a member of the government at that time, he must of course bear his share of the responsibility which attached to the granting of that licence; but with the knowledge which he now possessed of the magnitude and extent of the transactions of the house of Palmer and Co. under that licence, and of the consequences thereof, he was free to confess, that he now considered the granting of it to have been an indiscrete act. (Hear!) And he really believed that the Marquess of Hastings himself would at this time acknowledge that it was so. (Hear!) Another point touched upon by the learned proprietor, to which he (Mr. E.) desired to advert, was the delay which had occurred in transmitting to the Court of Directors a report of that transaction. The learned proprietor had adverted to this circumstance, in terms calculated to impress on the court a belief that this delay was intentional, and arose from sinister motives. The despatch containing the report of this transaction, namely, the granting of the licence, bore date the 3d of January 1817, though it did not reach this country until the 6th of May in the following year. He thought, however, he could prove that no avoidable delay had taken place in apprising the court of the transaction. In the first place, it was proper to observe, that in India, the primary, and very laborious duty of the secretary, was to draw up all the papers and documents which were necessary for carrying on the multifarious business of the local administration, involving a most extensive correspondence with every part of India. It differed materially from the duty which devolved on the examiner's department in that house; where the main, and almost the sole duty, of that branch of the secretary's office was, to conduct the correspondence with the Indian governments; whereas, in India, the duty of carrying on the correspondence with the Court of Directors was, of necessity, secondary to that of attending to the details of the local administration. It was, consequently, often found exceedingly difficult, as he (Mr. E.) could testify from his own experience, having been many years at the head of the office, to procure time for the purpose of framing the despatches, to England.—(Hear!) Now, the period of time when this transaction took place (he alluded to the latter part of 1816), every gentleman who heard him must know, was one of the most laborious period of business that had ever occurred; and the secretary was so fully employed in forwarding the pressing business of the administration, that he could not afford time for drawing up a detailed narrative of the multifarious proceedings of the government, of which the transaction in question only formed a part. The same cause operated during the first part of the following year, 1817; and in the month of June, or thereabouts, of that year, Mr. Adam, the then secretary to government, was obliged to attend the Governor-General, who proceeded from Calcutta to the upper provinces. During the secretary's absence, the usual report of proceedings and events could not be drawn up, and it was therefore left to be framed by Mr. Adam, in those intervals of time that could be occasionally spared from the arduous and laborious duties in which he was engaged in his attendance on the Governor-General. This, he trusted, would satisfactorily account for the delay that had taken place in the transmission of the report, and would be sufficient to shew that it was not, as had been intimated, the effect of design, but was purely accidental, and could not, under the circumstances, have been avoided. There was another point noticed by the learned proprietor, on which, though it related to a period subsequent to his (Mr. E.'s) departure from India, he begged leave to offer an observation. He believed that the learned proprietor, in touching on this point, and advancing it as a matter of charge against the Marquess of Hastings, had committed an oversight. The matter to which he alluded was the appointment of Mr. Sotheby to the situation of agent to the Governor-General at Moorshedabad. If he understood the learned proprietor correctly, he had stated that at the time his lordship proposed that Mr. Sotheby should fill that office, the fact of his (Mr. Sotheby's) having been discovered to have been a partner in the house of W. Palmer and Co. was concealed from the council. Now, according to his (Mr. E.'s) impression, this appointment took place after Mr. Sotheby's memorial had been presented to the government. (Here both Mr. Impey and Mr. Stuart said, No! no!) He (Mr. E.) begged pardon, then, for his mistake, and said that he had no further observations to offer to the court.

Mr. Campbell and Mr. Trant rose at the same time. (Cries of question! and for Mr. D. Knapp's reply.)

Mr. Trant observed, with considerable warmth, that, if Sir C. Metcalf were present, they would hear him; and he hoped, as he and Sir Charles had known each other from their boyhood, as they had been school-fellows together, that the proprietor would hear what he had to say in the defence of a man whose character had been unjustly assailed.

Mr. Campbell said, he was willing to give way to the hon. proprietor; but he must put in his claim, after the hon. proprietor had addressed the court, to deliver his sentiments on this subject.

Mr. Trant said, he intended, after the long discussion which this important question had undergone, to trespass on the patience of the court for as short a period as possible. He thanked the learned gentleman (Mr. Impey) within the bar, for the able statement he had made; which, if he had not offered to the court, he (Mr. T.) would have been induced to have travelled over much of the ground that had been occupied by the learned gentleman. He congratulated the court on having heard that most luminous and convincing argument which had been just addressed to them, instead of being fatigued with the very lame and incomplete one which he had prepared to submit to their consideration. One or two points had, however, escaped the notice of the learned proprietor, and to these he wished especially to direct the attention of the proprietors. In the first place, he was anxious to notice an argument made use of on a former day by an hon. proprietor who, in his speech, observed, that the letter from the Marquess of Hastings to Sir Wm. Rumbold—that private letter, which he (Mr. Trant) deplored had ever seen the light—was written at a time when the acknowledged services of Messrs. Palmer and Co. to the Nizam were such as to give them a paramount claim, and to shut out all the world beside from any pecuniary transactions with the Nizam's government. That letter was written in the month of January 1815, before the license had been applied for to the government: the house of Palmer and Co. was established in 1814. He should like to know the exact date; but he was not in possession of it. He, however, found it very difficult to imagine how those important services could have been performed within that particular time—from some period in 1814, until January 1815. This was of some little importance; and on that letter he would take his stand—not against the Marquess of Hastings, but for the maintenance of good order in India. He rose there as a proprietor of East India stock, and an old servant of the Company, to declare, that, much as he respected the Marquess of Hastings, if his conduct had not met with the censure contained in the despatches they were now called on to approve, the directors, in his mind, would not have done their duty; and farther, that, unless that censure were now sanctioned and approved by the court of proprietors, he would sell out his stock, and retire from the Company. (A laugh.) Gentlemen might laugh and sneer, but their conduct should not affect him. He should proceed to defend the character of Sir C. Metcalf; and, in speaking on that subject, he feared he would be obliged to trespass for some time on the patience of the court. He would have said more on the speech of the late resident at Hyderabad (Mr. Russell) if he had been in his place in the court this day; and he deplored as much as any man the circumstances which had occasioned his absence. It was stated by the Bengal government, that the sixty lac loan was a fictitious measure; and what did Mr. Adam say with respect to the accounts by which it was attempted to be explained? In his minute of the 30th July 1823 (page 701) Mr. Adam said:—"I have examined the accounts received from the resident at Hyderabad, with his despatches of the 12th and 14th instant, with all the attention which the time I have been able to devote to them will allow. They are too voluminous, various, and intricate, to enable me to attempt to judge correctly of all the details which they embrace; but there are certain prominent points which appear quite distinct to my observation, and I am not aware that any practical object would be attained by more minute investigation." It was necessary, observed Mr. Trant, to mark this point, because it had been stated that Mr. Adam threw aside these accounts hastily.—"Since the resident has commenced, and perhaps by this time completed, a course of payments, to the amount, as stated by him, of seventy-five lacs of rupees, reserving for charges that may eventually be disallowed, a sum of about twenty lacs; an examination in detail is, at all events, not immediately necessary; nor need we, as it appears to me, delay coming to a conclusion on the main questions arising out of these accounts." Mr. Adam then proceeded to give a specification of the accounts, which presented a debit of rupees 60,58,291. There was something very extraordinary in the transactions connected with this sixty lac loan. The late resident, it appeared, had considered it to be a plan that ought not to be recommended by him to the government, and he refused to entertain the project.

Mr. Stuart—Mr. Russell has stated, in the publication he has sent forth to the world, that he did mainly approve of that plan, but that he had declined to apply for a sanction, that might involve a responsibility on the part of the Company's government.

Mr. Trant said, that Mr. Russell's own words would best explain his meaning. He stated first, that the house was willing to negotiate a loan, and required such a sanction of the British government, as he did not think it proper to apply for. He afterwards saw the minister, and heard a statement of his affairs; whom he informed, that, if he borrowed the money, the measure should have his concurrence; but he could not expect any farther proceeding on the part of our government. He then went on to say, that, while these discussions were going on at Hyderabad, the partners of the house had written to Calcutta on the subject, and the answer received from John Palmer occasioned the proposition relative to the loan to be transmitted to government. The application was made on the 19th of May 1820; the sanction was granted on the 15th July 1820,

1820, and reached Hyderabad in the month of August. That this transaction had, it appeared, commenced so far back as the month of February; so that, when Mr. Adam called this a fictitious transaction, he had a right to do so. The loan was, quoad the sanction of government, a transaction of a fictitious nature. The loan, which was to have been advanced after the sanction had been attained, was to be applied to the reduction of certain establishments, to the encouragement of cultivation, and to pay off the debts due to the soucars; and it certainly had been stated, pretty confidently, that considerable benefits were annexed to this arrangement: but, it appeared, on the face of the accounts—it appeared from all the documents, that, under the sanction of the loan, by government, not a single rupee had had been advanced. Therefore, quoad the sanction of government, it was a fictitious transaction. Before he proceeded to state, as briefly as he could, what he deemed it his duty to offer to the court, on the part of Sir C. Metcalf, he would ask, whether there was any person present, any friend of Mr. Russell, who would explain certain points which he (Mr. Trant) intended to notice? He must state, in the first instance, that he had read, most attentively and deliberately, the whole of these papers. He had also read the letter published by the late Resident, and that given to the world by Sir Wm. Rumbold. He had given to this case the very best consideration his poor abilities would allow, and he must say, that he thought almost every individual in that court (with the exception of some one or two, whose errors his learned friend, Mr. Impey, had corrected), must come to the conclusion, after looking at these papers, that the amendment ought to be supported. He really thought, that he need not state any farther grounds for agreeing with the amendment, than those which the hon. proprietors, grounding themselves on the documents, as he had done, had already adduced. He was not fortunate enough to hear the speech, in continuation, of his gallant friend (Sir J. Doyle); but, from the manner in which he conducted his first day's effort, it was, no doubt, very entertaining. His gallant friend had said, that Sir C. Metcalf was fitter to be resident in Bedlam than in Hyderabad. (Laughter.) These words could not be mistaken by him—he had taken them down. Now, he need not remind the hon. and gallant officer, of what an illustrious person had said, when he was told that General Wolfe was mad; "If he is mad," said that illustrious individual, "I wish he would bite some of my other generals." (Laughter.) But, he was sure, no person would be deceived that his gallant friend should be taken by any energetic or courageous soldier. There was no need of inoculation—his gallant friend had taken the disease naturally. (Hear, and laughter!) He had met his gallant friend in Malta, and he had heard of his exploits in Egypt. Whilst he was in that country, his gallant friend was very mad indeed; he galloped into the desert, after Bonaparte's dromedary-corps, and the consequence of his madness was, that he captured the whole of them. (Hear, hear!) He would say, and he wished it most sincerely, if Sir C. Metcalf were mad, that the Company had a great many more such mad servants. (Hear hear!) He congratulated the Company on having such a useful madman in their employ; and he should not be sorry, if he bit a few of their civil servants. (Laughter.) He should now state, why he appeared before the court, as the advocate of Sir C. Metcalf. The gallant general had informed them, that he was acquainted with the Marquess of Hastings, during a period of forty years' duration. He (Mr. Trant) must look back to a date which would not make him appear a very young man, when he called to his recollection his first acquaintance with Sir C. Metcalf; they were children together—they were at school together, under the same tutor, Dr. Goodall. (Cries of order and question!) He repeated, that they were under the charge and care of Dr. Goodall. He and Sir C. Metcalf went out to India at very nearly the same time. (Order, order!) He conceived he was taking a very fair course: when a man was brought into a court of justice, and put upon his trial, was it not customary to give evidence to character, and to hear the circumstances of his life? He and Sir C. Metcalf went out to India about the same period—they there pursued their studies for some time together—and they entered the hon. Company's service together. (Order, order!)

An hon. Proprietor said, they would never get through the business, if such episodes were permitted.

Mr. S. Dixon—I hope you will allow the hon. gentleman to go on; he is making two tides at once—he is introducing himself and Sir C. Metcalf to our notice; thus favouring us with the history of two persons instead of one. (A laugh.)

Mr. Trant said, he mentioned these matters, because he wished to obtain credit with the court on one important point—that of thoroughly knowing Sir C. Metcalf, and, consequently, of having a perfect knowledge of that individual's character. He spoke of him with the personal partiality of an old friend; and if that were a failing, he trusted it was not a very reprehensible one. He had known him during the whole course of his life; and he spoke under conviction, when he said, that a more honourable, upright, and kind-hearted hearted man, he was never acquainted with. (Hear!) He would state the circumstances under which Sir C. Metcalf acted at Hyderabad. (Question, question!) He was advocating the cause of a gentleman, whose character was attacked in his absence; and surely, in such a case, he ought not to be interrupted. Sir C. Metcalf had been the private secretary to the Marquess of Hastings; he had also been political secretary to the government; and, previously, he had held a political situation at Delhi. He had, in that court, been charged with ingratitude to the Marquess of Hastings. Now, he begged to explain under what circumstances he was made private secretary to the Marquess of Hastings. (Question?)

Mr. Nott.—I ask, Sir, whether the court is to be thus detained, with the history of the hon. proprietor and Sir C. Metcalf?

Mr. Trant.—Sir C. Metcalf has been attacked in this court.

The Chairman.—Having been appealed to, I must give my decision; and, I think, that the character of Sir C. Metcalf having been so assailed in this court, it is open to any proprietor to make such remarks as may appear to him to be due to that gentleman. At the same time, it would certainly expedite the business of this court, withholding injustice to Sir C. Metcalf, if the hon. proprietor would be less diffuse on the subject. (Hear!)

Mr. Trant continued.—The situation of private secretary to Lord Hastings, was pressed upon Sir C. Metcalf; and, he had been told, that Sir Charles had declined it twice. but, he would ask, was a public officer, because he had filled a particular situation, under a Governor-General, to be debarred from his right of giving an opinion on any public measure? He was sure the gallant officer (Sir J. Doyle) would not stand up for such a doctrine; and in that court, he thought a very different principle would be laid down. Was he (Mr. Trant) to be debarred from his right of giving an opinion?—was he to be accused of malignity and baseness, because he could not approve of the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings, in all its parts? Sir C. Metcalf, if he had chosen to conceal his conscientious opinion, had many inducements for doing so. He believed that he was nearly connected with the late Resident by family ties; and there were other reasons, if he were not an upright man, one who thought for himself, which might have led him to do wrong. Therefore, he could not subscribe to the opinion, that Sir C. Metcalf had been influenced by vindictive or malicious motives, or by any other feeling, save a strong and imperative sense of public duty. (Hear!) He had heard no evidence yet, that could lead his mind to form any other opinion. He hoped, that, one day or another, and that at no very great distance of time, he would appear in that court, and speak for himself. He congratulated the Company on possessing a man of so much firmness. The Company's servants were often placed in very delicate situations, where duty and feeling were opposed to each other. They were bound by their duty and their oath to "shew up" their nearest friends, if it were necessary; and he who performed so painful a task manfully and honestly, deserved to be exalted by praise, not to be depressed by censure. He congratulated the court on having amongst their servants, a man so entirely devoted to the discharge of his duties—a man whom threats could not intimidate, nor promises mislead—a man who realized the picture drawn by Horace—

"Justum et tenacem propositi virum,
Non clivum ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis tyranni
Mente quatit solida."

He should cordially vote for the amendment; and, though he did not approve of the conduct of the noble Marquess on this occasion, still he would say, what he had before said in that court, that he thought very highly of his merits. He would not cast aside such a public servant as the noble Marquess, because he had made one mistake, because there was one small spot on his character. He did not expect to find a perfect man; and, as this was the only speck that sullied the general beauty of his lordship's character, he was inclined to view it more in "sorrow than in anger."

"Non ego paucis
Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria fudit, Aut humana paron cavit natura."

When the Marquess of Hastings came before that court, he would lay this business out of the question, and look only to his great and meritorious services. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Pattison said, the hon. proprietor had spoken to the general character of the Marquess of Hastings, and it certainly was not unpleasant to hear such testimony in his favour; he, however, must address himself to a particular point, namely, to the circumstance, so particularly noticed, of the letter of Lord Hastings of 1820, being addressed to the Chairman. He would explain how that was, and he was not afraid of explaining it. When he arrived at the situation of Chairman, he found that both his predecessors had been in the habit of corresponding with Lord Hastings, and he begged leave to state that he followed their example, believing then, as he did now, that such communication between the Chairman and the Governor-General must lead to very beneficial results. He thought it right to state this; and he believed his hon. friend (Mr. Bebb) his predecessor in the chair, would be ready to admit that he had been in correspondence with the noble Marquess. For his own part, he conceived it to be a very useful practice, in spite of the policy which had condemned condemned it, and which, in his view of the case, was a mistaken policy.

Mr. Campbell said, however unwilling he was to protract a debate, which had already exceeded all ordinary limits, he felt that he ought not to give a silent vote on the question now before the court; and he should, therefore, solicit the indulgence of the proprietors, on whose attention he rarely obtruded himself, while he stated the reasons which influenced his judgment on the present occasion. If any form of words could have been devised less likely than another to provoke debate, it appeared to him to be that very form which had been adopted by his hon. friend, the hon. D. Kinnaird, in framing the motion which he had submitted to this court. That motion accused no man; it did not impugn the conduct or the motives of any man or set of men; its single object was the vindication of the character of the Marquess of Hastings, from the foul and calumnious slanders by which it had been assailed. That a motion, so framed and so intended, should have been met by an amendment which could hardly fail of creating a considerable division in that court, on an occasion when unanimity would not be less creditable to the proprietors than gratifying to the feelings of the illustrious nobleman, who so long and so ably administered the affairs of the Company in India, was a matter deeply to be lamented. Had the original motion, either directly or by implication, assailed the character of Mr. Adam, or of any other member of the Bengal government, it should certainly not have his support. It would, he apprehended, be quite time enough to vindicate the character of these gentlemen, and the conduct of the Court of Directors, when either the one or the other shall be assailed in a form to merit notice. He, therefore, begged that gentlemen would take the motion before the court, merely for what it was, and for nothing more; and not mix up with it the hasty ebullitions dropped by gentlemen in the heat of debate; (Hear, hear!) and, he would venture to say, never intended to be acted upon. (Hear!) Such was the character of the threat made on the first day of this debate by his hon. friend, the member for Aberdeen. When that hon. proprietor talked of impeaching Mr. Adam, it did not require any extraordinary penetration to discover, that it was not for any part that gentleman had taken in the Hyderabad affair. One might see lurking at the bottom of that denunciation, the question of the freedom of the Indian press and the deportation, or, as his hon. friend would term it, the banishment (though to his native country) of its champion, the late editor of the Calcutta Journal. His hon. friend well knew how much he (Mr. Campbell) differed from him on that subject. Not, indeed, as to the principle, but as to the time for the establishment of a free press in India. That time ought not to be precipitated; but it would necessarily arrive in the march of events; not, however, until they had a different state of society in India; not until they had more extended European population which, while it would prove, under any circumstances, the surest support of the Company's power, would develop the resources now but little known of that great country, and give to this all the advantages she had a right to expect from the connexion. (Hear, hear!)

The amendment placed this whole court (but more especially such members behind the bar, as had differed from the proceedings of the Court of Directors) in a very painful situation, inasmuch as they must either seem to yield to a tacit assent to opinions and measures in which they could not conscientiously concur, or basely desert their posts, or publicly oppose themselves to the acts of their colleagues. (Hear!) This, he thought, was a most distressing dilemma; and one in which it appeared the less necessary to place any portion of the directors. For, if the opinions and instructions contained in the four despatches which the amendment called on the proprietors to approve were right, they would not be rendered more so by any expression of approbation on the part of this court; and if otherwise, a vote to that effect could not be expected. When commendation could be of no avail, it did not seem prudent to incur the hazard of censure.

The proprietors had never been slow in acknowledging the services of the executive body, and in offering to it the tribute of their thanks on all proper occasions; but this ought to be a spontaneous and unsolicited gift, originating on the other side of the bar. (Hear, hear!) It lost both its grace and its value, when sought for and made the subject of a special motion, by the parties who called on others to praise their acts. (Hear, hear!)

Of the four political despatches, of which this court was now called on to record its approval, one was written nearly five years ago; another more than three; the third almost two; and the last more than one year since. These letters had all been acted upon by the Company's government abroad, and the instructions contained in them had been carried into effect. The approval, therefore, or the disapproval of those despatches, could make no difference in the actual state of things; but, if the approval of this court were considered necessary, he would ask, why it was not obtained long ago; as, since the date of even the latest of those despatches, the Court of Directors had repeated opportunities of meeting their constituents, and of collecting their sentiments. He would beg leave further to ask, if those despatches patches should be disapproved, whether they were prepared, in consequence, to recall them, and to reverse all the acts to which they had given rise. This they knew could not be done, without entirely subverting the constitution of the court, and transferring the functions of the executive to the constituent body. When, on Friday last, a gallant general (Sir J. Doyle), asked whether the amendment proceeded from the hon. Chairman, or was the act of the Court of Directors, the hon. Chairman added, while acknowledging it to be his own individual act, his belief, that had there been time for the discussion of the subject, in the next room, it would have met with the approbation of the Court of Directors; and, on Tuesday last, in reply to some observations, which fell from an hon. director (Mr. Pattison) the hon. Chairman expressed a similar sentiment. Now, he hoped and believed, that the vote of this day would shew, that, in saying so, the hon. Chairman had assumed too much. He ventured to think, that if the subject of the amendment had been discussed in the Court of Directors, the good sense of that body would have seen, in the latter part of it, he would not say an unconstitutional measure, but, certainly, a very novel proceeding, and one which might become a very inconvenient, if not a very dangerous precedent. (Hear, hear!)

What man was there behind the bar, who held up his hand, in favour of the hon. Chairman's amendment, that could, with any consistency, resist the production of any of the despatches of the Court of Directors, at any time, for the purpose of being canvassed by the Court of Proprietors? The amendment absolutely courted an interference, which, to say the least of it, might prove extremely embarrassing; and would go to the creation of a second Board of Control, were it not for the legislative enactment (33 Geo. iii. cap. 52. clause 23.) which "restrained general courts of proprietors from rescinding, suspending, revoking, or altering, any orders or resolutions of the Court of Directors, relating to the Governments of India, after they shall have received the approbation of the Board of Commissioners." Now, really it did seem a mere mockery to call on men to approve or to disapprove of despatches, when their praise or censure could not be of the slightest avail. (Hear!) The case would be widely different, were this court summoned to take into its consideration the conduct of the Court of Directors; but that was not the question now before the proprietors. The conduct of those gentlemen might have been, at the time those despatches were written, and under the information they then possessed, very praiseworthy, though the despatches might now prove to have been, in many respects, very wrong. (Hear!)

In his view of the case, the vote sought for by the latter part of the amendment appeared to him unnecessary for the Court of Directors, irrelative to the question, unjust to Lord Hastings; and, asked for at this juncture, had rather the air of an act of indemnity, than a vote of approbation. He would say, for the Court of Directors, that they needed neither the indemnity nor the apology. What they did they were competent to do; and although their judgments might have been erroneous, their intentions were honest. (Hear, hear!)

Differing as he had done, and still continued to do, from the opinions expressed in some, and from particular passages in other parts of the political despatches, referred to in the amendment, and from the tone and manner of the whole, he felt bound to declare, because he firmly believed, that those despatches were not dictated in any spirit of hostility to the Marquess of Hastings; but were the deliberate sentiments of pure and honest minds, discharging what they conceived to be an imperative, and what he knew they felt to be, a painful duty. (Hear!)

When he considered the high characters of the hon. mover and seconder of the amendment, he felt confident that this court had nothing to expect from them, but what was fair and honourable. It was, therefore, not for a moment to be supposed, that, in framing their amendment, they had in contemplation to mix up in it such ingredients as they knew would necessarily neutralize each other, and render the whole absolutely inoperative for the accomplishment of one of the objects which the amendment professed to have in view, namely, the exculpation of Lord Hastings from having been influenced by corrupt motives.

But, he could suppose, that these hon. gentlemen, in wading through the mass of papers connected with the Hyderabad question, might have overlooked passages, the import of which appeared to him quite at variance with that part of the amendment, which acquitted the late Governor-General of corrupt motives.

The first part of the amendment embraced, and in terms nearly similar, the motion of the hon. proprietor (hon. D. Kinnaid), and to that extent would probably meet that general assent. But what did the latter part of the amendment do, in calling on this court to record the approval of the political despatches therein specified; despatches, some parts of which, as he should immediately shew, charged Lord Hastings with a gross misuse of the high powers entrusted to him, by rendering him subservient to transactions which had been stigmatized as fraudulent, fictitious, delusive? (Hear, hear!)

He should not draw largely on this volume, (the Hyderabad papers), nor on the patience of the court, by long quotations; but would content himself with a single passage, in support of his position. The fortieth paragraph of the Political letter to Bengal, dated the 28th of Nov. 1821, (one of the four despatches of which this court was called on to record its approval) contained the following remarkable, but unfortunate sentence: "In truth you have lent the Company's credit, in the late pecuniary transactions at Hyderabad, not indeed for the benefit of the Nizam's Government, but for the sole benefit of Messrs. Palmer and Co."

He should not make any comment on this passage, but he appealed to the candour and common sense of every man in that court, to say whether the person to whom such conduct could be justly ascribed, was not influenced by corrupt motives? (Hear, hear!) And he asked those gentlemen on the opposite benches, who, acknowledging the purity of Lord Hastings, contended, notwithstanding, for the amendment, how they could reconcile inconsistency so glaring? (Hear, hear!)

Had the sentiments expressed in the passage he had quoted, been an eventual opinion, a judgment given by the Court of Directors, on a full knowledge of all the facts, and with all the accounts of the transaction before them, it was probable that their decision would not be questioned; because, figures in the hands of men who understood them could not err, and they should at once have been induced to conclude, that Messrs. Palmer and Co. were the only gainers by the transaction; and that the sentence which he had just cited, was merely intended to state that fact.

But it was only necessary to refer to this volume (the Hyderabad papers) to see that at the time the letter of the 28th of Nov. 1821, was written, the effect of the loan was not known here; and, therefore, the observation that the Company's credit was lent, "for the sole benefit of Messrs. Palmer and Co." could not have been meant to refer to the amount of pecuniary advantage derived by those gentlemen from the transaction; but was intended to convey an imputation, that the late Governor-General was influenced by improper motives, in so lending the credit of the Company. And hence, he contended, the inconsistency of the amendment; the first part exculpating the noble Marquess from corrupt motives, while the latter, in calling for the approval of the four despatches charged him with corruption in its most odious form, involving a breach of confidence, by the betrayal of the high trust reposed in him, in sacrificing the interests of our ally to promote those of Messrs. Palmer and Co.

But he would beg leave to ask, how the assertions, contained in the passage he had quoted, were borne out by the facts? Sir C. Metcalf, who would not, he thought, be accused of undue partiality, either for the loan or for the lenders, on being called on to submit his opinion as to the effects of the loan, said, in his letter of the 17th of March 1821—"The government (i.e. the Nizam's government) was undoubtedly relieved from such pecuniary embarrassments by the loan, and was enabled to pay off large arrears which had accumulated in several branches of expenditure; but I have been disappointed in finding that the relief was not so much of a permanent nature as I had expected; and that the loan was not appropriated to the permanent reduction of expense, to such an extent as I had supposed." "Nevertheless, there is no doubt that the loan was most convenient to the Nizam's government, at the time; and, especially, to the minister himself personally; and, by enabling him to struggle through temporary difficulties and embarrassments, it may possibly prove the means of greatly assisting the restoration of prosperity in the country." "It does not strike me, that the interests of the hon. Company have been much affected, in any way by the loan; disadvantageously, certainly not. But for the loan, the increasing embarrassments of the Nizam's government, might have induced, perhaps must have induced, some other measures; and other measures might, perhaps, have been devised, more advantageous to the Nizam's interests, and so far, indirectly to our own, than the one under discussion. It is, however, certainly some advantage gained, that the Nizam's government has been enabled to struggle on without any sacrifice on our part, to its present position; from which, with proper measures, there is a prospect of future prosperity."

Now it would appear, from the extracts which he had just read—

1st. That the Nizam's government was relieved from much pecuniary embarrassment by the loan.

2d. That the Company's interests were not disadvantageously affected by it; and

3d. That it might greatly assist in the restoration of prosperity in the Nizam's country.

While, then, these were the beneficial results of the loan to the Nizam's government and to his country, all who had read the Hyderabad papers must see, that it had ended in the ruin of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. The very reverse, therefore, of the proposition, "That the Company's credit was lent, not for the benefit of the Nizam's government, but for the sole benefit ness of Messrs. Palmer and Co." was, he thought, clearly demonstrated. (Hear, hear!) He could now wish to say a few words on the letter written by Lord Hastings to Sir W. Rumbold, on the 4th of January 1815. That letter had not, he thought, been either generously or fairly dealt with. It must be recollected that it was written nearly a year after the establishment of Palmer and Co. had met with the concurrence of government, and when it was not known whether Sir W. Rumbold would or would not, become a member of that house. It was written from camp, at a period when Lord Hastings was endeavouring to retrieve the disasters that had befallen the Company's arms at the commencement of the Nepaul war; a war, which, from the quality of the enemy with whom our troops had to contend, was, perhaps, one of the most dangerous in which the Company had ever been engaged; and when, independent of the pressure of a matter of such infinite importance on his lordship's mind, he had a thousand other objects to attend to. Was, he demanded, a familiar letter, written under such circumstances, and in the confidence of friendship, to be criticised as if it were a production destined for the press? but still less ought it to be wrested from its fair import. (Hear!) That letter had been alleged in proof of his lordship's determination to discourage the establishment of any other house at Hyderabad, that could interfere with Messrs. Palmer and Co. Had any other person solicited and been refused the sanction of his lordship, the inference would have been much less doubtful than it now was. He contended, the fair meaning of that letter to be, first, that the respect paid by the Nizam's government to the establishment of Palmer and Co. would, necessarily, create in the minds of the inhabitants of Hyderabad, a confidence in the credit and stability of the house; and, therefore, that any other persons desirous of settling at Hyderabad, and finding the public confidence pre-occupied, would not make the attempt; and next, that no new establishment could urge the plea of service already rendered to the Nizam, which induced the Resident to request that government would sanction the firm of Palmer and Co. But was it fair from this to infer, that Lord Hastings would have refused to sanction any other establishment, had that sanction been solicited. He had endeavoured to abstain, as much as the subject would permit, from offering any opinion on the transactions of the house of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. Some allusion to them was unavoidable; and, if ever the matter should be discussed here, he should be prepared to state his sentiments upon it. Much light had certainly been thrown on the nature and consequence of those transactions, by the late Resident of Hyderabad, in his very able address to the court on the Friday before last. Much as he regretted that the course of proceedings here rendered it necessary for that hon. gentleman to become a member of this body, in order personally to be able to vindicate his fair fame, he rejoiced to say, that he thought he had completely succeeded. (Hear, hear!) He rejoiced, also, that an opportunity had been afforded to the proprietary to hear a very complicated and intricate question, and one previously but little understood, treated with so much clearness and perspicuity, as to bring it within the compass of the most ordinary understanding. The speech of the hon. proprietor was an admirable specimen of good sense and good taste, and must have furnished a gratifying proof to this court, that the interests of the Company at Hyderabad could not have been confided to abler hands. (Hear, hear!) But, to return to the subject more immediately under consideration: This court had now to pronounce upon the reputation of one of the most able, most zealous, most successful, and he would confidently add, most faithful servants the Company ever had; (Hear, hear!)—upon the character of one of the most illustrious men of the age! and to say whether, during his administration of the affairs of the Company in India, he had tarnished that character. "For our own sakes," said the hon. director, "as well as for his, the verdict ought not to be equivocal. I can, after the most anxious and mature consideration of the Hyderabad papers, lay my hand on my heart and declare, that I find, 'nothing in these papers to affect, in the slightest degree, the personal character and integrity of the late Governor-General of India.' (Hear, hear!) I shall, therefore, Sir, vote against the amendment, which, while it seems to acquit, does virtually condemn the Marquess of Hastings." (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Daniell said, he would simply content himself with stating the line of conduct which he meant to adopt on this occasion, and he would give two short reasons in support of the course he meant to take. Notwithstanding all that had been said on the subject, they were called upon to decide on the character of the individual, merely—they were to consider whether he had conducted himself in an honorable, or a dishonorable manner; so far as he was connected with the transactions which were now brought before them. He saw nothing in the motion that at all related to his services, or to the proceedings of the Court of Directors; therefore, under these circumstances, he considered it his duty to vote for the original motion. He did this, not from any feeling of favour towards the Marquess of Hastings; neither did he oppose the amendment in consequence of any hostility that he entertained towards those gentlemen who brought it forward. He would hold up his hand against it because he thought it was wholly unnecessary and irrelevant. It had been stated that the proposition of the hon. gentleman was injudicious, because it afforded an opportunity for calling in question the conduct of the noble lord—he thought quite otherwise, because some time ago, when an annuity to Lord Hastings was brought forward in the adjoining room, it was then said, that its introduction was premature, as certain circumstances connected with the Hyderabad question called for investigation and enquiry. The documents were not then before the court, and the proprietors had it not in their power to state their opinion. The objections raised when that annuity was proposed, did not, in his mind, go so much to the political conduct of Lord Hastings, but went directly to a question of a more delicate nature, and feeling that he was convinced of the propriety and necessity of the original motion which had been proposed by the hon. proprietor. He would now make one or two observations with reference to the connexion between Lord Hastings and Sir Wm. Rumbold. It had been said, that that connexion very much shaped and guided his conduct, with respect to the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. He could not see how the partnership between Sir Wm. Rumbold and Messrs. Palmer and Co. could be attributed to the Marquess of Hastings. It was quite clear that it was not brought about by the Marquess of Hastings, but by Mr. J. Palmer. A proposition was made to that gentleman to become a partner in the house of Palmer and Co.; he said, “no—circumstanced as I am, I cannot join the firm; but, if you want a partner, here is my friend Sir Wm. Rumbold.” Now, if Messrs. Palmer and Co. had thought that the influence of Sir Wm. Rumbold was an object of great consideration, they would, in the first instance, have applied to him, instead of paying court to Mr. John Palmer. Now, what was the conduct of the Marquess of Hastings? Instead of recommending Sir Wm. Rumbold to enter into the partnership, he actually wished him to steer clear of it. If Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. had looked to the influence of Sir Wm. Rumbold as a matter of such extreme importance, they would have admitted him into the firm on different terms from those which they had exacted; they would not have required an accession of capital from him; they would have said, “We want a partner who can be of service to us, and a man of your influence is sufficient.” (Hear, hear!) The question was, whether the noble Marquess would have been more justified in refusing to sanction the measures for the payment of the Nizam's troops, and running the risk of the loss of his empire, or in granting the license which exempted those to whom it was directed from the ordinary operation of the law? This, he would say, that it was impossible for all the wisdom of that court to promulgate principles which would be applicable to every occasion. They could not lay down rules, that were not to be abrogated under the operation of any necessity whatsoever. He would say, that it was impossible for this Company, or for any authority in Europe, to lay down a general rule for the government of India, which was not to be infringed in any respect. The safest way to proceed in the government of our eastern possessions, would be to select men of talent and judgment, in whom they should repose confidence, and give a latitude to the exercise of their own discretion. (Hear, hear!) When they joined the Board of Control in the selection of such persons, they had done all that they could do; and they must, in a great measure, leave the persons so selected to act, as circumstances should arise, according to the best of their judgments. (Hear!) The hon. director concluded by stating, that after the best, and most mature consideration which he could give to this subject, he was induced to support the original motion of the hon. proprietor—feeling that the character of the Marquess of Hastings was implicated without just cause, and that it ought to be defended. (Hear, hear!)

There was now a general call in the court for the hon. Douglas Kinnaird's reply, and of Question, question!

In the midst of those cries Mr. Rigby rose. He said he was sorry to trespass on the attention of the court at this time, but having attended to the early proceedings on this question, he had that day come from a considerable distance to give his opinion. From what he had heard on this occasion, and even after what was said by the two hon. directors who had just spoke, he could not express his surprise that the proprietors should withhold their assent from the just amendment before them. (Hear, hear!) He possessed the greatest respect for the high character and talents of the Marquess of Hastings, and that respect led him to regret the manner in which his name had been introduced on the present occasion (Hear, hear!) But, after looking at the papers before the court, and judging according to those papers, and not according to the speech of the able Resident at Hyderabad, if he were asked his opinion, he must come to the conclusion, that, as the motion was put, they must acquit the noble Marquess of all corrupt motives, and this was the mildest way of putting it. But, at the same time, he must observe, that the whole of those papers, taken together, were most unfortunate for the character of the noble Marquess. (Hear, hear!) The hon. dissenting director (Mr. Pattison) had stated, stated, that he came to a different conclusion from the perusal of those papers. But he (Mr. Rigby) would ask, what did those papers shew? That, two years after the transactions on which some gentlemen seemed to rely, Sir C. Metcalf discovered the nefarious proceedings of Palmer and Co. He would contend, that it was impossible to read the letters in which the Marquess of Hastings reproved the Resident at Hyderabad, and also the conduct of Palmer and Co. in their transactions with the Nizam, without discovering the deep guilt of that firm; and the conviction of that guilt must be increased, on the perusal of the guilty affidavit of some of the members of that house. He had given his best attention to the dissent of the hon. director (Mr. Pattison); but it had not altered his opinion with respect to these proceedings; and he conceived it fair and manly in the hon. Chairman to come to the court, with an amendment, approving the former proceedings of the directors. The dissent of Mr. Pattison he could view in no other light, than as highly offensive to the court, and to their agents in India. The hon. director laid said, that the letter sent out was so strong in its language, and so pointed in its condemnation, that it must be offensive to those to whom it was addressed. It was principally objected to from a supposed effect on the feelings of Lord Hastings; but he must observe, that, admitting the noble Lord to be highly sensitive, and to have the strongest notions of honour, that he ought not to be offended with the contents of the Company's letter. The noble Lord had himself been most imprudent in his own affairs. (Marks of disapprobation.) He might, in one sense, be compared with that great man, Lord Bacon. (Renewed disapprobation.)

Sir John Doyle.—Mr. Chairman, I rise to order. We are not now considering how the noble Marquess conducted his own affairs. In that he might have been imprudent, if you will; but we are here looking only to the manner in which he conducted our affairs. (Hear, hear!)

The Chairman said, he did not wish to volunteer his opinion as to the relevancy of what was expressed by any proprietor; but as he was appealed to, he must say, that one proprietor had not been interrupted, when he likened the character of the noble Marquess to that of Lord Nelson; and, therefore, he considered it was competent to the hon. gentleman who had just been addressing the court, to institute the comparison which had been deemed by some to be irrelevant.

Mr. Rigby continued.—It was not his intention to institute any comparison injurious to the personal character of the noble Marquess: what he meant to say was, that, like Lord Bacon, he was easily influenced by the friends around him; and it might be said of him, as was said of Lord Bacon by Sir Wm. Phillips, that, of his personal character, he would not say any thing, because he could not say enough. He (Mr. Rigby) would assert, that though the conduct of Lord Hastings was not culpable, it was, at least, imprudent. They had heard of the high eulogies which had been passed on him by the members of council; but these proved that his good nature had misled him into partialities for particular individuals. The character of Sir C. Metcalf was that of a highly-talented and able man; one who, throughout those proceedings, had evinced great intelligence, and great zeal, for the Company's interests: upon that character, the authenticity of many of the documents before them rested; and he thought they were fully justified in taking them upon such authority, as all the members of the council had borne testimony to his high character. With respect to the sixty lac loan, it was said, that it was necessary for the Nizam, to enable him to pay his troops, and, thereby, more effectually to assist us. If such had been its bona fide object, it would be fair; but, what was the fact proved?—that the great part of the loan was misapplied—that it was kept to pay former advances. (Here there was considerable interruption in the court; in consequence of which, the learned gentleman was, for a few minutes, prevented from proceeding.)

The Chairman put it to the court, whether this was a fair way of treating a gentleman, who had come from a considerable distance to attend the discussion?

Mr. Rigby continued.—In offering his opinion on this subject, he only exercised his right as a proprietor; and he could assure the court, that he would compress his remarks into the smallest possible compass. The loan, he would repeat, was not justifiable, nor was the original licence; as they were both in direct contravention of an act of parliament, which had been most wisely past, for the purpose of repressing usurious transactions with the native powers. It was contended that this loan was justifiable by the necessity of the case; but the court of directors had stated, and he fully concurred with them in the opinion, that the permission for such loans should be reserved for cases of paramount importance. The question then was, was this case of that importance to justify the suspension of an act of parliament? He contended that it was not—that there was no evidence before the court to shew, that it had been applied for its alleged objects; and that, without the most satisfactory proofs of its necessity, the governor should never have agreed to it. With the information which they possessed respecting those transactions, the Court of Directors addressed the letter of 1821 to the Governor.

Governor-General, and in language by no means too strong, expressed their disapprobation of the proceedings. In that course they were fully justified; they went upon the maxim "Fiat justitia, ruat cælum." The act, for the violation of which, the Company had expressed their displeasure, was the result of the most important debates in our highest courts of judicature; and if they (the Directors) had neglected so to express their opinions, they would have been wanting in the discharge of their duty to the Company. If gentlemen had read the documents before them, they would have found, that, in consequence of the extension of this privilege to Palmer and Co., that firm had exercised the most pernicious influence in the territory of the Nizam: they would have seen, that this influence and rapacious extortion had not only caused an embarrassed treasury, but had depopulated whole villages in that country. He was borne out in this by the statement contained in page 501, which he begged might be now read. The statement was as follows:—

"Several items, it will be observed, are on account of guards, cattle, and other establishments, belonging to the government, in attendance on Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. This requires some notice. The members of the firm of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. (Sir Wm. Rumbold, and Mr. Wm. Palmer in a greater degree than others) have been attended, on all occasions, by guards, cattle, and other establishments belonging to the Nizam's government, either permanently or on requisition. The extent to which the practice was carried is indescribable. A message from Sir Wm. Rumbold, or Mr. Wm. Palmer, for ten or twenty elephants, would be as readily attended to by the minister, Chundoo Loll, as one from his Highness the Nizam, if not more so. Sir Wm. Rumbold, on his late journey to Madras, as on all former like occasions, was accompanied by a very large travelling establishment, furnished by the Nizam's government. The same privilege was always asserted by Mr. Wm. Palmer, when he moved; and much of the materials for some of that gentleman's entertainments, were provided from the same source. His servants, and his servants' servants, might be seen parading on the Nizam's state-elephants; and the approach to the residency has frequently been obstructed, or rendered dangerous to those who use carriages and horses, by the concourse of elephants belonging to the government, assembled at Mr. Wm. Palmer's gateway, for his private purposes. Those gentlemen too, of the European Society, who were specially patronized by Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., and chose to accept the favour at their hands, were furnished by the Nizam's government with guards, cattle, &c., through their application; their influence being thus immensely increased, at the Nizam's expense. These things cease with the discontinuance of their intercourse with the Nizam's ministers; and it is one of the advantages of this measure, that it will put a stop to practices which were very disgraceful and disgusting. It is impossible to convey an adequate idea of the subserviency of the Nizam's minister in these respects, or the unconscionable abuse of it by Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co."

He begged to call the attention of the court to the concluding paragraph of this extract, which described the influence of Messrs. Palmer and Co. and the unconscionable abuse which they made of it. After using the elephants, cattle, and soldiers, belong to the Nizam, they charged for the money which paid for them, interest upon interest, and interest upon interest. To such an extent had this extortion and rapacity increased, that, but for the exertions of Sir. C. Metcalf, they would have led to the ruin of the country. (Here the learned gentleman was again interrupted by some marks of impatience on the part of several proprietors.) He hoped for the same indulgence that had been extended to other gentlemen addressing the court; and that he himself, had most willingly given, to all those who preceded him whatever view they took of the question. (Hear, hear!) He would repeat, that the oppression and extortion practised by Messrs. Palmer and Co., were disgraceful to the English character in India, and would have led to the ruin of the government under which they were exercised, but for the exertions of Sir C. Metcalf. It was impossible to read the whole of the detail, without disgust, and no man who valued the character of the British in India, would contend that such conduct ought to be sanctioned. What would be the effect upon other powers in that country, if it were found that our allies and friends were withering in our embraces? Would not such instances be pointed out by those who were hostile to us, and would they not lead to the conclusion that they might suffer less from our avowed hostility than from such an alliance? (Hear, hear!) In looking at the provisions of the Acts of Parliament which had been violated, and after giving his best attention to all that had been adduced upon the subject, he felt that he should not discharge his duty to the Company, if he did not give his most cordial support to the amendment; and he was sorry, that, in stating the grounds upon which he should vote, he had not been treated with that liberality which he was at all times disposed to extend to the opinions of others. In conclusion, he would express his regret at feeling obliged to give any vote which might might appear to cast a blot or tarnish upon the lustre of the noble lord's character.

The hon. D. Kinnaird rose to reply. He understood that at the commencement of the debate that morning, it was advised that it should be brought to a close in the course of the day. He was not surprised at such a wish. The proceedings had already been very much protracted, and it was very natural for many gentlemen to desire that they should be brought to a speedy termination. But, still, late as the hour then was, he felt it his duty to say, that he should have to trespass, for a considerable time on the attention of the court. It would be recollected, that when he introduced the present question to the court, he had asked that credit might be given to his motives. He had come forward, not to make any attack, but to meet any which might be made on the character of Lord Hastings. He did not expect opposition to the principle of his motion, and he had not found any, for the hon. Chairman had adopted the words of his motion and embodied them in his amendment, in another form, but still retaining their import. As far then as the character was concerned, he had nothing to contend with; he had no opponents to reply to; he had no interest in contending for that point; he did not come before them to seek a vote for Lord Hastings—to endeavour to place that on a pedestal which was not already erect. In the whole of the discussions he had heard no attack on the character of that nobleman, which was so great in the eyes of all Europe; so far as his proposition was concerned, he did not fear any reproof from the noble Lord, as was insinuated by one hon. proprietor. He had nothing to regret for the open and fair manner in which he had put the subject before the court; for, from one and all, it had met full concurrence, and in the discussion which ensued, not a single reason had been assigned for not concurring in it, which could in any degree affect the noble Marquess's character. The first opposition to the motion, in the form which he had put it, was from the hon. Chairman, and he had most distinctly stated, that he fully acquitted the noble Lord of all corrupt motives. He would not quibble with the words which the hon. Chairman had used, and say he meant only to allude to his personal character; he took the words in their fair honest import, and that the hon. Chairman fully meant, that he meant no imputation upon the motives upon which the noble Lord had acted. He did not mean to call upon the court for an approval of every act of the noble Lord's conduct—for where was the man who could say, that every act of his life was free from any fault? For himself he would say, that there were no acts of his life, which he might not better approve, had he performed it with more experience. In the conduct which the court had pursued, in sending out the first despatch to Lord Hastings, he did not mean to say that they were right or wrong, acting under the circumstances in which they were placed. It was well known, that great difficulty sometimes occurred in sending home the fullest accounts of all our eastern transactions. The secretary abroad was often so pressed as not to have time to send all the information that could be collected, and perhaps the court were not wrong (he did not mean to charge them with it) in acting on the information they had heard. Neither did he blame the Bengal government for the course which they had pursued, in relying on the information supplied by Sir C. Metcalf: they were bound to pay attention to what he communicated. They were right in receiving his communications, and perhaps in acting on them. It was not his intention to cast any imputation on Sir C. Metcalf for what he had done—or on Mr. Adam, because after two days' investigation of the accounts which were transmitted, he decided under a mistake. He did not intend to charge him with having, in that instance, acted unfairly—nor did he mean to impute blame to the directors in approving what had been done by those gentlemen. But, at the same time that he gave them credit for upright intentions, he could not altogether acquit them of blame, that they renewed the whole of their disapprobation, five years after their discovery of the original transactions. He stood there as the accuser of no man; his only motive in coming forward, was to challenge open attack on the character of Lord Hastings, because rumour, which he could not meet, had circulated insinuations to his prejudice. No attack had however been made, and for the best of all reasons, that no real ground for any attack existed. He congratulated the court then, on having the conduct of the noble Marquess so clearly established. (Hear, hear!) But it was said, that the adoption of this amendment was necessary to the character of the directors; if such a proposition came from one of the proprietors, as a shield to the directors, it was that of which they ought to be ashamed, and against which he would protest in their name as an executive body: it would be unfair and impolitic to shield themselves in such a manner. But it would be wholly ineffectual; it would not protect them from the interference which they seemed to think would be drawn, that if they did justice to the Marquess of Hastings, they would be acting with inconsistency. He repeated, it would be no protection, but would rise up against them at some future day in another place, and he cited as proving on their part a consciousness of their own weakness. He had heard with pleasure what had been said by the personal, if not professional, friends of Mr. Adam, respecting suspecting the character of that gentleman. He was glad to hear such testimonies borne to the conduct of an able servant of the Company: but he begged again to state that he had not attacked Mr. Adam. He made no charge against any man, nor did he think it fair to wound any man's feelings, by making charges which he was not present to defend. With the result of this discussion, he was perfectly satisfied; as far as the character of Lord Hastings was concerned, he was satisfied. No attack had been made on it; but what was he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) now called upon to do in supporting this amendment? He was called upon to approve of something positive; to approve of the whole of the despatches in which the conduct of the noble lord was censured; on a former occasion, one gentleman had said, that there were rumours respecting the general conduct of Lord Hastings, and nothing farther should be done by the court respecting him, until these rumours were removed. He was sorry the hon. gentleman had not followed up his assertion by declaring what these rumours were, and whether he thought there was any, and what ground for them. When he called for the statement of something tangible, he was met by the statement that it was necessary to support the dignity of the court. He did not deny that it was; but he could not see how that could be done by the amendment. Some hon. gentlemen had professed great respect for the noble Marquess; but they talked of insinuations of others—it reminded him of the leading characters in "The School for Scandal," who, when speaking of some absent acquaintance, declared that they liked him vastly; but the misfortune was, they could get nobody else to like him. (Hear, hear!) He would repeat, he was perfectly satisfied with the result of the debate, and so would the noble Marquess, who was the most sensitive man alive on any subject likely to affect his character. But, what did the amendment propose to do? To open again the whole question of the conduct of all the individuals concerned at Hyderabad. As that course had been adopted, he was ready to enter fully into the subject—with this view he would now call the attention of the court to the papers which had been laid before them; and here he would observe, that if his life were to be prolonged to a period much beyond that allotted to man, he could not anticipate more trouble or labour than what he had taken in selecting and arranging those papers, with the view of making himself fully acquainted with the subject to which they referred. Having said thus, he would declare as solemnly as if all his hopes, here and hereafter, depended upon it, his entire conviction that the whole of the charge, as far as the Marquess of Hastings was said to be implicated, was founded on mistake. He would now enter into a connected detail of the whole transactions, for the purpose of refuting, one after another, the objections that had been urged. The first thing which was to be noticed was the establishment of the house at Hyderabad, in 1814. The house was established for "banking agency transactions, for supplying timber from the forests on the banks of the Godavery, for the purpose of ship-building—these forests abounding in timber of a superior size and quality." To this there was no objection on the part of the government, or the directors, and the house was established. The next thing of which notice was taken, was the private letter of Lord Hastings to Sir W. Rumbold. His lordship writes on the 20th of November 1814, and states the difficulties which opposed the application of his ward's (Lady Rumbold's) fortune, for any other purpose than the vesting them in government securities. These letters to and from Sir W. Rumbold, were, it should be remembered, in private and confidential letters; and he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) took upon himself the whole of the responsibility for their being made public. He had advised Sir W. Rumbold to that step; and in that advice Lord Hastings expressed his entire concurrence. It was thought, by some gentlemen, that this publication was imprudent; but he gave it as his opinion from the first, and of the propriety of the advice he was every day more and more convinced, that the hon. baronet should risk every thing rather than not put them before the public. (Hear, hear!) The first assertion which had been made with respect to this, was a calumny. It was stated or insinuated, that Lord Hastings had made use of a part of his ward's fortune, and hence was inferred a corrupt motive on his lordship's part, in giving his patronage to Sir W. Rumbold in these transactions. There was, after this, a letter of Sir W. Rumbold to Lord Hastings, and one from Mr. J. Fries, to whom Sir William had written by Lord Hastings' advice. Now, what did Lord Hastings say? after telling him that he could not be justified in assenting to the embarkation of Lady Rumbold's fortune in any thing but government securities, he added—"This I mentioned to you at the time, and I see you look to the direct application of that principle; but I am not sure whether you take into calculation its indirect effects. You talk of borrowing the sum which you are to advance for a share in the firm. How can you do that without security?" This, let it be remembered, was a private letter; and it shewed that Lord Hastings did not look upon the junction with the firm as a very advisable speculation. The letter proceeded, "Your own money cannot be made that security, because that would be so subject to the very risk which Sir Edward East regarded as illegal. If this be not an obstacle, I ought to suggest for your consideration a point to which you probably have not adverted. You not only hazard the sum which you place in the firm, but any one of the partners is individually liable to the whole extent of his property for the debts of the house." This was the kind of responsibility, which some of the companies in the speculations now about sought to get rid of, by endeavouring to make the share-holders liable only to the amount of their respective shares. The letter went on: "any accumulation, therefore, which you might make with the view to comfort hereafter in England, would be exposed to that danger. I state this only for your reflection. I am not competent to form a judgment satisfactory to myself, of the advantage or peril of your engaging in the business. A man of greater worth and honour than John Palmer no where exists, if universal testimony is to be relied upon, and he is unquestionably of strong talents: on the other hand he has the character of speculating in commerce, to an extent disproportioned to his capital."

The publication of this opinion, which the noble Lord gave only as a rumour which had reached him, could not affect the character of Mr. John Palmer, which stood so deservedly high in the commercial world. The noble Lord gives in the next lines his reasons for making the statement. He says,

"This opinion may be only the loose guess of the uninformed, or the misrepresentation of the envious; still, having heard it advanced by a person whose situation gave him a special view of the commerce of Calcutta, I am bound to impart it to you. Whether Hyderabad is in such acknowledged connexion with the house of John Palmer in Calcutta, as that the one can be responsible for the other, I am not able to say. This fact would be a material consideration."

Now what does the noble Lord propose under those circumstances? He refers Sir Wm. to the opinion of Sir E. East, adding:

"Your best procedure will be to consult Sir E. East. The kindness of his disposition will insure you against his thinking it intrusion; and his judgment is so sure, that you would have perfect comfort in relying on it."

He would not for the present make any comment on this, but would proceed to the noble lord's second letter. What did that say?

"It is on the ground of the service to the Nizam, at the request of the Resident, that I have consented to let the good wishes of government for the prosperity of this firm be signified. No new establishment could have such a plea."

Now he begged the attention of the court to the passage which immediately preceded this, and he would appeal with confidence to the most critical judge, and ask whether it was not evident that this sentence he read, was given as corollary, following from what he had before stated, and whether the sense would not be completed by the addition of the word "for." It was necessary that in a nice examination of important passages, the meaning of every word should be examined with the view of ascertaining the real meaning of the author. Horne Tooke had written his Em Ptisista in consequence of a jurymen on his own trial not being able to comprehend the exact meaning which the word "but" gave to a particular passage. Now he would read the passage with the addition of the word "for," and he would ask any impartial man, whether that word would not fully explain the meaning of the whole?

"The partners speculate that you being one of the firm, will interest me in the welfare of the house, to a degree which will be materially beneficial to them: it is a fair and honest calculation. The amount of advantage, which the countenance of government may bestow, must be uncertain, as I apprehend it would flow principally from the opinion the natives would entertain, of the respect likely to be paid by their own government, to an establishment known to stand well in the favour of the supreme authority here. Perhaps a more distinct benefit may attend the firm from the consequent discouragement to competition with you by any other British partnership, to which a similar professional sanction would not be granted, 'for' it is on the ground of the service to the Nizam, at the request of our resident, that I have consented to let the good wishes of government for the prosperity of this firm be signified. No new establishment could have such a plea."

He would challenge any man to say, whether the advantage to be derived to the Nizam, was not the real object for which the peculiar sanction of government had been granted to the house?—The very same cause for which the members of the council gave their consent to the granting the license in 1816.—What was said by the house in its application to government for this license? That the act of parliament gave a power to the Governor General, and also to the governors of provincial districts, to suspend its restrictive clauses in cases of particular urgency. In order to see what was the true meaning of any particular clause in an act of parliament, it would be necessary to inquire into the objects for which the act had passed. The act in question was passed for the avowed purpose of preventing British subjects from making advances to the native powers, and thereby obtaining possession of particular districts of the country, from the taxes of which they might repay themselves; which practice was described to be to the great scandal of the British Government; but the act expressly gave a power by which it might be dispensed with in cases of particular urgency, and where the interests of the Company required it. Now, the question was, whether such a necessity existed in the case before the court? Upon this point he was at issue with the hon. Chairman. It was admitted that the Governor in Council had the discretionary power of dispensing with the act of parliament, where the interests of the Company required it: Now what was the first step which the council took, when the application for the license was made to them? They referred it to the Advocate-General, as to the legal bearing of it, and that learned person drew up the license himself; and what was the condition on which it was granted? If the license was given in any new terms, or without any of the ordinary forms, then it might not be unreasonable to infer some improper motive; but what appeared on the face of the license?—that it was drawn with a strict attention to all the usual forms, and the indulgence it granted was dependant upon one condition, that was, "Provided, however, that the said firm of Messrs. William Palmer and Co. shall at all times, when required so to do by the British Resident at Hyderabad, for the time being, communicate to the said Resident the nature and object of their transactions with the government or the subjects of his said highness the Nizam." Now, he would ask, with all the rumours abroad, with all the communications of Sir C. Metcalf, and his alleged conviction of Mr. Russell's connection with the house, he would ask for any one fact, for any reason, even if an untrue one, to shew on what his conviction was founded. Let there be any fact given, from all these complicated proceedings, to prove this. He did not stand there to attack Sir C. Metcalf; but he was anxious to defend the character of Mr. Russell; which had been most unjustly aspersed. He might at least claim the privilege of cross-examining the principal witness against him. He would ask then, from all the communications of Sir C. Metcalf, for any one fact to shew that Mr. Russell was in any way connected with Palmer and Co., or that he was guilty of an improper partiality to, or any connivance at, their transactions; for, if Mr. Russell was guilty, he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) would admit that the whole of the case on which he stood failed. (Hear, hear!) If any fact could be adduced to criminate Mr. Russell, he would give up the case and proceed no farther; (Hear, hear!) But if this could not be done, what must be the inference which any unprejudiced mind would draw?—why, that being on the spot, and fully aware of the nature of the transactions with the Nizam, he saw nothing in them which was not correct, nothing which did not come within the fair object of the government in granting the license. Mr. Russell was present, and made no remonstrance, because he felt that there was nothing to remonstrate against. If they killed the dog, the wolf might come; but if the dog was with the flock, and did not bark, the fair inference would be that the wolf had not come.

Mr. Rigby here observed, that one of Mr. Russell's brothers was connected with the house of Palmer and Co.

The hon. D. Kinnaird said, the gentleman named Russell, who was connected with the house, was in no way whatever related to Mr. Russell the Resident. He was glad, however, that the hon. proprietor had made the remark, as it enabled him (the hon. D. Kinnaird) to state in that positive and unqualified manner, that Mr. Russell's brother had no connection whatsoever with Palmer and Co. (Hear!) If it were to be said that Mr. Russell had any unjust partiality to the house, he would ask how was the assertion borne out by the facts? Had the Bengal Council at any time distrusted Mr. Russell? He begged the attention of an hon. proprietor opposite (Mr. Stuart) to this, for he assured that gentleman that he gave him full credit for his motives on this as well as on every other occasion; and if he found the Resident sanctioning, or not representing to the supreme government, the violation of an act of parliament, it was natural that his suspicions should have been excited, and he would admit that what the hon. member of council (Mr. Stuart) had done, was a proof of straight-forward good feeling on his part.

Mr. Stuart.—What I said was, that the connection of Sir William Rumbold with the Marquess of Hastings was a ground for circumspection. (Hear, hear!)

The hon. D. Kinnaird continued. He was glad to hear this avowal from the hon. gentleman, as it showed his very manly feeling. Rumours had been circulated to the prejudice of Mr. Russell; but they were only rumours, and had never assumed a shape in which they could be met and repelled; and it was not until the arrival of Sir C. Metcalf at Hyderabad, that Mr. Stuart expressed any suspicions of Mr. Russell's connection with the house of Palmer and Co. Now he would come to another part of these proceedings, and to the circumstances out of which many of the transactions of Palmer and Co. with the Nizam arose. Up to the arrival of Sir C. Metcalf, the Nizam had been allowed to

to act as an independent prince, with perhaps the exception, that following up the policy begun by Lord Minto, one of the Nizam's ministers, was the nominee of the supreme government at Calcutta. In the case before the court, Chundoo Loll was that nominee. It was clear, that in the latter part of the transactions, in that after Mr. Russell left Hyderabad, the Nizam was not independent, and it was admitted by one hon. member that he was no more than the Company's footstool. That hon. proprietor could not therefore approve of the situation in which the prince had latterly been placed, consistently with what had been formerly done. But to come to the point: in 1818, Mr. Russell reported to the Governor-General in Council, an arrangement entered into by the house of Palmer and Co. with the minister Chundoo Loll for the payment of 52,000 rupees a week for the pay of the Russell brigade. This was immediately sanctioned by the government, and why? Was it to give a guarantee to the house of Palmer and Co.? No; the attention of government fixed on the important point, that of putting the Nizam's troops into an efficient state; not a word was said about the house on that occasion. The council might, or might not, be wrong in granting their sanction; but certainly neither Mr. Russell nor the house of Palmer and Co. were to blame, for they had reason to believe that the sanction was correctly given. Then, he would ask, did the council approve of the Aurangabad arrangement for the purpose of advancing two lacs of rupees per month by Palmer and Co., for the payment of the troops? Mr. Stuart objected to that arrangement, because, he said, it was necessary that inquiries should be made as to the nature and object of the arrangement, and the terms on which it was made. What were the words of the license, which the house had received before this? They were, that they might do all acts within the territories of the Nizam, which were prohibited by the act 37 Geo. III., unless with the consent and approbation of the Governor in Council; but, notwithstanding this permission. Mr. Stuart was anxious that further information should be obtained as to the nature of the transaction, lest the house of Palmer and Co. might exercise a similar authority, by collecting in the districts, to that which it had been the object of the act of Parliament to prevent. The secretary of government was, therefore, directed to write to Mr. Russell, to know from him in what degree his sanction had been given to those arrangements, and whether he considered that any guarantee was implied on the part of government, and in what manner the liquidation of the assignments made on the revenues of particular districts was secured to Palmer and Co., and on what terms their advances were made. It was also, that the Governor-General was further desirous of knowing whether arrangements, equally efficient and economical, could, or could not, have been made with native bankers at Hyderabad? He begged here to say one word upon the subject of interest. It was charged against Messrs. Palmer and Co. that they took interest upon interest, and interest upon interest—why they must be extremely ignorant of the nature of commercial and banking concerns who made such a statement. He, (the hon. D. Kinnaird) as a banker, and without incurring the risk of being charged with usury, was in the constant habit of charging interest upon interest upon interest, under certain circumstances, and so he knew was every banker in London. The accounts of individuals who banked with them, were made up half yearly, and if it was found that any person had overdrawn his account, he was, of course, charged interest upon the sum overdrawn; and if at the end of the next half-year, it was still overdrawn, interest was charged upon the interest of the preceding half-year; but no one thought of accusing this as usurious. Now it was certain, that the interest charged by Palmer and Co. was known to Mr. Fendall and Mr. Adam as well as to Lord Hastings, and they concurred in it without having a word said about Sir W. Rumbold. (Hear, hear!) The measure was then approved of as a wise one; but, it seemed, that it was afterwards disapproved of by some gentlemen, because they did not properly examine the accounts. He would assert, that the inferences which had been drawn from those accounts, were absolute nonsense; and he contended, that if a third-rate clerk in any counting-house in town, were to examine them only for five minutes, he would be able to detect the error into which those who had previously looked over them had fallen. (Hear, hear!) But, to return to the arrangement of Aurangabad—it had been recommended to government by Mr. Russell, as a suggestion which originally came from Captain Sydenham, to the minister, Chundoo Loll, and was by him mentioned to Messrs. W. Palmer and Co.; but the Resident in recommending it, takes the whole responsibility on himself. Was he, too, married to a ward of Lord Hastings? (Hear!) It had, as he first stated, originated with Captain Sydenham, who, from a feeling that the Nizam's troops could not afford any effectual aid to the Company, unless they were placed upon a more regular discipline, proposed the plan which had been afterwards adopted. Was Captain Sydenham also in a conspiracy to enrich the firm, at the expense of the Nizam's dominions? Was he, too, married to a ward of Lord Hastings? (Hear, hear!) These pecuniary transactions were under very different circumstances from all former loans to native princes, which it had been the object of the act of parliament to put down. In former instances, there were no residents who, to prevent an abuse of the practice, (and this, as he had just said, was what the legislature intended to prevent by the act of 37th Geo. III.)—but here there was a Resident. He was acquainted with the whole of the transaction, and he did—what? He sent the whole details to the supreme government, and asked not for a guarantee from the Company to the house; for the policy of Lord Hastings' government was, that the Company should not be made liable for even a single shilling of such contracts; all that was asked for was a guarantee against any interference by others. The conduct which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stuart) pursued on that occasion, was, he would admit, not dictated by any hostility to the house of Palmer and Co. though it ultimately had the most injurious effect upon them; but he (the hon. Douglas Kinnaid) regretted that the hon. member had allowed himself to be alarmed without cause on that occasion; for if he had only looked upon Mr. Russell as an honest man, he would have found he had no cause to fear. What did Mr. Russell say of this arrangement, with respect to the terms on which it was made? In the extract from his letter, quoted in Mr. Stuart's own minute, he stated his object in promoting it in these words—"I considered that the punctual payment of the regular and reformed troops, was indispensable to their efficiency; and I knew that it could not be securely provided for by any other means. None of the native bankers at Hyderabad could have commanded funds adequate for the purpose, and even if they could, their terms would have been much higher than the proposed arrangement."

The fact was, the native bankers would be very unwilling to lend their money to the Nizam under any circumstances, and at any rate, because they were well aware that they could obtain no security for recovering it back. This was a feeling not confined to the subjects of despots in the east; it was well-known to exist much nearer home. They saw, not long back, that the King of Naples, wanting to borrow money, could not raise a single ducat, in that way, amongst his own subjects; and for the best reason, that, if they could lend, they knew they could not stipulate for security: but it was seen, that Mr. Rothschild did lend his Majesty of Naples the required sum, and why? because he took care beforehand to have the very best security for the repayment of the loan. But Mr. Stuart, in his minute, objected, "That the circumstance of the native bankers, not being able to make the advances to the government, and the consequent utter dependence of the Resident and the Nizam, for the regular troops, on the British house of agency, was sufficiently extraordinary and alarming;" and the hon. member of council added,— "That, although Mr. Russell assured them the terms were more favourable than could have been obtained from native bankers, they do not know that the terms are not ruinous; and that he considers Mr. Russell bound, by solemn obligations of duty, to remonstrate, in a manner beyond all doubt and suspicion, that the measure had originated, and was prosecuted from no other motives than a disinterested regard for the welfare of that government."

It was rather strange, that Mr. Stuart, who was possessed of such scruples, and fears, and doubts, had not stated any one tangible objection, or mentioned any fact upon which Mr. Russell was to be blamed. Now, with respect to this Aurungabad arrangement, which was so much objected to, it was curious enough that the house of Palmer and Co. were put into a situation by which they might have gained nothing on the whole transaction. The terms of the contract were, that they were to be ready with two lacs of rupees on a particular day in each month: for repayment of this, the revenues of a certain district were assigned over to them, to the amount of thirty lacs in the year; but the contract was accompanied with a stipulation for interest at each side; that was, that, if the house received the money from the district, before it was paid by them, they paid 24 per cent. interest to the Nizam; but, if they paid the sum, before it was collected in the district for them, they charged a similar amount. Now, by this means, they might have lost instead of gained: and this was the mighty contract, of which it was said, that they charged this year principal, and the next principal and interest, and the next more, and so on. Why, the fact is, the house was not paid any thing at all. (Hear, hear!) The two arrangements, that of Aurungabad and Berar Surwar, had the distinct sanction of the supreme government. (He should here state, that the Rajah, Chundoo Loll, was surrounded by enemies, who were jealous of his influence, by means of British power; and they were opposed to the reforms which that minister was endeavouring to bring about.) Well, the two arrangements having received the sanction of government, in the latter end of the year 1819, the result was, that the Nizam was indebted to the house of Palmer and Co., in the sum of twenty-nine lacs of rupees, which had gone to pay the troops which had been organized for him by our means. It might be asked, what occasion was there for those troops?

Why,

Why, the fact was, that a body of hostile troops was, at that time, between us and the Nizam's territories; and, if the troops of the latter were not put into a condition to repel, by themselves, any attack, it might have been all over with us in that quarter. (Hear!) It was said, that there were four, and not three, accounts.

It was a strange mistake to say that there were four accounts. The old account was one which existed long before these particular transactions took place. There were the Aurungabad account, the Berar Suwar account, and the Hyderabad account; and when the government asked for information at the end of the year 1819, it was found that twenty-five lacs of rupees were then owing to the house, in consequence of the non-payment of those assignments for which they had advanced money, to pay the troops. What then became of the reproach that the house possessed an undue influence? It was stated that they had power to do any thing with the Nizam's government which they pleased. Why then did they not exercise it in this instance? (Hear, hear!) But what proof had been given of their great power and authority? One instance was adduced by Sir C. Metcalf, where they had sent a servant to levy the amount of a debt, and that gentleman had also mentioned a letter which the Marquess of Hastings had written, or caused to be written, to Mr. Russell, at the conclusion of the war, in which his Excellency expressed his desire to entertain the minister's proposition for reducing the expenses of the Nizam. This appeared to have given offence to Sir C. Metcalf, whose original proposition had, it seemed, been neglected. It was a happy circumstance that the plan of Messrs. Palmer and Co. for advancing money to the Nizam's government, for the support of the troops, had been carried into effect. He was now speaking of the Aurungabad arrangement; on this point he would venture to challenge opposition. He made his observation in the presence of military men who knew something of the state of India at that time; and they could correct him if he asserted that which was not fact. The successes obtained by the Marquess of Hastings, at that period, were almost miraculous. Concurring circumstances (partly accidental, and partly effected by the foresight of the noble Marquess) produced the most glorious results for our Indian Empire. He did not wish to give the noble Marquess greater praise than was just and necessary; but, if one circumstance might be pointed out, without fear of contradiction, as having contributed as much, if not more, than any episode that could be selected in the history of India, to the success which crowned our efforts at that time, it was the effectual support given by the troops of the Nizam to our forces when so many eminent and important advantages were gained. (Hear, hear!) While he gave the noble Marquess credit for his foresight, (and it was evident that the noble Marquess saw the necessity of rendering those troops completely effective) he could not avoid admiring his good fortune. Pericles was painted with fortune at his feet; and he thought, that, if a General was possessed of great foresight, which, combined with good fortune, produced glorious results—he ought to be received with acclamations—he ought to receive that reward to which those great characters were entitled, whose achievements challenged the admiration of the world. Individuals ought not to attempt to pick holes in such characters. It was bad taste, and bad policy, to impute, by a sort of special plea, corrupt motives to the noble Marquis, because he approved of that plan which had been attended with the most satisfactory results. "India has been saved," said the friends of the noble Marquess, "by his wisdom and his extraordinary exertions." "True," said his opponents, "but the house which lent its funds to assist in that great object has received very large interest." (Hear, hear, and laughter!) This truly was a pretty way of balancing the account. (Hear!) In 1819, he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) asserted, and on good authority, that, on two transactions alone, namely, the Aurungabad and the Berar Suwar accounts, after deducting the balance due to the minister, and certain Tunkabs, then in hand, the debts owing to the house were near twenty-six lacs of rupees. Well might the minister consider the confidence which they placed in him as the brightest feather in his cap; and well might the house of Palmer and Co. be pleased with their constituents, whose money had been advanced for the purpose of assisting the Nizam's government—for the purpose of equipping those troops who had rendered us such essential service. He contended that the house of Palmer and Co. had acted in a very moderate manner. No English house, he was sure, without greatly extending its liberality, would have entered into such heavy engagements, when the security was so uncertain. (Hear, hear!) "I have seen," said the hon. proprietor, "no account connected with that house to which I, Douglas Kinnaird, will not write my name,—and which I will not certify to be a fair business-like account. And I will challenge the accountant of the Company on any day, to meet me, and to investigate this business." (Hear!) In 1819, Lord Hastings wrote a letter to Mr. Russell, in which he said in effect, "Now is the time to press for retrenchment and reform." How did the minister conduct himself on that occasion? He, poor poor man! was accused of having lavished money, to support his own power, and to acquire friends. In truth, that individual was placed in a situation in which he might well demand every assistance that could be afforded him by those who knew his character. He was surrounded on all sides by intriguing enemies, anxious for his disgrace and downfall. Let gentlemen read the character given of that minister by Mr. Russell—a character not more beautiful than he believed it to be true. Here they would find those great qualities of nature; here they would discover those refinements of feeling, which made good men rejoice to think, that even in India, that distant country, where different habits and different colours prevailed, all the beautiful traits which ennobled and elevated the human character, were to be found. (Hear, hear!) Mr. Russell thus described Chundoo Loll:—"Chundoo Loll is a most respectable man in his private character, and too far superior to his rival as a public officer, to admit of any comparison between them. He has great industry, patience, and aptitude, in all the practical branches of the government. He is indefatigable in his application, clear in his views as far as they extend, and as a man of business I hardly ever knew his superior. His long experience has given him an intimate acquaintance with all the affairs of every department, and rendered him perfectly familiar with the manner of transacting them. He almost undertakes too much. Whatever is done is done by himself; and, even the bodily labour he undergoes is astonishing. He has great kindness of disposition—is easy of access—affable in his manners towards the lowest persons—and never, I believe, knowingly, authorized a measure of unjust severity: but he is too indulgent and complaisant to those who are employed under him; and he is certainly deficient in that resolution, energy, and firmness, without which it is impossible to preside, with complete effect, over the affairs of a government. His great personal expense; indeed, the only one of his personal expenses that is very great, is his indiscriminate habit of giving alms. He distributes many thousand rupees every day to mendicants of all descriptions. I have often recommended him to confine his alms to those only who are really objects of charity; but he has a superstitious notion, that it is to this practice he owes his elevation in life; and nothing, I believe, would prevail upon him to abandon it. With some harm, however, much good is unquestionably done. Every poor person who will go to the Rajah's gate, may receive two pice and a quarter of a seer of grain daily, and a rupee and a blanket the first time they appear; and, in this way, many thousand lives have been preserved during the recent season of scarcity. (Hear, hear!) The inhabitants of whole villages, who fled to the capital for support, have been fed and clothed by the Rajah's bounty. (Hear!) So much does he consider this a point of personal duty, that, even to the most squalid and loathsome objects, he always administers his charity with his own hand. The fairest mode of estimating the practical utility of a public officer, is to consider how his place could be supplied. If any accident were to happen to Chundoo Loll, no individual, I am persuaded, could be found, under the Nizam's government, capable of conducting the duties which are now discharged by him. With our support, he is qualified to make a better minister than any other that could be chosen; but he could not stand by himself; he has no rank, fortune, or connexions, to protect him against the jealousy of the Nizam, and the intrigues of Mooneer-cool Moolk; and, if we were to withdraw, or even to lessen the support we promised him, when he came into power, if he did not immediately retire, as in all probability he would do, he would soon be driven from his office. Those very qualities, which constitute his principal recommendation with us, would be laid hold of by his and our enemies, as the readiest means of effecting his ruin." (Hear, hear!) This was the man whom it was the object of Sir Charles Metcalf to remove from his office; of which fact, he would adduce the most conclusive evidence, before he sat down. The whole conduct of the minister confirmed the character given of him by Mr. Russell, as being the most efficient and intelligent man in the country. In 1819, as he had already said, the noble Marquess wrote to Mr. Russell, observing, "Now is the time at which reform must be pressed on Chundoo Loll; he must dismiss a large body of useless troops." To effect this object, it required great energy on the part of the minister, and great support and assistance from the Resident. It was a very bold act to let loose a body of riotous and turbulent troops, headed by discontented and ruined chiefs, whose existence, when dismissed became a matter of doubt, unless it was supported by plunder and devastation. By whom was this act to be performed? By a minister who did not possess the support of his sovereign. The last shilling had, at this time, been wrung from the cultivators; the villages had been ruined; and how was it possible that the tillers of the earth, exhausted as their means were, could be called on to find money to pay off troops, by disbanding whom, it was thought, a saving of twenty-five lacs of rupees a year would be effected? It was calculated, that, by the immediate command of thirteen lacs of rupees, such an arrangement might be made, as would effect a saving of twenty-five five lacs of rupees, or £1250,000 a year. Some debts were due from the Circars to the Nizam's government; but a large sum was owing by the latter to the house of Palmer and Co., on account of money which they had paid to the Nizam's troops. Those troops were commanded by British officers; the payments were made at the request of the Resident, and were, to all intents and purposes, for a purely British object. This transaction was recorded, and the government were made acquainted with it. When the house of Palmer and Co. were asked to undertake the payment of these troops, they stated to the Resident, that, so far from being an object advantageous to themselves, it was one that would, not only not be attended with gain, but would, most probably, be followed by loss. They thought, however, that their compliance would be so useful to the government, that it would be a counterbalance for the protection they had already received, and would create a debt of gratitude which might entitle them to farther protection in future. The Rajah, Govind Bukhsh, a powerful chieftain, offered, out of jealousy to that house, and discontent at the support they gave to Chundoo Loll, to take those troops into his own hands, and to pay them out of his own immediate districts. To this, however, Chundoo Loll would not consent, because he could not rely on the regularity of that chieftain. It was then agreed to raise money at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, or 24 per cent. per annum: but what was that, if those who lent the money were borrowing at the same rate? It was clear, that Chundoo Loll could not get money from the Circars, nor from the native bankers. He had said, speaking of the native bankers, that he would pay those fellows no more interest, as they had already received sufficient. What resource then was left, but the house of Palmer and Co.? Many observations had been made about "interest on interest;" but if, unfortunately, money was borrowed, and not regularly paid, in the course of two or three years, the interest increased to a very large amount; and the borrower was surprised to find himself much deeper in debt than he imagined. But, while the interest was thus accumulating, it should not be forgotten, that the lender was not getting any thing elsewhere for his money. In the latter end of 1819, the first application was made to Mr. Russell, to procure a sanction or guarantee from government, for the advance of money, by the house of Palmer and Co., to enable the minister to effect the four objects stated by him in his proposition to Messrs. Palmer and Co.: first, to reduce unnecessary establishments; second, to make advances to the cultivators of the deserted districts; third, to set free the assignments over the districts which the minister had pledged himself to give for money borrowed, in anticipation of the coming income of the state; and fourth, to discharge debts which stood at a high rate of interest; and here some remarkable mistakes had occurred, which had not been discovered until lately. It had, in the first place, been supposed that the house was in possession of certain tunkas, which it held as a security for part of the debt due by the Nizam's government; but it had been entirely forgotten, that those tunkas had been given up when the loan was concluded. In 1819, the minister wanted a large sum of money. The distinct objects which the Nizam's government had in view, were perfectly well known, and the house of Palmer and Co. requested Mr. Russell to submit a proposition to government;—to do what? and here he must say that this point was worthy of attention, because much mistake and confusion had arisen out of it. What, then, did the house ask of Mr. Russell? Why, to send to Calcutta, their proposition, for raising a sum of money, for the Nizam, and to obtain from the British government some sort of sanction or guarantee to that measure. The calculation of Palmer and Co. was, that if the British government would consent to this, they might raise money at the British presidencies at 12 per cent., and that they could lend to the minister at 18 per cent., covering every risk and expense. This was the proposition which Mr. Russell refused to transmit to government, knowing the foundation on which the Marquess of Hastings was determined to act, was that which the Company had long recommended and enforced—namely, that their character should not be compromised by making loans of money to the native princes, which, it might be supposed, was advanced in the hope of affording a pretext for afterwards interfering with the internal concerns of those sovereigns, whom they had thus assisted. The house thought it was a most important object that the sanction of government should be obtained. They were very much interested in the prosperity of the country; a debt of £300,000 being then due to them, while they possessed only securities to the amount of £100,000, which might or might not be paid. Under these circumstances they wrote to Calcutta, and endeavoured to ascertain through the medium of Mr. John Palmer, whether such a transaction was likely to be guaranteed? The answer was, "No, I have no hope of it." But it was said, "If you lend the money to the Nizam without demanding the guarantee, all will be right." This negotiation was not the work of a week. Calcutta and Hyderabad were at a great distance from each other, and the business could not be concluded in a short time.

The loan, it should be observed, was first solicited by the minister at the end of the year 1819; and in the month of February he became urgent for the completion of some arrangement. The payments on account of the loan commenced in the ensuing month. At that time the debt due to the house on the account current, was only 4,60,000 rupees. This debt or balance was occasioned by a transfer made by Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. from the Hyderabad to the Aurangabad account of six lacs of rupees in the month of January. The Berar Suwar's account was at this period debtor about eighteen lacs, and the Aurangabad account was debtor about fourteen lacs; making a total of thirty-seven lacs. Against this, however, there was a set-off of tunkas in the hands of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., to the amount of ten lacs, which reduced the debt at that time to twenty-seven lacs; and had not the six lacs already mentioned, been transferred to the Aurangabad account, the minister would have been a debtor to the house, at the commencement of March, when the loan payments began, for only twenty-one lacs. Between the month of March and the month of August 1820, the house advanced no less a sum on the Rajah's drafts and orders than forty-one lacs of rupees. Out of the aggregate sum due to the house at the time when they actually commenced their payments out of the loan, there were only five lacs, the nature and object of which had not already received the sanction of government. The advances made by the house, for the payments to the Berar Suwar, and to the reformed troops at Aurangabad, had been both distinctly and severally brought under the notice of government, the one in 1816 and the other in 1819. The united balances on these two accounts, amounted in 1820, to thirty-two lacs. No subsequent recognition of this debt in the new shape of a loan, could give it more validity than it possessed already. In neither the one case nor the other, did the Calcutta government give any guarantee; it only took cognisance of the nature and object of the advances. It was, in fact, a liberal concession on the part of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. when they made these balances a part of the loan. By pursuing that course, they postponed immediate payment, which they might have demanded, to a distant period, and they consented to accept periodical instalments on the terms which he would presently state. They also released the tunkas which the minister had given them, in order that he might apply those securities to his other necessities. In the month of May, as the advances were still going on, the house of Palmer and Co. exerted themselves to raise money at a cheap rate of interest, in the different Presidencies, but they entirely failed in their efforts. In fact, it was impossible they could succeed; as they had entered into an engagement to procure sixty lacs of rupees, at an interest of eighteen per cent. to be repaid by the minister in six years, at the rate of ten lacs per year. What was the rate of interest which the Aurangabad and Berar Suwar accounts then bore? They bore an interest of twenty-four per cent; but, in making this sixty lac loan, the house of Palmer and Co. wisely perceived that if the minister could effect a reduction of the great expenses which embarrassed the government; if he were enabled to pay off those burdens which pressed so heavily on the Nizam's treasury; if means were afforded to him, by which he could effect the salutary reform that he proposed; they would ultimately be reimbursed to the full extent of any capital which they might have advanced. In the month of February 1820, when the minister became extremely urgent, the proposition for a loan was reduced to writing; but soon after, Palmer and Co. discovered that they had no chance whatever of getting money at any of the presidencies, at the rate of twelve per cent. interest. They had already advanced £100,000 to the minister, in the contemplation of being able to raise money on such reasonable terms as would enable them to lend it to the Nizam, at the rate of eighteen per cent. The first fallacy which they committed was the indulgence in a hope that they would be successful in procuring some sort of sanction or guarantee from the British government, under the shield of which they expected to raise money at a moderate rate of interest. But, being disappointed in their expectation, and finding they had undertaken that, which without incurring ruin, they could not perform, they went to the minister and said, "We can go on no longer: we cannot lend money at this rate of interest; we must have a larger bounty for the money we are advancing. We are, in fact, ourselves borrowing money at a higher rate of interest than that which we are charging you." The minister said, "Go on: by the expenditure of thirteen lacs of rupees I will be able, in six months, to save more than the additional interest which you may call for. What interest will you charge?" Now the alteration in the terms of the loan might be effected in two ways, either by advancing the whole sixty lacs, at an increased rate of interest of 20½ per cent., or going on charging 18 per cent. on a nominal loan of 60 lacs of rupees, but advancing, in fact, only 52 lacs. It was quite clear to any person conversant in these matters, that 18 per cent. on a loan of 60 lacs came exactly to the same thing as 20½ upon 52 lacs. The minister preferred taking the smaller sum upon these terms; and why was a preference given to limited the interests of two lacs. Because it was important to the house, to force the limited market at Hyderabad as little as possible. They found that they could not borrow money elsewhere, and it was quite clear, that the larger the sum which they attempted to raise in the market, the higher would they increase the general rate of interest. Not only that, but they ran the risk, under such circumstances, of a demand for increased interest from their constituents, whose funds they were employing for the benefit of the Nizam's government. This reasoning was plain enough: if he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) borrowed a considerable sum in the market, at 5 per cent., and wished to obtain the loan of more money, he would find, as the demand increased, that the interest would increase proportionably. The minister, at this particular moment, only wanted thirteen lacs of rupees; and it would have been bad policy to have gone into the market and to have considerably raised, as must have been the case, the interest of money, by negotiating for so large a sum as 60 lacs of rupees.

Mr. Wastbrough rose to order. Whatever the event of this discussion might be, he conceived that the hon. proprietor had conducted himself in a most praiseworthy manner. His motives, neither he, nor any other gentleman, could impugn; they were alike honourable to his head and heart.

The Chairman called on the hon. proprietor to confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. Wastbrough said, he merely wished to pay a just tribute to the conduct of the hon. mover; but that being done, he must say that he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) was deviating very widely from the course which he laid down in the commencement of his speech (cries of question!).

The Chairman.—I think that the hon. mover is not at all out of order.

The hon. D. Kinnaird said, that he was distinctly speaking on the papers, that had been laid before the court. It appeared, then, that it was determined by the parties that it would be better to advance the lesser sum of 52 lacs, at the interest of 18 per cent. on the nominal loan of 60 lacs, than to proceed in the way which was originally intended.

Mr. Rigby.—What does the hon. gentleman say to the bonus?

The hon. D. Kinnaird.—His hon. friend was most impatient for the bonus: he should have it in good time; it should be given to him in mince meat by and bye. (Laughter.) The object of the alteration was obvious, and one which, under the circumstances, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have adopted. It was better for the house not to force the market, and therefore it was deemed expedient to advance 52 lacs instead of 60, at interest of 18 per cent. being paid on the nominal loan of 60 lacs, which amounted to 52 on the real loan of 52 lacs. But what was to be done with the eight lacs, or bonus? Why, of course, Messrs. Palmer and Co. were to pocket that; so, at least, the quonies of the house of Palmer and Co. said. Indeed it was actually stated by Sir C. Metcalf (to whom he gave credit for the uttermost ignorance of affairs of this nature), and also by Mr. Adam. They had both mistaken the first instalment made on the loan, which amounted to eight lacs, for this so much talked-of bonus. Now, what was the bonus really to consist of? It was to be a payment of eight lacs of rupees without interest, at the end of the period when the payment of 52 lacs, with interest, at the rate of 20½ per cent. was made to the house of Palmer and Co. The minister said, "at the end of six years, when these 52 lacs are paid, you shall have a bonus of eight lacs: I give you my promissory note for it." On these eight lacs there was to be no interest whatever. The only interest to be paid was 20½ per cent. on the 52 lacs. Now let the court consider what was the worth of the minister's promissory note, at six years' date, for eight lacs of rupees in the money market? If gentlemen would take the trouble to make a calculation, it would be found to have been worth somewhere about two lacs of rupees; for if that sum were paid down and lent out at interest for six years, it would produce between seven and eight lacs at the expiration of that period. That would have been the value of the minister's promissory note, had there been real security for its payment when it became due. But there was no security of the kind in this instance; and, he asked, what would such a promissory note have produced in any of the presidencies? Would any house of agency have given one lac of rupees for it? (Cries of No, no.) In Hyderabad it would have been wholly unmarketable. The minister's death, his removal from office, the destruction of the independence of the government (and it was not at the time likely that the government would be able to exist for six years) and various other contingencies, diminished in a very great degree the value of that distant payment. Yet, Sir Charles Metcalf most erroneously stated, that this bonus was paid in the first six months.

Mr. Rigby.—The papers allege that fact.

The hon. D. Kinnaird.—Yes, it was very true; such an assertion was made by Sir Charles Metcalf and Mr. Adam; but he defied any man who looked with a banker's eye to the accounts, to affirm their proposition.

An hon. Proprietor said.—It is stated that that the house received interest on that sum.

THE HON. D. KINNAIRD.—They were not to receive interest on it—they were to be paid 18 per cent. on a nominal loan of 60 lacs; which, as he before said, was equal to 80½ per cent. on 52 lacs. This, it was found, would not be adequate compensation to meet the risk and expenses to be encountered (even on these terms) considering the rate of interest which they were obliged to allow to their constituents. The minister, in consequence, agreed to give them a further compensation of eight lacs of rupees at the expiration of six years. Some hon. proprietors had been taken in on this subject (as many others had been), because they had not examined it narrowly, but assumed, as fact, that which was asserted by Sir C. Metcalf. He defied any man to say, that, in a country where the ordinary interest was 24 per cent., which was the case here, that a promise to pay eight lacs at the expiration of six years, would be worth more than two lacs in the market, even if real security were given for the ultimate payment of the specified sum? But, as in this case, there was a very great chance that it would not be paid at all, he doubted very much whether any house would have advanced half a lac of rupees on this part of the minister's agreement. After some correspondence had taken place on the subject of the loan, their written contract, which was intended to be acted on, was placed in the hands of Mr. Russell. That contract was nothing more nor less than an agreement on the part of the minister, to pay to the house of Palmer and Co. in six years, 60 lacs of rupees, in six separate instalments. The nature and object of this transaction were plainly stated, the license called for nothing more, and that statement was amply sufficient. Mr. Russell transmitted the proposition for the loan in the very words that had passed when it was negotiated, and the government thought proper to sanction it. Mr. Stuart, indeed, objected to it, in the same spirit and for the same reason which had before induced him to oppose the Aurangabad transaction; namely, because the precise terms and the interest of the loan, were not stated. The members of the council proceeded to give their different opinions (most unfortunately, as he thought, for their own financial credit) on this loan. They set to work; some made the interest 12, some 20, and some, he believed, 30 per cent.; but it was quite clear from their statements, that they really did not understand the subject. After Mr. Stuart had recorded four minutes, and the other members of the council three each, an answer was sent back, authorizing the government to sanction the loan of 60 lacs of rupees to the Nizam's government. This was the only sanction; this was the only guarantee that was given to this transaction. On the 1st of September 1820, Mr. Russell transmitted his first report to the Bengal Government, with respect to the effects which had been produced by this loan. It was necessary that they should particularly advert to Mr. Russell's statement, because it tended to develop the line of conduct which Chundoo Lall appeared anxious to pursue. In doing so, they must come to this conclusion, either that Mr. Russell was telling abominable falsehoods, or that his testimony of what he had seen performed under the operation of the loan, was worthy of belief, and, undoubtedly, if it were, it placed the policy of that measure in the most favourable point of view. In his despatch Mr. Russell said (speaking of the retrenchments which the minister was making)—“Among the principal officers whom it has been found necessary to remove from their situations, I am sorry to be obliged to mention the minister's own brother, Rajah Govind Bucksh. At Ellickpoor, a relation of the minister, named Rao Rajah Ram, who, as Naib Subahdar, had charge of the eastern portion of Berar, has also been removed from his office. Of the remaining districts resumed from the charge of Rao Rajah Ram, the minister has appointed his own son, Rajah Bala Pershaud, to be Talookdar, the local duties being conducted by a very intelligent revenue-officer of the name of Rao Venkat Row, whom the minister has chosen as his son's deputy. In my original report on the subject of the condition of the Nizam's affairs, dated the 21th of November last, I enumerated the advantages with which I thought this particular arrangement would be attended. It has now been adopted by the minister of his own accord, and is of itself, for the strongest of all reasons, a copious proof of the sincerity of his exertions to improve the country. The money raised by the minister on the loan which has received your lordship's sanction, has been very judicious, and has already accomplished much of the purpose for which it was desired. A reduction of useless establishments has been effected to the annual extent of between twenty-two and twenty-three lacs of rupees, on a plan similar in principle, though varying in detail, from that enclosed in my despatch to the secretary, dated 15th May last. Among these reductions are included 306 horse, and 500 foot, on the minister's own personal establishment,” (this, observed Mr. Kinnauld, of the minister's private train), “and 237 horse, and 250 foot on that of his brother Rajah Govind Bucksh. All recruiting throughout the Nizam's army, has been suspended in the regular and reformed troops which are to be kept up at their full strength. These troops (said Mr. Kinnauld) belong to

to the Company, and were recommended by English officers. "The returns which have hitherto been made, have not, I believe," (continued Mr. Russell in his statement), "thrown any industrious or deserving individuals out of employ; and by careful and gradual revision, they may, undoubtedly, be prosecuted to a much larger extent. Advances have been made in all the different districts, and the minister having been relieved from his most urgent embarrassments, has been enabled to allow large remissions of the revenue, without which it would have been utterly impracticable by any measures to revive the prosperity of the country." Now, how had the minister been enabled to make these remissions? Clearly by the removal of the pressure occasioned by the Tunkas, which had been held by the house for the liquidation of certain demands, the payment of which was by the arrangement of the loan, put off for six years. Mr. Russell went on to say, that "after the measures that Rajah Chundoo Loll has already adopted, and the course he has pursued towards the most powerful persons in the state, including even his own brother, it can no longer be a question whether he is cordially disposed to promote your lordship's views, for correcting the abuses in the Nizam's affairs, and ameliorating the condition of the country. But, be his disposition what it might, it would be impossible for him to act with either confidence or effect, without our encouragement and support. The evils he had to remove were not of common magnitude or recent origin: they were the result of remote causes, and had become inveterate from long standing. When I first travelled through the Nizam's country, upwards of twenty years ago, it was in a condition not substantially better than it is now; and my predecessor, Captain Sydenham, in his last despatch to the Earl of Minto, dated the 29th of May 1810, only a few months after Rajah Chundoo Loll came into his present office, expressed his opinion on the subject in these strong terms: 'With regard to the amelioration of the state of this country, I am convinced that during the reign of the present Nizam, no improvement can be expected without the administration of the country be placed under the control of the Resident. The defects of the present government are too deeply rooted, and too widely extended to admit of any partial reform, and it is therefore unfortunate that the only effectual remedy that can be applied, should be so much at variance with our views and policy.' The minister, therefore, has had, and still has to contend against all the disadvantages arising from the peculiarity of the Nizam's character, as well as to encounter at every step the active opposition, not only of the individuals, who, having an immediate interest in the continuance of abuses, are now violently opposed to their correction; but that of the whole people associated with Muddoor Ool Mookk, who are personally and politically opposed to his administration. (In this quarter every possible effort has been made, and will continue to be made, to counteract his measures by resistance, and intrigue, and misrepresentation. It cannot be expected that the full practical effect of any extensive system should become immediately apparent. The process of correction and improvement is gradual in its nature. There are already, however, manifest proofs of a salutary impression having been made upon persons in authority; and of the people having acquired a confidence which they did not before feel in the disposition of their rulers. The following passage in a letter from Captain Seyer, shews that the minister's decisive measures have produced their effect, even at places the most remote from the capital. The character given in it of the person who has been dismissed from the chief authority at Ellickpoor, is applicable to a large portion of the Nizam's officers. 'I am glad to find the minister has taken such decided steps regarding Ruffet Ool Mookk; he was proverbially infamous for his tyranny and oppression. Salabut Khan mentioned to me what had befallen, in a way that shewed the example was not lost on him. The Rajah Ram's recall to Hyderabad will be extremely useful. He is weak, vain, and ostentatious; rapacious, not out of the love of money, but merely to supply his profusion; perfectly indifferent to the welfare of the people committed to his charge; easily led, but unfortunately surrounded by bad advisers. I have never found him at all unwilling to attend to my suggestions; and the particular instances of misconduct in his officers or himself, which I have brought under his notice, have generally been redressed. But his constant want of money forces him into the practice of all sorts of means to procure it, and he will perhaps meet a demand for restitution to one man, by adopting similar violence to that complained of, to another.' I have confined my advice to the minister on every occasion to the correction of abuses, and have been careful to avoid recommending any measure in the shape of innovation. We have not done justice, in our own system, to the original institutions of the country. As strangers we are hasty in condemning what we do not understand, and have often defeated our good intentions by establishing our own arbitrary rules and methods, to the exclusion of those which have grown out of the circumstances of the people, and are inseparably blended with their manners and their opinions." These were a few amongst many wise reflections, which Mr. Russell had made on this subject.

An hon. Proprietor said, the hon gentleman had better read his whole pamphlet.

The hon. D. Finward observed that he read from the pamphlet in order to save the time of the court. Such was the opinion formed by Mr. Russell on this arrangement. He should here state that the idea which Sir C. Metcalf had formed of it, at first, was no less favourable. Mr. Russell retired from his post as Resident at Hyderabad in Dec. 1820, and Mr. Metcalf, who had been for some time Secretary to the government at Calcutta, replaced him in that situation. The first despatch from Sir Charles (then Mr.) Metcalf, contained a copy of the terms in which he had communicated to Messrs. Palmer and Co. the sudden and peremptory recall of the license. The letter of Messrs. Palmer and Co. in reply, pointed out the necessary consequences to their establishment, and detailed the several pecuniary advances, amounting to fifteen lacs which they had made under the guarantee of the minister, Chundoo Loll, independently of the loan and the Aurungabad advances. The Governor-General, on the 10th of February 1821, acknowledged the propriety of those advances, in the following despatch, addressed to Sir C. Metcalf, by Mr. Swinton the Secretary.

"Sir, I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 21st ult. the copy of one which you addressed to Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., in consequence of instructions from this government, with a copy of the reply from that firm. It was necessary, towards the fulfilment of the above instructions, that your language should be strong and precise; but Messrs. Palmer and Co. have erred in construing the tenor of the third paragraph in your letter to be rigorous, if not oppressive. The pleasure of the Court of Directors has been signified, that no more loans shall be made by the firm to the Nizam or his minister; and it was incumbent on his lordship in Council to communicate the interdiction in such terms, as should not leave room for any possible misapprehension. At the same time, nothing can be more remote from the intentions of this government, than to impose any shackles on the commercial dealings of the house. The prohibition could never be meant by the honourable court, or by the Governor-General in Council, to apply to transactions purely commercial, even though they should be with the government of the Nizam. It is only requisite, in the latter case, that reference should be made to your judgment, lest the engagement should operate as an imposed invasion. The restrictions ought not to be considered by the house as conveying the shadow of imputation on their integrity.

Perfectly sensible of the advantages suggested by the Nizam and his subjects from the aid furnished by Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., the Governor-General in Council cannot but be disposed to ascribe thorough fairness to their dealing, so that an oblique impeachment of their conduct, would be altogether inconsistent. The advances specified in the seven items enumerated by Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., appear to the Governor-General in Council consonant to the principles which had the general assent of this government. The faith plighted by the minister, that he would not, without answering to Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. for the sum, dispossess the revenue of that tenure, on the strength of which alone, the house furnished money to restore the cultivation of the district, is a simple and actual pledge, liable to no suspicion of incorrectness. A reliance on the honour of the minister, which is all the amount of reference to him, is not meant to be invalidated in those instances, the engagements having in them been made before any supposition could be entertained of an objection on the part of the honourable court, to the transactions of the house generally with the Nizam's government. Such an objection having been signified, it must be construed to extend (though possibly with some strain of interpretation) even to such an assurance from the minister, as is above alluded to; consequently you are not to sanction, in future, any transaction involving his intervention, however restrictively. The Governor-General in Council requests that you will inform yourself, as minutely as may be, respecting the effects of the late loan from the house of Wm. Palmer and Co. to the Nizam's government, and that you will report in what degree the satisfaction of the sovereign, the convenience of the government, and the comfort of the people, have been promoted by it. To this exposition, you will be pleased to add, in your view, how far the interests of the hon. Company may have been affected, advantageously or otherwise, by these results."

From the contents of the three letters to which he had referred, the following results were observable. These results he had put upon paper, and he was responsible for their correctness.

"1st. In the supreme government's despatch, there is a distinct declaration, that the Court of Directors' inhibition of all further pecuniary transactions between the house and the Nizam's government, was not meant to be confined to advances of money alone, and not to interfere with transactions purely commercial, although with the said government.

"2nd. Full testimony is borne to the thorough fairness of the dealings of the house, house, as far as was known to the Council up to this period.

"3d. The declaration is equally distinct, that no oblique impeachment of any part of its conduct was to be implied from the recall of the license.

"4th. An acknowledgement is recorded, that the Council was sensible of the advantage which the Nizam and his subjects had derived from the aid which had been furnished by Messrs. Palmer and Co.

"5th. It is distinctly admitted, that the minister's plighted faith for the fulfilment of all engagements, into which he had already entered with the house, was not meant by the court, or by the Council, to be in any way invalidated. Thus, in the latter passage, sanctioning the sentiments previously by Mr. Stuart and Mr. Adam.

"The two letters from Mr. Metcalf are fully confirmatory of the report which Mr. Russell had made on the first of September, of the beneficial effects from the loan, which was completed in August 1820, although the advances on account of it had been making from the preceding March. In the first of these despatches Mr. Metcalf announces:

"1st. That the Nizam's government had been undoubtedly relieved from much pecuniary embarrassment by the loan.

"2d. That it had been enabled to pay off large arrears.

"3d. That it enabled the minister to struggle through temporary difficulties and embarrassments, and might prove the means of greatly assisting the restoration of the prosperity of the country.

"4th. That the interests of the hon. Company had certainly not been affected disadvantageously by it.

"5th. That the comforts of the people did not appear to have been visibly promoted by it; but, that if the advantages to the cultivators have been honestly distributed, he concludes that good must have been done. He then adverts to the debt of the Nizam's government to Messrs. Palmer and Co., which, bearing high interest, he thinks it would be desirable to reduce; and he suggests, that, with the assistance of the British government, money might be raised on better terms elsewhere; for here," he adds, "without that guarantee, and, perhaps, even with it, money could not be procured by the Nizam on advantageous terms."

A Proprietor complained that the hon. gentleman was reading from his pamphlet.

The hon. D. Kninsaid said, that his printer (Mr. Davison) had, he was sure, inserted very correctly the matter which he had cut out of the large book. Before he touched on the effects produced by the loan, he wished to make a remark or two with respect to its reality. He understood it was taken for granted, that the loan was fictitious, on this account:—The money that was advanced on the account of the loan had been transferred to another account. This, however, was perfectly regular, at the commencement of the advance; and yet the loan was negotiating, those advances would be placed in one account, but when the loan was raised into effect, the whole of the advances would be regularly transferred to another book. When the entire loan was made good, then, of course, security must be given, for that account. The minister was prepared to give certain assignments, when he received the money; but it could not be advanced in one day: the payments must be made from day to day, as was the case with loans in this country. When the fifty-two lacs were made over, the house debited the minister in the loan account, and gave him credit in the account current for whatever sums they received. In this manner, the house wrote off fifty-two lacs' loan, and eight lacs' bonus, which they debited to the minister, on the loan account. He was bound to pay this fifty-two lacs, and an interest of 20½ per cent., in six years; and "then," said the minister, "I will return you back, as a proper compensation, eight lacs of rupees, without interest;" which he (the hon. D. Kninsaid) contended, was not worth, at the utmost, more than two lacs. On the 12th of July 1823, Sir C. Metcalf transmitted the accounts of Palmer and Co. to the government, which accounts he had received on the 19th of April preceding: of course, he had had them in his possession for three months; yet, in his despatch, he thus expressed himself:—"I have not detained these accounts to take copies of them, because I am anxious to receive, as soon as possible, the final orders of the hon. the Governor-General in Council, regarding them. If the sum reserved to meet possible retrenchments is eventually to be paid, it is obviously expedient that it should be paid as soon as possible, to relieve the Nizam's government from the interest chargeable on it. I beg the favour of your returning these accounts, to be copied here, or sending me copies from your office." The job was no light one, being about 300 pages of accounts. On the 27th of July, the accounts arrived in Calcutta, accompanied by a very short letter; in the commencement of which Sir C. Metcalf stated, that "neither the accounts nor the explanation convey much information. It was not to be expected, that Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. would disclose any thing that they could conceal." In this letter Sir C. Metcalf again denounced the sixty-lac loan as a fictitious arrangement, and observed, "If these accounts are of little use in any other respect, they have rendered an important benefit, by the complete exposure of the deceit deceit and falsehood practised in that infamous transaction."—On the 31st of July, Mr. Fendall and Mr. Harrington recorded their disapprobation of the transactions between the house of Palmer and Co. and the Nizam; and, on the same day (the very day before Lord Amherst landed), the Secretary of government wrote to Sir C. Metcalf to close up the house, and to send home a despatch, detailing all that had been done. This proceeding took place before the arrival of Lord Amherst. He asked gentlemen to look narrowly at this case. Here was a commercial house, having money transactions to a large amount, and it was condemned and put down on assumptions, the fallacy of which any clerk would discover in five minutes, on reference to the accounts. (Hear, hear!) It would take months and years to set right the injury that had been inflicted on Messrs. Palmer and Co., in consequence of those assumptions; and he pledged himself to the truth and correctness of the accounts which had been so strangely misunderstood. From the month of February, up to the month of August, 1820, over and above the loan of fifty-two lacs, fifteen lacs were owing to the house of Palmer and Co., for which no security had been given; therefore, there was no balance of an unsanctioned nature charged as an advance to the forty lacs which had been paid on account of the loan. It might here be proper to notice a mistake which had been made by Sir C. Metcalf, and which he attributed to the Nizam's minister. Sir C. Metcalf said the minister had told him, that the amount of the loan, from the house of Palmer and Co. to the Nizam's government, was sixty-seven lacs of rupees; whereas Palmer and Co. had stated, that it only amounted to sixty lacs. This error arose from there being no word in the Persian language that specifically meant loan. The signification of the word used in speaking of a loan was really debt. And what did Sir Charles Metcalf argue from this? He contended that the minister had told a falsehood in saying that the loan amounted to sixty-seven lacs; when, in fact, the house declared that it was only sixty. But what the minister said was actually correct. He stated, not the mere amount of the loan, but the amount of the whole debt due to the house of Palmer and Co. The loan account was fifty-two lacs, and the debt due on account current was fifteen lacs, making exactly sixty-seven lacs. (Hear, hear!) In Sir C. Metcalf's despatch of the 5th of April 1821, he proposed a scheme for the reduction of the rate of interest of the public debt of the Nizam's government. He said, "there seem to me a mode in which, under his lordship's sanction, this object could be accomplished, with immense advantage to the Nizam's government, and with little, if any, inconvenience to our own. The most effectual mode which seems to me is, by opening the hon. Company's treasuries for the receipt of money on loan to the Nizam, under a guarantee from the Governor-General in Council, for the regular payment of the interest by half-yearly instalments, and the eventual payment of the principal at the convenience of the Nizam's government, or, if preferable, within a stated time." In this despatch Sir C. Metcalf offered to the Bengal government to borrow money, for the liquidation of the Nizam's debts. He suggested, and no doubt honestly, that the government might raise a loan at the presidency, for the discharge of those debts, at an interest of six per cent.; but, unfortunately, he forgot that he proceeded to the Nizam's country for the purpose of preventing the British government from interfering with the government of the Nizam. This was the policy which had always been adhered to by the Marquess of Hastings. Sir Charles Metcalf, however, proposed that project, and he endeavoured to remove the different objections which might be offered against the British government becoming a party concerned in this transaction. He said, "A virtual guarantee exists already with regard to the public debt of the Nizam's government; for, with the least interference in his Highness's affairs, it is impossible that the British Resident can tolerate or sanction any breach of faith towards the public creditors." Now, it did happen, that Sir Charles Metcalf himself was the unfortunate instrument of making it possible, by interfering with the transactions of the house of Palmer and Co. He then proceeded, in this despatch, to consider what would be the effect of a loan to the Nizam's government for six years; and he, incidentally, mentioned this eight lac bonus, against which he made not the slightest objection at that time. Speaking of the whole finances of the Nizam's country, he did not express the least dislike of the bonus. He observed, that if the loan were taken out of the hands of Palmer and Co., they ought not to be allowed to suffer any loss or disappointment, in consequence of their having given very important relief to the native government's necessities." (Hear, hear!) These sentiments and views formed a remarkable contrast with the sentiments and views of Sir C. Metcalf twelve months afterwards. This proposition was discussed in council at considerable length; and the objection urged against it was, that it was illegal. Mr. Stuart did not take that view of it. It was referred to the Advocate-General, and he determined that the money could not be advanced, consistently with the appropriation clause. Mr. Stuart then made a most remarkable suggestion, which had had not been treated with great respect by the law officers of this country. By the appropriation clause, the surplus revenue was to be employed in a particular way: the lending of any of that revenue was prohibited. "But," said Mr. Stuart, "it is not clear that we have a surplus; but, supposing we have not, cannot we borrow a little money, for the purpose of making an advance to the Nizam?" The Act of Parliament did not, of course, give any directions for the conduct of government, when there was no surplus; but it said, "when you have a surplus, lay it out in such a manner." But Mr. Stuart advised the government, in the absence of a surplus, to borrow the money. This was in truth a most ingenious device for escaping from and defeating the act. However, though Mr. Stuart's opinion was opposed to that of the law officers, Mr. Adam most ignorantly concurred in its propriety. The proposal contained in Sir C. Metcalf's despatch of the 31st of April, appeared to have been rejected by a majority of the council; and a proposition of Mr. Fendall, for the absolute purchase or redemption of the peishcush, or annual payment of seven lacs, by the British government to the Nizam, on account of the Northern Circars, in order to furnish a large sum of money to the Nizam's minister, appeared to have been the subject of discussion and of reference to the Advocate-General, in the months of June, July, and August. It was ultimately rejected, on account of its questionable legality, with reference to the appropriation clause of the 53d of Geo. III. The Marquess of Hastings declared, that such a proceeding appeared to him to be contrary to the act of parliament; and the law officers were of the same opinion. They said, "You cannot purchase this peishcush, even when your charter is at an end, it ought to be in existence; you have no right to put it up for sale; at the expiration of your charter, you may be called on for this peishcush." The Marquess of Hastings was most anxious to afford the guarantee called for, if he could do so without infringing the act of parliament, or departing from that line of policy which he had all along pursued. A letter arrived from the Court of Directors some time after these discussions, in which they stated that they were sorry the money had not been lent; and then the Marquess of Hastings wished to mortgage the peishcush, and thus to raise the money without disobeying the act of parliament. During the months of June and July, and until this letter arrived from the Court of Directors, it was suggested that the noble Marquess acted most pertinaciously in refusing to lend the sum required from the treasury; and those who were hostile to him, came to the ungenerous conclusion, that he pursued this course to benefit

Messrs. W. Palmer and Co., because the longer the loan remained in their hands, the greater would be their advantage. The house, it was said, were making inordinate profits by the loan, and that, therefore, the noble Marquess would not advance money to pay it off. It was a strange thing to observe how persons changed their minds, when they were intent on effecting any particular object, especially if it were to hunt down a character. The motive he had just mentioned, was that which was said to have influenced Lord Hastings in 1821; but, in 1822, when a proposition was made by the minister for the reduction of the debt, it was then made matter of reproach, that the house wanted to be paid off. In writing on the subject of the house of Palmer and Co., Sir C. Metcalf seemed to have set down his ideas, just as they had risen in his head; and really and truly, when he came before that court, there was no man who ever had a right to feel so much ashamed of the publication of his correspondence. He wished Sir C. Metcalf no harm, but he would say, that he never saw such trash (for such he must call it) as that gentleman had sent forth. It was certainly the greatest trash ever written by any man who had arrived at years of discretion. Sir Charles Metcalf, after he was appointed to the residency at Hyderabad, went up the country for some months; and here he must make a very serious charge against that individual. He felt the deep responsibility he incurred, when he took upon himself to comment on the public acts of public men; and he should deeply regret, if he put one unfair, strained, or ungenerous construction upon any circumstance to which he might advert. The letters of Sir C. Metcalf, however, spoke so plainly to his mind, that he would be a coward if he did not openly state the conclusion which he had been led to form. If he strained one point; if he could not establish an incontrovertible reason for Sir C. Metcalf's change of sentiments and opinions; if he could not assign a cause for the violence of those passions, which no man could deny he felt at the time he penned those letters, he would be content to undergo the censure of not being capable of discharging that duty which he had undertaken. He must lay a ground for this extraordinary change of opinion, or he could not hold up his head in that court. He would shew, that, acting under the guidance of his passion, Sir C. Metcalf had been guilty of much misrepresentation; and he thought that gentleman would, before he went to his grave, regret that he had ever written those letters. He gave Sir C. Metcalf credit for those honourable feelings which, when his passions had subsided, would induce him to take himself to task, as he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) under similar circumstances would would do. He did not say that Sir C. Metcalf's conduct had originated in any plan, but it had plunged the house of Palmer and Co. in headlong ruin, in defiance of the written orders of his government. He had got into a scrape, and, perhaps, such was the force of passion, he might have believed that he was advocating the cause of truth, when he was stating that which was fallacious. He (the hon. D. Kinnaird) was acting under a most serious responsibility, and he would say, that he would hate himself, that he would cut off his hand, or stick a dagger in his heart, rather than he would plant a pain in the breast of another, except for a straight-forward public purpose. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Rigby rose to order. The hon. proprietor was about to bring another charge against Sir C. Metcalf, which, he contended, was not consistent with order. It was the most unfair thing that any gentleman could do, to make a new charge, at the conclusion of a debate, when the privilege of speaking in opposition to it was at an end. This, however, was the hon. proprietor's object.

The hon. D. Kinnaird.—I waive the privilege of concluding the debate.

The Chairman.—Am I to understand that the hon. proprietor is about to make a charge against Sir C. Metcalf?

The hon. D. Kinnaird.—No, sir.

The Chairman.—The hon. proprietor says he is not, and I am happy to hear it.

The hon. D. Kinnaird said, he was going to explain the reasons for that change of mind which Sir C. Metcalf had manifested. He wished to shew why that gentleman had latterly viewed, with a jaundiced eye, the same transaction which he had before looked at in a very different manner. He would first draw the attention of the court to the early letter which Sir C. Metcalf had written, when he had executed the disagreeable duty of announcing to the house of Palmer and Co. the order of the Court of Directors for the cessation of the Arungabad contract. On the 5th of July, Sir C. Metcalf reported his execution of the orders transmitted, which he appeared to have obeyed by duly communicating an extract of the despatch he had received. A remarkable change now took place in Sir C. Metcalf's manner of viewing this business. He saw, in a different light, every thing that related to the house of Palmer and Co. His opinions presented a striking contrast to those contained in his despatches of March and April 1821, on the very same subjects, previous to his expedition through the provinces of the Nizam's country. When he received the Court of Directors' orders, in March 1821, for the recall of the license, he had not hesitated to transmit to Calcutta a long series of comments on the unfitness of those commands; and to point out the impossibility of the court's having meant them to be literally executed, when they knew that all the transactions of the house had received the sanction of the supreme government. So strongly had he felt, and so clearly had he demonstrated the outrageous injustice of the concluding paragraph of that memorable mandate; that he found it necessary to terminate his despatch with the following disclaimer: "In these crude remarks, herein submitted, I offer the result of my local observation; without, of course, meaning to discuss the propriety of the restrictive orders issued by the honourable Court of Directors." In the justice of these comments, both Mr. Adam and Mr. Stuart were concerned; they both distinctly recorded their own opinion, that the Court of Directors could not mean to interfere with transactions which had taken place under the sanction of government. It is consequence of the very abrupt manner in which Sir C. Metcalf now thought it proper to perform his official duty, a letter was addressed by Mr. J. Palmer to the Council at Calcutta, in which he set forth the ruinous consequences which must befall the house of W. Palmer and Co. if they were compelled immediately to terminate their arrangements with the Nizam's minister. In this letter Mr. J. Palmer said—"Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. feel the singular severity of not only having their engagements suddenly cancelled, under denounced penalties, to such amongst them as are obnoxious to the statute; but the guarantees on which they rested for security in their dealings with the Nizam's government, are wrested from them, and they are left to realize or recover their advances to his highness's troops how they may." At this time near a million of money, the property of different constituents of the house, was placed in the hands of the Nizam's government. They had no longer any guarantees for it, but were depending solely upon the good faith of Chundoo Loll. In consequence of this letter, the Council, on the 17th of July, transmitted directions to the Resident, at Hyderabad. In that letter it was first stated, that the Court of Directors "distinctly expressed a desire, that the execution of the measures which they have felt it their duty to prevent, with relation to the firm of Palmer and Co., shall be so regulated as not to injure the credit of the house;" and the Governor-General went on to direct, "That Sir C. Metcalf shall formally apprise Rajah Chundoo Loll, that the tenour of the court's orders, referred only to pecuniary transactions between the house and the Nizam." His lordship added—"The Governor-General in Council thinks it probable that you (Sir C. Metcalf) have represented to the minister the obligation on his honour and good faith, to make as early payment of the balances due on the unadjusted accounts (the Aurangabad and Hyderabad accounts) of the house, which have been ordered to be brought to a close, as the paramount exigencies of the state will admit; for the honourable court has expressly defined its notion of a close to the arrangement, to consist in the restoration of the tankas, by the house of W. Palmer and Co. as soon as the advances made by that firm on the Aurangabad account shall have been repaid. That degree of interposition, as referring to arrangements made before the receipt of the positive inhibition from home, will be equally consonant to the pleasure of the honourable court, and the disposition of the Governor-General in Council." In his reply to this reproof, Sir C. Metcalf appeared to have been no longer able to restrain within his own bosom, the hostile feelings which he now entertained towards W. Palmer and Co. He did not hesitate, in a tone full of flippant disrespect to the council, and full of malicious insinuation against the house, to assure the government they need be under no apprehension of the minister's not fulfilling his engagements to them, for that every pressing demand in that country, was postponed to the interests; "and that he has observed, ever since he came to Hyderabad, a persuasion of their power and influence, which will continue to ensure them every possible advantage." This was the first insinuation thrown out against the house of Palmer and Co., and it would be as well in this place to expose at once the cause of this new hostility, and the intrigue, in the defeat of which it had its origin. On Sir C. Metcalf's return, in the month of May, from his second tour, the Assistant-resident (Lieut. Barnett), he stated, met him at one or two marches from Hyderabad, and informed him that he (Lieut. B.) had, a few days before, received a note from Chundoo Loll, the contents of which he described to him. This note (to be found at page 174 of the Hyderabad papers) contained a proposal to borrow thirty-five lacs of rupees from the British government, at a low rate of interest, in order to pay off a part of the minister's debt to Messrs. W. Palmer and Co.; and contained an able and powerful remonstrance or appeal against Sir C. (then Mr.) Metcalf's whole course of open and direct interference in the internal government of the country, which the minister therein expressly stated to have been written for the information of, and for the purpose of being forwarded to, the supreme government of Calcutta. Sir C. Metcalf desired Lieut. Barnett to make him a report on the subject. And that was the only passage which was omitted in it? That which was the most material: the concluding part, in which the wish of Chundoo Loll to have his representation transmitted to the Governor-General, was expressed. A copy of this note the minister (having in vain waited two months for a compliance with his request) forwarded, through Mr. W. Palmer, in a letter addressed by himself to the Governor-General in Council. Sir C. Metcalf learned from Lieut. Barnett, that the note had been delivered to him shortly after an interview between the minister and Messrs. W. Palmer and Co.; and Sir C. Metcalf's suspicions were immediately carried towards those gentlemen, as the instigators of the proceeding. Lieut. Barnett could not have failed, at the same time, to point out to Sir C. Metcalf, some of the immediate effects of his arbitrary interference in the settlement of the country, on the credit and station of the minister. He must have informed the Resident what was well known throughout the country, that the minister was distracted—that all his arrangements had been broken through by Sir C. Metcalf; and that, in consequence, he was in despair. Sir C. Metcalf expected no such event as, that a native minister should dare to appeal to the Governor in Council against an agent of the British Government. At this time Chundoo Loll had been reduced to a cypher in the eyes of his countrymen; and his downfall was now confidently anticipated by all the open and secret enemies of that influence which had alone raised him to his office—the very pedestal of his elevation had been removed from under him; he was no longer treated by the British Resident, as the minister of an independent ally; but was made to stand forth the degraded instrument of the subjugation and submission of his country, to the imperious delegate of a foreign power. It was only necessary to read Sir C. Metcalf's despatches, to perceive that he had considered himself invested with a full right and power to exercise a paramount and despotic authority in the Nizam's country. In utter contempt of the instructions of Mr. Russell, his predecessor, (transmitted, too, by himself, whilst secretary to the government,) that the Resident's interference should be confined solely to advice and influence with the minister, he had proceeded at once to the direct exercise of sovereign power, by making new assessments all over the country, and by appointing and permitting his young officers to break through the assessments recently made by the minister himself. Throughout the whole of his despatches Sir C. Metcalf repeatedly declared to the Governor-General in Council, that he had the sanction of Chundoo Loll for every thing he did—and by this means he lulled the Government into an acquiescence in various acts, which they otherwise would not have suffered. What a position had he placed himself in ? What could he say for himself? He had gone on so far, that he could not recede; and he observed, that "on being made acquainted with the contents of the note, he thought it was right to determine what course he should pursue." Why, could any Resident entertain a doubt as to the course he should pursue? Had he not the positive instructions of the service of which he was a member, which made it his imperative duty to transmit to Calcutta the complaint against himself, together with his own commentary, or justification of it? He, however, would venture to say, that the representation of the minister was in direct contradiction to the statement of Sir C. Metcalf, and that was the reason why he deliberated on what course he was to pursue. He seemed to have determined for the present, to conceal from the government both the remonstrance of the minister, and the effects of his infraction of the Governor-General's recorded instructions for his guidance. He took, however, a good deal of time, to choose his course; for it was not till the 20th June, that he announced to the Governor-General in Council, his return to Hyderabad. His letter afforded the strongest evidence of the intrigue in which he had resolved to embark; or, in other words, of the course he meant to pursue. In that letter he did not mention any part of the note from Chundoo Loll, which related to the appeal, but he incidentally noticed the proposition for borrowing thirty-five lacs of rupees. At this time he could not but feel, that the members of the house of Palmer and Co. the only Europeans in the Nizam's country, who were not dependent on his smiles or frowns, were very inconvenient witnesses of any fact he might wish to conceal from, or to place in an unfavourable light to the eye of the Government at Calcutta. He must have known that the intelligence of Palmer and Co. must have perceived the striking difference between his conduct, and that of his predecessor, Mr. Russell; and he must have been convinced, from the intimate dealings they had with the minister, that they could not but be acquainted with the effects which his assumption of power had produced on Chundoo Loll. The intimidation of the minister into a blind submission, was not, under such circumstances, to be hoped. But then he might be removed; and he (Mr. Kinnaird) could adduce conclusive evidence, to prove, that it was intended to dismiss Chundoo Loll, and to place Moonsee-ool Moolk in his situation. Now it was very important to Palmer and Co. that Chundoo Loll should remain in office; for they knew very well, that, if he were removed, his successor would not keep such good faith as he had done. As the members of the house of Palmer and Co.

were the only Europeans at the residency, whose situation in life did not depend on Sir C. Metcalf, and as he knew they must be able to give decisive evidence as to his proceedings, he took measures for the destruction of their credit, and of their eventual testimony, in favour of any statement which might be at variance with the views of the Resident. An attack must therefore be made on them, and he charged those individuals with an attempt, to do what? To remove him from the residency. His remarkable letter, of the 20th June, 1822, is drawn up for the purpose of exciting prejudice against Messrs. Palmer and Co. He repeated his thrice-told tale of the abuses in the internal administration of the districts of the Nizam's country; and, as if he had been the first to point out the disease, he seemed to suppose that he alone should propose and apply the remedy. But this subject had been frequently noticed in the statesmanlike communication of Mr. Russell. Had he examined the papers in his office, he would have discovered that the Government of Calcutta had been made fully acquainted with the state of the country, and that the final consummation of the evil had been equally foreseen and foretold. He would have learned, that it had been deliberately resolved, that such consummation, come when it might, should not be hastened by any direct British interference in the administration of the country, and that the Resident's efforts should be confined (as they had been by Mr. Russell) to the exercise of his advice and influence through the minister, so long as the tranquillity of the country could in any manner be prolonged. In this letter, he, for the first time, insinuated, rather than directly stated, that he met with some want of co-operation from Chundoo Loll; but he insisted strongly on the absolute necessity of the continuance of that intervention of advice and influence which His Excellency the Governor-General had authorized for the welfare of the country; and then boasted of the beneficial effects of his own measures, as if his interference had been limited by, or were in conformity with, those instructions. In the 17th paragraph, he informed the government, in his own peculiarly gossiping style, that "it is reported that the Nizam is disgusted with his minister, Chundoo Loll." Why, he knew very well that the Nizam never liked him—that Chundoo Loll was minister in spite of him—and that to drive him away, was one of the first objects of his heart. In the next paragraph he forced the nominal minister Moonsee-ool Moolk, the rival of Chundoo Loll, upon the attention of the Governor-General in a false and favourable point of view; and he followed up his panegyric, with an attack, in contrast, upon Chundoo Loll. He then came ... to the minister's alleged concealment, and he has incidentally mentioned one of the subjects of the minister's note, namely, the proposal to borrow thirty-five lakhs. But he carefully abstained from noticing the latter, and by far the most important part of that note, the direct remonstrance of the minister to the Governor-General in Council, against the Resident's assumption of an undue power. (Hear !). Was this doing his duty to those by whom he was employed ? Thus was he practising disingenuously with the government, at the very moment he was endeavouring to ruin those whom, by every tie of honour he was bound to protect from misrepresentation and misfortune. (Hear !). To the Resident's letter of the 20th of June, the supreme government replied on the 22d of July. In that despatch, the following passages would be found :— " The Governor General in Council observes, that the points submitted in your despatch, are too numerous and important to admit of immediate decision, but they will be taken into deliberate consideration hereafter. The only point to which his Lordship in Council deems it necessary to advert on the present occasion, is that stated in the 22d paragraph of your despatch, viz. the minister's professed anxiety to pay off the loan, and the mode he proposes of accomplishing it. His Lordship in Council concludes, that in an affair of such moment, the minister will have submitted his proposition to you in writing ; and, in that case, his Lordship in Council will be glad to receive a copy of the paper in which it was conveyed." Having already concealed the minister's note, containing both the proposal for the loan and the remonstrance, he was, of course, compelled to elude a compliance with the above orders. In no one of the following despatches, therefore, though he wrote to Calcutta on the 1st, 9th, and 31st of August, did he allude to, much less, act in obedience of, the Governor-General's direction. It was not until after the last despatch had been written, that he learned that the note had, through Mr. Palmer, reached the hands of the Governor-General in Council. On the 8th of September, eight days after the last despatch, when he found that further silence could avail nothing, he, with apparent carelessness, stated, in reply to the letter of the 19th of July, that the proposition for the loan had been included in a note addressed to one of his assistants—which note he believed to be in the government's hands, among the papers clandestinely transmitted by Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. His position was a desperate one, when the murder came out on the 31st of August. His only resource now, was to persuade the government that Chundoo Loll and the house of Palmer and Co. were in a league to conspire, himself, and Smith, to depose himself. On the 31st of August he found he was discovered—he found that his withholding the note had become known—and he determined, if possible, to have Chundoo Loll removed, and also to break down the house of Palmer and Co. It was really at once acquiring and disgusting, to watch the contents of the Resident's despatches from the 20th of June to the 31st of August. There was not one of them which did not contain unfavourable insinuations against the minister, and the house of Palmer and Co. He would now read Sir C. Metcalf's despatch of the 9th of August 1822—and if it did not shew a settled and fixed design to oust Chundoo Loll from his situation, he never was so much mistaken in the course of his life. The letter, which rendered the intrigue plain and palpable, ran thus :—

" To G. Swinton, Esq., Secretary to Government, Fort-William.

" Sir :—Some days ago, the nominal prime minister of the Nizam's court, Nawab Mooneer-ool Moolk sent me a message, saying, that he had been directed by his highness to wait on me, and adding a complimentary intimation of the gratification which he derived from that order. I returned the reply usual on such occasions, expressive of the happiness which I should have in seeing him, and he came the next day. A visit of this kind from the Dewan was so unusual, if not unprecedented, since the nomination of the present minister, that it naturally attracted much attention. Hajah Chundoo Loll considered that it was meant as an attack on his power, and was much alarmed. He gave me notice of it previously to Mooneer-ool Moolk's message, but added a different account of the cause, for he informed me that the Nawab had persuaded the Nizam, that he had been invited by me. When Mooneer-ool Moolk came, after some common complimentary conversation, he apprized me that he had been sent by the Nizam to inquire how matters stood, with regard to the interchange of territory between his highness and the British government, especially as to whether or not further cessions would be required from his highness. I replied, that there was a balance against his highness, arising out of the excess of revenue which he had received, compared with what he had expended, and that I hoped the matter would soon be adjusted to his highness's satisfaction. This being the whole of the commission with which Mooneer-ool Moolk professed to be charged, he went on to talk of other matters on his own part. He spoke of our measures for the amelioration of the condition of the Nizam's subjects, and praised highly what had been done. He described also the Nizam's feelings on my conduct generally in such flattering terms, that if I could believe what what he said, I should be inclined to think any endeavours to carry into effect the benevolent intentions of the Governor-General in Council, had not been exerted in vain. But I need not point out how impossible it is to be sure that a native of India is speaking truth, when he has any object to effect. He used different terms, as was to be expected, with regard to Rajah Chundoo Loll, and dwelt particularly on the waste of the public resources in bribery, for the support of his power." Here (observed the hon. D. Kinnaird) was a partner of Chundoo Loll, one of his colleagues in the government, described as slandering his brother minister. The letter proceeded:—"He (Mooneer-ool Moolk) said, that the whole of the Nizam's family were bribed; and of his own, he declared, not only that every servant that he had was in Chundoo Loll's pay, but that even his own mother-in-law sent that minister a daily account of the occurrences of the inmost recesses of his (Mooneer-ool Moolk's) house. (Laughter.) Of the general truth of what he said on this subject I have no doubt, having always received similar information from various quarters. During his discourse on the state of the country, I availed myself of the opportunity to endeavour to impress on his mind, with a view also to its possible communication to the Nizam, a correct notion of the real nature, object, and extent of our interference in the affairs of his government. I knew that reports, exactly such as, under such circumstances, might be expected, had gone abroad, of our present measures being only a prelude to taking entire possession of the country as a British possession." To be sure (said the hon. D. Kinnaird) Sir C. Metcalf must have been aware of the reports that have gone abroad, owing to the conduct he was pursuing through the country. Such reports did prevail, under his residentship, though they were never heard of under that of Mr. Russell. The letter went on in this manner:—"I therefore explained to him that our actual interposition was precisely with an opposite view, and, in order to save the Nizam from such a result, which, in the way in which ruin was proceeding, would have been inevitable. I farther explained, that as soon as any assurance could be obtained that oppression would cease, our interference would be immediately relinquished, as unnecessary and useless. I have repeatedly held out the same pledge to Rajah Chundoo Loll, when he has offered temporary opposition to measures which I have recommended as essential; and I hope to see the day when this pledge may be safely redeemed. I hold the same language to all persons who communicate with me on the subject, in anticipation of the suspicions which, without interference, the natives of India are universally inclined to entertain, judging from the events of our history, without being able to discern their cause. This visit from Mooneer-ool Moolk has doubtless been considered as the commencement of an intrigue against Chundoo Loll. From the alarm which it produced in the mind of the latter, he must have entertained a similar apprehension. I have endeavoured to persuade him, that he has no reason to dread any serious consequences. One of his observations was remarkable:—"What can Mr. Metcalf do, however much inclined to support me, if the Nizam himself proposes my dismissal?" This was before Mooneer-ool Moolk's visit; and it seems that Chundoo Loll must have apprehended that such a communication from the Nizam was in contemplation. My own belief is, that this fear is without ground; and I am happy to say, that Mooneer-ool Moolk did not hint, in the most distant manner, at the probability of the Nizam's entertaining such an intention. Mooneer-ool Moolk has since informed me, by message, that the Nizam was much pleased with the assurances which our conversation had enabled him to carry to his Highness, of my attachment to his Highness's interests, and of the friendly disposition of the British government. That the Nizam expressed much gratification at Mooneer-ool Moolk's communication of the result of his visit, I hear, also, from other quarters; but why he should particularly be so I know not, for there was nothing in my communication to Mooneer-ool Moolk, which his Highness might not have heard long ago through Chundoo Loll: I am uncertain, therefore, as to what I may infer from this information;" and then came, "I have the honour," &c. (A-laugh.) Why, he asked, was this letter written? Was it not evidently to prepare the government for the contemplated introduction of Mooneer-ool Moolk, who was to be one of the Resident's creatures, in the place of Chundoo Loll? The latter minister acknowledged obedience only to the British government; but he would not bow to the capricious exercise of authority in the hands of an irresponsible representative. That this visit of Mooneer-ool Moolk at Hyderabad was purposely brought about by Sir C. Metcalf, no rational man could doubt. He was himself conscious of the necessity of this conclusion, and, therefore, he had made the remark, "that the visit has doubtless been considered as the commencement of an intrigue against Chundoo Loll." Ultimately, on the 31st of August, in that apparently rambling, but really designing despatch, he proved, in the fifty-seventh paragraph, his eager anticipation of the dismissal of Chundoo Loll, by asking the government, "whether, in the event of the Nizam proposing such a measure to him, he is to receive the intimation favourably, or otherwise." (Hear!) This the disputed language conclusion in the mind of the Resident. In the 31st paragraph of the same despatch, he had given it as his opinion, "that the conduct best suited to the circumstances, would be to await the good-will of the Nizam himself, in preference to any of his servants." That he should have based such an opinion, after the character which he had himself given of the Nizam, and which his predecessors had also drawn of that individual, could only be accounted for, by referring it to the ulterior object which he had in view, namely, the removal of Chundoo Loll. No one could doubt, that he held the minister's dismissal to be certain, conscious as he was, that it only required a hint to be conveyed to the Nizam, to cause the proposition for the minister's removal to be made at once. From the thirty-third to the thirty-sixth paragraph of the same despatch, he dwelt on the probable removal of Chundoo Loll, and threw out a variety of speculations on the result of that event. The concluding paragraph was very remarkable, and required particular notice. He there said, "I have this day received intelligence of a very extraordinary nature, which induces me to transmit it (this despatch) without correction, and without delay, lest the additions and alterations I might make to it, should receive a bias from that intelligence." (Hear, hear!) Now, what was the information which induced the Resident to send off his despatch, in such a hurry, for fear his mind might receive a bias, that would lead him to distort the facts, or falsify the conclusions of the paper which he had just penned? The information, then, was, that the note of the minister, which he had most improperly kept back from the Governor-General, in defiance of his instructions and his duty, had been transmitted directly to the government. The important intelligence was, that the minister had thought proper to appeal from the Resident to the judgment of his masters. Under these circumstances, he demanded, whether Sir C. Metcalf could be considered a fair and unbiassed historian, or a just and impartial evidence in this case? (Hear!) It would scarcely be believed, so passionately—so violently did Sir C. Metcalf write on this subject. Such was the state of mind in which he penned his reports of the 31st of August and the 3d of September, that he was obliged, on the 5th of September, to write the following short letter, to correct a mistake he had made, in his despatch of the 31st of August, respecting the regulations which had been laid down for the guidance of the Resident in the performance of his duties:—

"To G. Swinton, Esq. Secretary to government, Fort William.—Sir, I hasten to correct a mistake into which I have fallen in my report of the 31st ult. I observed therein, that I had not forwarded my opinion respecting the removal of the Minister, giving my support to the Minister Chundoo Loll. I have this instant met with a despatch, under my own signature, conveying very explicit instructions on that point." (Hear, hear!) and I wonder how it before escaped my notice and recollection. (Hear!) I hope that the Governor-General in Council will excuse this inadvertency." (Hear!)—Sir C. Metcalf had, at that period, been nearly two years the representative of the British government at the Nizam's court. During that time, he had undertaken a most offensive, direct interference in the internal government of the country,—a conduct at once opposed to that of his predecessor and at variance with the orders of the supreme government, penned and communicated by himself; and, at the expiration of that period, he confessed that he had never given himself the trouble to ascertain the first and most important duty of his office.—(Hear!)—the very foundation on which his conduct towards the Nizam's minister was to be constructed. (Hear!) That minister, he had admitted, was the most capable man in the kingdom, and through him he had been told to work out the objects for which he himself was sent to Hyderabad. But, instead of following his instructions, he endeavoured to supplant the minister. (Hear!) After three days reflection on the intelligence that the minister's note had been transmitted to the Governor-General in Council, the Resident, on the 3rd of Sept. resumed his correspondence. In his letter he observed, that "he has long been aware of a plot hostile to him and his proceedings, one part of which has been to persuade the minister, that he (the Resident) was inimical to him, and that he must look elsewhere for support." He then entered into a long story of his having called on the minister to account for his conduct; and, by his own account, he appeared to have so frightened the poor man, that he stated him to have put up his hands in a beseeching attitude, and to have prayed to the great man to forgive him. (A laugh!) He made the minister to say a great many things, which he adroitly declared he believed to be true or not, as best suited his purpose. He placed in the minister's mouth, insinuations against Palmer and Co., and made him accuse them as the real authors of the letter and its transmittal. He said he talked four hours with the frightened minister; that there was, however, more good humour on his own part, than the minister expected, and that he told the minister jocularly, "he never could forgive the trick he had played him, and that the matter went off with a laugh on both sides." The letter concluded with the following half-threatening paragraph:—

"Much

...I may hereafter, have many observations to make on the subject of this letter; but I await your intimation of the commands of His Excellency the Governor-General in Council, regarding the communications of Rajah Chundoo Loll through Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. The mode in which they have been received, will either render necessary a very disagreeable detail, or will relieve me from that necessity. It will also decide, to Chundoo Loll's conviction, what his conduct shows at present to be doubtful in his mind; i. e. whether the Resident or the firm of Wm. Palmer and Co. be the real representative of the British government, at this court." At this time the Resident found that he had got into a straight and he was determined to get out of it in some way or other. He therefore proceeded to attack with great vigour, both the house and the minister. He called on the court to examine the despatches from this day forth; and, if they found any one dispassionate statement with respect to the character of Chundoo Loll, or the views of the house of Palmer and Co., he would be content to be set down as having invented a tissue of falsehoods. Now it was that he and the proprietors could account for the extraordinary change in the sentiments and conduct of Sir C. Metcalf. Before he went up the country, his opinions were very different from those which he held when he returned to Hyderabad. He had been acting in an arbitrary way by interfering with the minister's arrangements. The minister had in consequence appealed to the Governor-General; when Sir C. Metcalf learned the fact, he considered that Chundoo Loll had got too many, and too respectable witnesses of his conduct; and, therefore, he determined, if possible, to ruin Messrs. Palmer and Co. and to drive Chundoo Loll from his situation. He (the hon. D. Kinnaird) was thoroughly satisfied of the truth of this reasoning; and he would willingly rest on the judgment of his country. He had placed his sentiments on record. They were in print before the public; and those who read them could easily decide, whether he advanced sincerely, or whether he stated truths, and drew from them incontrovertible deductions. For his own part, he thought he had clearly demonstrated the causes which led to the hostility that had been manifested by the Resident against the house of Palmer and Co. Conscious of the purity of his intentions, he was willing hereafter to be respected as the judgment of his country might approve or disapprove of his decision. He did not wish to press harder than was necessary upon the individual whose conduct he arraigned. When placed in a critical situation, would often do much which they had not originally even thought of. This was, too often the case when persons were raised to a high degree of power, and had not a friend about them to encourage them when they were doing right, or to point out to them the evil of their conduct when they were led away to the perpetration of wrong. In answer to the letters which he had referred to, the Governor-General in Council had written, he must say, a most paternal reproof. He alluded to the despatch of the 25th of October 1822; he there showed, very clearly, where the Resident was wrong in his proceedings—he pointed out the policy which, under existing promises and treaties, ought to have been observed towards the Nizam's government; but, looking to the Resident's former conduct, he declared that he still retained his (the Governor-General's) fullest confidence. The Governor-General, in treating of the connexion between the Nizam and the British government, adopted the maxim, "to do a great right, do a little wrong;" and, in the whole of his despatch, he took a very masterly view of the matter contained in the previous letters of Sir C. Metcalf. He censured, in some degree, Mr. Wm. Palmer, for having, situated as he was, transmitted the despatch of Chundoo Loll; but it was difficult to say, by what other channel the complaint of Chundoo Loll, against a person wielding enormous power, could have reached the Governor-General. With respect to the question relative to the support which should be given to Chundoo Loll, the Governor-General showed, very clearly, that the Resident had wholly forgotten the treaty or agreement under which that support was promised. He (the hon. D. Kinnaird) thought he had pointed out the ground on which the Bengal government had lent too ready an ear to the representations of Sir Charles Metcalf. He had, by many specious statements, lulled the suspicions of the government; and he had then, with impunity, attacked men whose characters were estimable, both in public and in private life. For his own part, he must say, that he would willingly change his character now, and for the future, with Mr. Russell, with Sir Wm. Rumbold, or with Mr. Wm. Palmer, so far as their papers were indicative of the conduct which they had pursued. He challenged the reasoning of Mr. Smart, and those who had adopted his opinions; but he hoped it would not be supposed, that he meant to assert, that those individuals had not discharged many duties that were serviceable to the Company; he believed they had, and he believed also, they were perfectly capable of performing all their duties in life, when peculiar circumstances were not arrayed against them. He wished not and to the "impudence" of any man; he did not let his reflections on the Court of Directors, for their proceedings;

 it was not his habit to measure time to him.
 He never did, and he never would, seek to inculcate any individual by hint and insinuation. An honest gentleman (Mr. Fresh-field) had said; that, to gain a point in debate, he (the hon. D. Kinnaird) had opened with great skill and dexterity. Now, he would put it to any unprejudiced person, whether it was possible to charge him justly with having used any unbecoming skill or dexterity on the occasion. (Hear, hear!) He had introduced the question in that way which he thought was most likely to prevent irritation. He saw the hon.
 Chairman looking at the clock; but, if he spoke till twelve o'clock that night, he would, offer all the remarks which had occurred to him on this question, even if only half a dozen proprietors remained to hear him. Now, with respect to the hon.
 gentleman who accused him of dexterous management, he would ask what his conduct had been? The first anxiety displayed by that hon. gentleman, who had shewn himself to be Mr. Adam's friend, was, to know whether there were any papers before the court, connected with Mr.
 Adam's case? It was answered in the negative; but, as this did not suit the hon.
 gentleman's purpose, the Chairman was dexterous enough to read the papers alluded to, in his own speech. If the hon.
 Chairman could make a point, he certainly had a right to do so. At the same time, he thought it was a strange proceeding, to publish the opinions which had been read.
 Now, how were these opinions obtained?
 Why, by laying before council a heap of papers, without pointing out any specific charge that was to be founded on them.
 "Here," said the directors, "is a lot of papers—cannot you found a conspiracy, or some other charge upon their contents?" The learned berjeant (Bosanquet) whom they consulted, was not now in court; but he must say, that the Directors had acted very unfairly towards him, and towards the Attorney-General.
 He knew the opinion of the latter gentleman, because he had had some conversation with him on the subject. He (the hon. D. Kinnaird) thought that, when it was stated that no legal measures could be taken with respect to these transactions, that they were not cognizable in a court of law, the production of these opinions was exceedingly objectionable. The Attorney-General himself felt precisely in the same manner. When counsel stated their opinion, that no law proceedings could be instituted in a given case, he considered that it was shutting the door against any further consideration of the subject, and they adopted expressions more freely and more easily than they otherwise would do.

It was in fact, a question of the whole question, when counsel said, "You cannot go into a court of law on this case." What then was the use of publishing the opinions which had been read in the court? The council were opposed in opinion to the Directors; but the Chairman thought fit to introduce the words, and the reading of those learned gentlemen. "I have perused," said Mr. Ser-jeant Bosanquet, "nine volumes of papers," (a pretty large field for speculation, observed the hon. D. Kinnaird) "relating to the transactions of the house of Messrs.
 W. Palmer and Co with the Nagam's Government," and then the learned gent.
 proceeded to a detailed consideration of the transactions in question. The hon.
 Chairman on a former day stated that these legal opinions "fortified the Court of Directors in their decision." Fortified them in their decision! What decision?
 The court did not, in consequence of those opinions, come to any decision. Mr. Ser-jeant Bosanquet in his opinion of the 27th of Feb. 1824, said "I have read the papers sent to the Chairman by Sir W.
 Rumbold, and have also had an opportunity of looking at the accounts; but I have found no reason to alter my opinion, which I have already expressed, that a criminal imputation has been practised upon the British Government, by the house of W. Palmer and Co.; whether larger sums of money may or may not have been advanced between February and August 1820, to Chundoo Lall, than would have been advanced if the sanction of government to the pretended loan had not been expected, still I am of opinion that the sixty lac loan is a fictitious transaction, and a fraud. It cannot escape observation, that all the money advanced was debited to the Hyderabad account, which was a general account with the minister of two per cent. per mensem; whereas, the pretended sixty lac loan, professed to be made at 18 per cent., at which interest the advances should have been charged, if considered as anticipations of that loan, subject to the expected approval of government." It was charged upon these parties that they had concealed the bonus. This he contended was not true. (Hear, hear!) They had forwarded to the government the written communications which had passed between themselves and Chundoo Lall; and at the time that those communications were going on, they believed that they could raise the money on such terms as would enable them to lend at 18 per cent.
 They afterwards, in consequence of the loss they were sustaining, felt it necessary to change the terms; and he could shew letters from Mr. John Palmer at Calcutta, to Sir W. Rumbold, in the months of July and August, which proved that the firm were still endeavouring to raise money at the rate of 12 per cent. From those letters it would be seen that the security was so had in the eyes of the monied men at Calcutta, that they would not touch it on any terms; and their principal objection was, that they would not lend their money for a longer period than one year. In his letter of the 30th July, Mr. J. Palmer said, "I must speak to some of the monied Europeans, and see whether they will come forward with a few lacs; but I own a want of confidence in the result; although I should probably raise as large a sum at eight or nine per cent. as at twelve per cent.; neither do I believe any one will lend you for more than one year." Mr. Palmer went on to say—"But had you secured the whole loan at 12 per cent., I submit whether 18 per cent. if you have no latent advantage, can possibly compensate the anxieties, trouble, and concomitant expenses. But you require my aid and not my reflexions—I will do you all the good I can, be assured." The peculiarity of the loan was this—that it was to continue for six years, (the house, during that time, being subject to the claim of their constituents for their money back again) or to have it left in their hands, only on condition of receiving an increased interest. Palmer and Co. were to receive, under the altered terms, 20½ per cent.; and what was the security they had for their money? Why, they might go whistle for it, if the minister did not effect his promised reform. Well might Mr. J. Palmer say, in his letter to Sir W. Rumbold, of the 1st of August, 1820, "I confess the straits you are in, (if you are not humbugging me in point of some reservation) lead me to consider your project very ill digested, and of very little promise." He contended that there was no concealment on the part of the house; but in the case of the Aurungabad, and of the Berar Suwar accounts, the terms were known. When the accounts were sent for, the government were aware that those transactions bore an interest of 24 per cent. Why, then, should they suppose that the government would be dissatisfied at their lending money at 20½ per cent. when they had before advanced it at 24 per cent.? (Hear!) To the minister it was an object of no little importance, for very plain reasons, to have the credit among his enemies as well as his friends, of being able to borrow money at so low an interest as 18 per cent. It was not only a feather in his cap for the moment, but might be of essential service to him and his government at subsequent periods. While the altered terms were concealed from the sources, they would lend money at a less rate of interest. It was, therefore, politic on the part of the minister, not to make the alteration of the terms public; but there was no motive for concealment on the part of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co.; they harboured no desire of the kind. People had run away with an idea, that 24 per cent. was an exorbitant interest—they had come to that conclusion without inquiring at what rate of interest the lender had raised the money—without considering what security he had for its repayment. (Loud cries of question, which continued for some time.)

The Chairman.—I beg that the court will suffer the hon. Proprietor to finish his speech; but I must take the liberty of reminding him, that he has been upon his legs upwards of three hours and a half. (Hear, hear!)

The hon. D. Kinnaird said, he was at that moment endeavouring to save the time of the court. (Hear!) He could assure gentlemen, that he was quite as much inconvenienced as they were; but he had a duty to perform, which, under no circumstance, he would consent to abandon. He felt bound to read the Attorney General's opinion, which, in his mind, decided this question entirely in favour of the house of Palmer and Co. (Cries of question.) If he did not read it, he ought to be accused of being afraid to bring it forward. (Cries of question renewed.) If gentlemen would take it for granted, that he was not afraid to read it, he was ready to shut the book. (Much impatience was here manifested.) He had much to regret on this occasion, since he might be supposed to have been the cause of all the personal discussion which had occurred. He hoped, however, that those who had attended to these proceedings, would acquit him of having used one word in bringing this question forward, that could lead fairly to any discussion, except on the subject of the character of the Marquess of Hastings, or connected with those transactions. But, when gentlemen thought fit to introduce a discussion of a very different nature; when they deemed it right to agitate a question which afforded a wide latitude for observation, it would appear, as if he had admitted the truth of what had been alleged against the house of Palmer and Co. if he had not attempted to clear up their conduct, and to shew the falsehood of those accusations. Gentlemen had endeavoured, by a recurrence to the documents and despatches, to prove the truth of the assertion, which had been levelled at the house of Palmer and Co. They quoted the assertions of those who had slandered those parties, for the purpose of protecting and upholding those very assertions. This was, at least, a novel mode of reasoning; it was neither more nor less than merely repeating the assertions of the enemies of Palmer and Co., which, before they were used as evidence, ought to be shewn to be true. Some gentlemen, indeed, had given the court nothing else but copious extracts from those those papers: taking every word of rumour, surmise, and hearsay, as fact, they jumped to the conclusion, that the conduct of Messrs. W. Palmer and Co. had been exceedingly improper. He could not sit down without reading some part of the opinion of the Attorney-General, who took such a view of the question, as appeared to him to amount to a justification of the house: he would willingly rest the cause of these parties on that opinion. It was dated Sept. 28 1824, and ran thus: "Dear S.r,—I have perused the Hyderabad papers, and agree with Mr. Serjt. Mosanquet in thinking that in the event of any criminal proceeding being instituted against the members of the firm of Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co., the best course will be to charge them with having conspired to obtain, by false representations, and for their own private ends, the sanction of the Bengal government to the sixty lac loan. The payment of arrears to the troops, the reduction of unnecessary establishments, the advancing of money for the improvement of the country, the discharge of debts to soucars and others, were stated to the government as the principal objects of the loan, whereas the greater part of it is said to have been applied, in pursuance of a previous understanding between the parties, to the discharge of debts due from the government of the Nizam to the house of W. Palmer and Co.; and this was effected by a mere transfer of the old debt to the account of the loan, without any advance being actually made, or any reduction of expenditure having been either accomplished or intended." Now, whoever stated this to the Attorney-General had stated that to which the papers gave the lie. (Order, order!) The accounts showed the fallacy of the statement. They were perfectly simple—(more simple than bankers accounts ordinarily were)—there were no transfers; there were no double entries. The Attorney-General proceeded to say, "I cannot, however, help entertaining considerable doubt as to the result of a prosecution in this case, not merely from the complicated nature of the accounts and transactions (of the effect of which, in a criminal prosecution, every person conversant with the proceedings in courts of justice must be sensible) but also from the circumstance that one object of the loan was expressly stated to be the discharge, among other claims, of the debt due to Wm. Palmer and Co.; and it certainly is not a little singular, that after this was stated, both in the letter of the minister and also in the note of Wm. Palmer and Co., no inquiry was made by the Bengal government as to the amount of that debt, so as to ascertain what sum would be applicable to the other purpose of the loan."

It appeared that on the Auruugabad and Berar Suwar account, both of which were incurred with the knowledge of the government, for public objects of importance, there was then due to the house of W. Palmer and Co. upwards of thirty lacs of rupees, and which therefore they were entitled to deduct from the loan, or to have immediately repaid out of it." Of course (said the hon. D. Kinnaid) they would pay themselves. The good sense of the Att.-Gen. at once saw this. The opinion proceeded thus: "The extent of this deduction cannot, therefore, I think, be made a matter of charge against the house of W. Palmer and Co. particularly as the Bengal government, although the existence of these accounts must have been known to them, does not appear to have made any inquiry upon the subject. Independently of these sums, very large payments were made to the minister, while the loan was in contemplation or in progress, to the extent of upwards of thirty lacs, reduced by receipts during the same period to about twenty-two lacs, and it will no doubt be contended that these large advances would not have been made, except upon the confidence that the loan would take place; and that they are, therefore, in substance, to be considered, and were by the parties, at the time, considered as made in respect of the loan; and that, as to the application of them by the minister, the house of W. Palmer and Co. is not to be held responsible. I am aware that upon these advances interest at the rate of two per cent. per month is charged in the account, and therefore it may be fairly argued that they were not advances on account of the loan, which was fixed at the rate of eighteen per cent. per annum; but still I cannot help thinking, notwithstanding the circumstance, that in the event of a trial, a jury might be disposed to consider that the advances, though not made specifically and in terms on account of the loan, were made with reference to, and in contemplation of it, and that it was for the minister to make the proper application of the money. Another ground of charge arises out of representations as to the extent of the loan; though stated to amount to sixty lacs, it consisted in fact of only fifty-two lacs, the difference being retained by way of bonus; but here again it is remarkable, that the Bengal government did not require any engagement or even distinct communication as to the terms of the contract. The subject was discussed, but all information upon it was deliberately, and, after much consideration, dispensed with." All information (said the hon. D. Kinnaid) was dispensed with! If Lord Hastings, and Mr. Fendall, and Mr. Adam dispensed with information, that was not the fault of Messrs. Wm. Palmer. There they were ready to give explanation, if it were required of them. (Hear!) Yet these parties were to be prosecuted for a conspiracy forsooth. The Bengal government, who had neglected their duty, were to pass unnoticed; but Messrs. Wm. Palmer and Co. were to be prosecuted, for concealing that which they were not asked to reveal. The learned Attorney-General said, it was discussed in Council, whether information should be demanded; but the government "appear to have satisfied themselves with general and vague reasoning and inferences, when, if specific information had been required, it must either have been fairly communicated, or, if a false representation had been made, it would have afforded a distinct and precise ground of charge against the house." When this was the case, let him hear no more of trying the house for a conspiracy: if there were any blame, it must fall on the Bengal government, not on the firm of Wm. Palmer and Co.—I shall now, Sir, before I sit down, remind the court of the situation in which I am placed. I have taken on myself to challenge attack against the character of the Marquess of Hastings. I have looked for it in every direction; but I have found it not. I say, feeling as much for the character of the noble Marquess, as he himself does—and no man was over more sensitive of his honour and his fame)—feeling as anxiously for his character as I do for my own, I come to this conclusion, that all the charges which have been brought against him—that all the accusations that have been advanced by special pleading, and by twisting sentences from their true meaning—that all which can be alleged against the noble Marquess, resolves itself into an accusation of favouritism; but those who made the accusation, added, 'but that favouritism was unconnected with any base or corrupt motive' (Hear!) Sir, any public man, going through public life, who could not meet such insinuations and indirect charges, as have been whispered against the Marquess of Hastings, and still preserve the brightness of his character unstained and unsullied, is not fit for an elevated situation in society. Though favouritism has been charged against the noble Marquess, yet has he been acquitted, on all sides, of harbouring any corrupt motive; I will not split words—such is the meaning of the hon. Chairman's amendment; and, I doubt not, that he intended it should have that meaning. Let it, then, go forth to the world, with all the weight that may be attached to it. I am sure my hon. friend (Sir J. Doyle) will hereafter meet, without a blush, this illustrious nobleman; I am sure he will feel that I have not injured the character of his friend and countryman, by the course which I have pursued. I must, Sir, say, that it is impossible to conceive a more extraordinary situation than that in which the Court of Directors is placed. The hon. Chairman, who moved, and the hon. director, who seconded, the amendment, came into court, as if afraid that their own records could not bear them up against the opinion of the day. If the Court of Directors are not satisfied with their own acts, but must come to this court for their approval, they hardly deserve the situation in which they are placed. I think it would have been for their own dignity, if they had not come forward in this manner. If your own conduct cannot stand the test of examination—if you feel it necessary to procure a vote of this court, which you know you can get every day—then, I think, that your character does not stand on a very enviable foundation. If this be your course of proceeding—if you choose to call on the Court of Proprietors, to express their approbation of the orders which you send abroad—be assured of it, when you call for the renewal of your charter, the circumstance will not elude observation. If you think that the sanction given to your acts, by such a proceeding as this, will satisfy the public, you greatly deceive yourselves—the public will laugh at you; they will naturally inquire into the value of a sanction, on a question like this, coming from the Court of Proprietors, a varying body, some members of which have, perhaps, attended the court on this occasion, who will never attend it again. I, for one, desire that this question shall go to a ballot. Eight other proprietors are with me, ready to demand that form of proceeding. Those who support the original motion, may, I think, do so without at all casting any imputation on the executive body. I would not withhold any fair tribute of respect to the Court of Directors, but I will not, when I am asked to give my vote on one subject, take that opportunity for stating my opinion on another. When you ask of me, directly, to state my sentiments on your conduct, I shall be foremost in declaring what those sentiments are; and I hope it will not be forgotten, that I have not, this day, met the eulogiums which have been pronounced on the character of the Court of Directors, with any observation that was likely to cast a shade of discredit on those laudatory remarks. (Hear, hear, hear!)

Mr. Frisfield rose to explain, amidst great confusion. He had been, he said, alluded to by the hon. proprietor on two points. With respect to the first, he meant his application relative to the opinions of counsel: it was scarcely fair to repeat that which had already been the subject of explanation. In asking about those opinions, which he had understood to be, at the moment, before the Court of Directors, he was impelled by a desire to know, whether they did or did not relate to Mr. Adam; and he withdrew his motion, at once, when the hon. Chairman told him they did not refer to to that gentleman. As to the address, management, and dexterity, which he attributed to the hon. proprietor, (loud cries of question !)—he really thought the hon. proprietor had shewn (as we understood, for the noise at this time was considerable) a considerable portion of these qualities. The hon. proprietor had not said a word, in support of his motion, when he introduced it. He had reserved himself, as he (Mr. Freshfield) thought he would, and thus prevented gentlemen from being heard, in defence of Sir C. Metcalf and others, to whom he had pointedly alluded. (Question, question !)

The Chairman.—The court are aware, that, having had the honour of moving the amendment, I have a right to reply. I, however, feel no wish to do so. As so much of your valuable time has already been occupied by this discussion, I shall come to the question, without making any observations on a subject which has been so thoroughly considered. With respect to the remarks which have been made on the line of conduct adopted by me on this occasion, I shall say nothing. I am quite content to leave the course I pursued to the consideration of the proprietors, rather than to detain them by any thing that I could say; (hear, hear !) I must, however, observe, on the part of my honourable friends and myself, that we do not place our character on the decision of this court. Your directors are satisfied with the justice and uprightness of the line of conduct they have followed, and will continue to be so, whether this court approve or disapprove of the amendment. This amendment does not go for the thanks of the court—I do not look for them—though I am very far from underrating their value. The amendment, in fact, goes to this—and a most important point it was—whether the decision of this day is to sanction rule or misrule in India? (Hear, hear !) Whether that practice, which produced such lamentable effects, in Oude and in the Carnatic, is to be continued in other parts of India? (Hear, hear !) And, I am confident, continued it will be, if you do not this day affirm the proposition contained in the amendment. (Hear, hear !) With this single observation, I shall put the question for your decision. (Hear, hear !)

The question was then put in the following form by the Chairman:—

“That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question,” which passed in the negative.

The Chairman next moved—

“That the words proposed to be inserted by way of amendment stand part of the question,” which passed in the affirmative.

The main question, being as follows, was then put by the Chairman, viz.—

“That this Court, having taken into its consideration the papers printed in pursuance of its order of the 3d March last, relating to the pecuniary transactions of the house of Messrs. William Palmer and Co., at Hyderabad, with the Government of his Highness the Nizam, is of opinion, that there is no ground for imputing corrupt motives to the late Governor-General of India, the Most Noble the Marquess of Hastings, K.G., or to any other member of the Bengal Government; at the same time this Court feels called upon to record its approval of the political despatches to the Bengal Government, under dates, the 24th of May 1820, 28th November 1821, 9th April 1823, and 21st January 1824.”

Whereupon a ballot was demanded by the undermentioned Proprietors, viz.—Sir John Doyle, Thomas Hankey, Esq., John Miller, Esq., Randle Jackson, Esq., Sir Alexander Johnstone, the Hon. Douglas Kinnaird, Alexander Nowell, Esq., James Paterson, Esq., John Fullarton, Esq.; and, Friday the 18th inst., was fixed for the decision of the said question by the ballot accordingly.

The court adjourned at half-past nine o'clock.

At the close of the ballot on Friday the 16th March, the numbers were declared to be,

For the question	575
Against it	306
Majority for the question—	269.

* * In consequence of the great length of the three Days' Debates on the Hyderabad Papers, an abstract only can be given, this month, of the proceedings of March 23. A full Report will appear in our next.

East-India House, March 23.

A Quarterly general Court of Proprietors of East-India Stock was this day held at the Company's House in Leadenhall-Street.

After the usual routine business had been gone through,

The Chairman (W. Astell, Esq.) stated that the court was made special for the purpose of laying before the proprietors for their approbation, in conformity with the 17th section of the 6th chapter of the By-Laws, a resolution of the Court of Directors of the 26th of January last, for the appointment of a person in the capacity of first assistant in the office of the surveyor of buildings, at a salary of £350 per annum. A copy of the said resolution, and of the report on which it was founded, now lay open at this house for the perusal of the proprietors. The report, which was read by the clerk, stated the necessity of affording the surveyor of buildings such assistance as will enable him to exercise an efficient check and control over the workmen employed. It recommended that, in future, as much of the work as possible should be performed under previous contract; and pointed out Mr. Cogden, who had long been a useful servant of the Company, as a proper person to fill the office of first assistant to the surveyor, with a salary of £350 per annum; it also recommended the appointment of a person to act as second assistant, with a salary of £200 per annum.

Mr. Hume made an inquiry as to the capability of Mr. Cogden to act as first assistant? which having been satisfactorily answered by the Chairman, a motion for the approbation of the resolution, subject to the confirmation of another general court, was agreed to.

SIR J. MALCOLM.

The Chairman informed the court, that it was farther made special, for the purpose of laying before the proprietors for their approbation, a resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th of January last, granting to Major-Gen. Sir John Malcolm, G. C. B., a pension of £1,000 per annum, on the grounds therein stated. The report required by the By-Law, cap. 6, sec. 19, together with the documents upon which the said resolution had been formed, would be read by the clerk.

The report was then read, in which the distinguished services performed by Sir J. Malcolm, in various high military and civil stations, were stated to form proper grounds for granting to Sir J. Malcolm a pension of £1,000 per annum, to commence from Christmas last.

The Chairman moved, "That the court approve of the said resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th of January last."

General Thornton pronounced a high eulogium on the character of Sir J. Malcolm, and regretted that he was not now actively employed in the Company's service.

Mr. Pattison shortly adverted to the circumstances which had intervened to prevent Sir J. Malcolm, who was perfectly ready to go abroad, from proceeding on a mission to Persia, or from being placed at the head of one of the governments in India. Under the circumstances of the case, it was thought proper that he should, as a memorial of the Company's gratitude, receive the proposed pension.

Mr. Hume and Mr. Buckingham bore testimony to the high merits of Sir J. Malcolm. The former gentleman regretted that the report was not signed by all the Directors.

The motion was then unanimously agreed to.

STATE OF INDIA.

Mr. Hume, in a speech of considerable length, took a view of the present state of India. He animadverted on the recent mutiny at Barrackpore, and attributed the mischief which had occurred in the eastern territories, to the state of thralldom in which the public press was placed. He censured, in severe terms, the course which had been adapted towards the discontented troops, and inveighed against the justice of punishing the native officers, who had separated themselves from the mutineers. In conclusion he moved, "That there be laid before this court a copy of the military despatch of the Marquess of Hastings in 1819, to the Secret Department of the Court of Directors, on the organization and allowances of the Bengal army; and a copy of the despatch of the Court of Directors to the government in India, in 1823, on that subject; together with a copy of the despatches from India, stating how far their orders had been carried into execution."

Mr. Buckingham, in supporting the motion, expatiated on the great advantages which were derived from a free expression of public opinion. No such expression could ever take place, where the press was in a state of degradation.

Mr. Trant opposed the motion as unnecessary; much had been said about the necessity of a free press; but every one who knew any thing about the government of India, must know, that it was open to every species of communication. He admitted, however, that a perfect want of confidence prevailed throughout India, with respect to the present government, and he expressed his surprise that such a man as Lord Amherst should have been sent out there.

Sir C. Forbes was very much disappointed that the motion of his hon. friend did not at once go to the recall of Lord Amherst. It was useless to tell him that Lord Amherst was an amiable man; it was not an amiable man, but an able statesman that they wanted in India.

The Chairman said he would oppose the motion, with all the influence in his power. On a former occasion the despatch now called for, had been demanded; and was with great propriety refused. He utterly denied the assertion that the conduct of the executive body had tended to cripple the efficiency of the Indian army; and, he asked what right had the hon. gent. to declare that the Court of Directors, because a portion of them were bankers and merchants, were incapable of understanding these affairs? It was a part of the system of the hon. gent. to cast his censures on all sides, whether they were deserved or not.

Mr. Edmonstone said that the most brilliant and successful part of the Indian administration administration was during a period when the censorship of the press existed; in the time both of the Marquess Wellesley and the Marquess of Hastings. If any effect could be attributed to a free press in that country, it was a tendency to produce insubordination.

Mr. Washbrough opposed the motion.

Mr. Hume, in reply, said, he wished to have all the information he could before he had recourse to moving for the recall of Lord Amherst.

Mr. Mills had not risen sooner, in the hope that some more important person would have protected the character of an absent man: all the information on the subject had not yet arrived. He considered that the remarks made in this court were calculated to prevent any English nobleman of talent from going to India.

Mr. Gibbans protested against the doctrine, that because Lord Amherst was not in London, no opinion was to be pronounced upon his acts. He opposed the motion of Mr. Hume: he should be content to abide by the wisdom of Parliament to-morrow night.

General Thornton considered that the remarks made here were only calculated to prevent English noblemen who had not great talents from going to India.

The resolution was then put, and negatived without a division.

Mr. Hume then moved that there be laid before the court, a copy of the despatches from the government of Bengal, stating the extent and causes of the mutiny among the native troops at Barrackpore, and the proceedings of that government thereon.

Mr. Trant and Capt. Mudfield opposed the resolution; which was supported by Sir Charles Forbes.

The motion was negatived without a division.

General Thornton gave notice of a motion at the next Quarterly Court, relative to the suppression of information by resident ministers.

Mr. Hume notified his intention of making a motion respecting the conduct of Lord Amherst.

LORD HASTINGS.

Sir Charles Forbes asked when the Court was to be favoured with the papers connected with the Marquess of Hastings' administration, particularly that connected with the transactions at Oude?

This question gave rise to a long conversation, in the course of which, Mr. Hume stated that the Hyderabad question, so far from being disposed of, was but just begun. The conversation dropped, with the understanding that the papers were in the course of being printed, and would be produced at the earliest opportunity.

The court adjourned at four o'clock.

THE NEW COMMERCIAL AND COLONIAL SYSTEM.

THE progress made by the human mind in the various branches of knowledge is uncertain: it is often the business of one age to undo the labours of another. An error in first principles generates a long concatenation of mistakes, which, in some cases, are not discovered, nor even suspected, until they become palpable, or until their consequences are felt as oppressive evils. Many examples might be adduced to demonstrate this truth in philosophy, but especially in legislation, where errors are more easily committed, and are more mischievous in their effects, and less remediable, than in any other science. The increasing magnitude of our statute-book, and the perplexity, obscurity, and conflicting nature of many of the enactments contained therein, are less attributable to the inherent imperfection of human laws, the flexibility of crime, and the mania of legislation which actuates individuals (although each of these causes produces a certain proportion of the evils referred to), than to the fundamental errors which misled the first concoctors of some of the most leading passages in our statute-law, which have served as bases of a vast superstructure of absurdity.

Acute writers and able lawyers have revealed the lamentable condition of our criminal code, which, being coeval with a very early period of our history, deserves considerable allowance; but, in reality, many of the objections to that code apply to the statutory provisions by which the old common law of the realm has been overloaded and depraved; and, in several instances, the effect of modern improvements has been to rid the original law of the incrustations which it has acquired by age or design; and to restore at least the principles recognized by our forefathers to their former operation.

Our commercial code is of a more recent or less antiquated date; but, although the growth of a more advanced period of society, it must not be expected, on that account, to exhibit more perfection. The relative duties, the reciprocal offices, of individuals, bound together by the tie of mutual interest, are of an obvious character; and it is much easier to provide for their security and observance than to discern, by a process of abstraction, the principles upon which a commercial intercourse between various and distant nations can be conducted with most advantage to one of the parties. Self-interest resolves the former question, but it is calculated to obscure the latter. The principles of political economy are not, however, really more complex than those which regulate human actions in general; but there are many considerations which distract and delude the mind in its inquiries upon this subject. In legislating for the benefit of one particular country, too narrow a scope is often afforded to reflection; the interest of that one country engrosses all the attention; and if an eagerness for immediate gain, on the part of the government, supervenes, it is easy to draw erroneous conclusions; and the expedients employed, instead of cherishing, tend eventually to check and destroy, the object intended to be secured.

The foreign commerce of a country flourishes in proportion to the freedom and facility attending the interchange of its commodities with that of other nations. This proposition is demonstrable syllogistically; it is now confirmed by experiment. Yet simple as it appears to be, it is but recently that writers seem to have admitted it, and still more recently that statesmen have ventured to make it the groundwork of their measures.

It is but candid to admit, however, that past administrations in this country have been forced, by imperious necessity, to disregard every object but the immediate augmentation of the revenue. Former ministers, therefore, and the individuals who assisted their views, are hastily and unfairly charged with ignorance. The Commutation Act of 1784 (stat. 24 Geo. III. c. 38), by which the duty on tea was reduced,* for the very purpose of giving a check to smuggling, is an evidence that they were not altogether ignorant of what is now proclaimed as a new discovery; and the subsequent increase of the duty, to nearly its former amount, proves their inability to adhere to the accurate plan they had began.

The temporary pre-eminence which the events of the war afforded to British commerce kept us long blind to the injurious effects of our late system. But when the war was at an end, and the commerce of other nations was released from the bondage which prevented its taking the course which trade naturally seeks, the consequences of our jealous exclusive policy became apparent, and the harsh expedients contrived to oppress foreigners, began to recoil upon ourselves. When a false step is made in political economy, this effect will, sooner or later, be the fruit of it.

The complaints of our merchants opened the eyes of the advocates of the old system; and they began to say to each other, like the man in the play, "Brother, brother, we are both in the wrong." It should be recorded, to the credit of the late Lord Castlereagh, that he was one of the first to acknowledge the errors of the school in which he was bred. In fact, the retaliatory measures of foreign states, towards the British trade, must have disclosed the absurdity of the system heretofore pursued, to every mind not benumbed and stupified by prejudice. The appointment of parliamentary committees to inquire into the state and circumstances of our external trade, was the first step towards improvement; and the evidence adduced before it clearly shewed that, unless some measure of relief were speedily taken, commerce would gradually forsake our ports. Mr. Wallace, the indefatigable chairman of the committee in the Commons, accordingly brought forward bills for the repeal of a mass of barbarous barbarous statutes, the very titles of many of which would excite a smile; and for relaxing the prohibitions contained in our navigation laws, and those restricting the intercourse between our American colonies and the rest of the world.

Proceeding slowly and judiciously, the legislature next directed its attention to the burthensome duties upon imports; and, in the same spirit which prompted the former measures, took advantage of a favourable conjuncture to make, by way of experiment, a direct attack upon the old fiscal system. Heavy duties were reduced, not merely with a view of relieving our manufacturers, and enabling them to compete with foreigners; but upon the sound principle, that the reduction of the rate of duty promotes consumption, and thereby increases the aggregate receipts.

Those who hankered after old prejudices and notions, calculated probably upon the failure of the latter part of the project—but it appears that the government have not been disappointed—their expectations have been fully realized; and a firm foundation is hereby gained for future experiments.

During the past month, Mr. Huskisson has developed the further intentions of his Majesty's Government in respect to our foreign and colonial trade; whence it appears that a full conviction is entertained that legislation has been heretofore misdirected, and that it is expedient to work a gradual but entire change in our commercial system, both as it concerns foreign powers and our own dependencies.

The data which formed the grounds of the encouraging statements of Mr. Huskisson, on the 25th March, are to be found in two valuable documents recently printed by order of the House of Commons, which exhibit a very rapid augmentation in the amount of our exports. It appears, from the first of those documents, that the official value of all British and Irish produce and manufactures exported from Great Britain in the years 1822, 1823, and 1824 (ending 10th October in each year), was as follows:—1822, £45,787,389; in 1823, £46,261,511; in 1824, £50,758,808; shewing an increase of nearly five millions in two years.

The items in last year's account are as follow:—cotton manufactures alone (i. e. cotton fabrics), £26,880,937; cotton twist and yarn, £3,138,347; brass and copper manufactures, £582,577; glass and earthenware, £284,368; hardware and cutlery, £680,986; iron and steel, wrought and unwrought, £1,490,314; linen manufactures, £3,174,834; silk manufactures, £189,813; British refined sugar, £1,121,940; woollen goods, £6,880,200; all other articles, £0,334,492.

The exports of foreign and colonial merchandize are shewn in the second document; whence it appears that the official value of such goods in 1822 amounted to £10,962,359; in 1823, to £9,791,830; and in 1824, to £10,978,314. The item of coffee and cocoa is £2,413,384; that of raw sugar, £1,042,886; and that of East-India piece-goods, £1,033,733.

The prosperity of our cotton manufactories is abundantly proved by contrasting their present condition with that at no very distant period. In 1765, the imports of raw cotton into this country amounted to three millions of pounds weight; those of the last year were one hundred and fifty millions: a still larger quantity was actually taken for spinning, for the supply of the preceding year reached one hundred and eighty millions of pounds weight. A very intelligent writer, whose work is now before us, speaks with astonishment of the prosperity which this branch of our national industry had attained in the year 1802, when the amount of raw cotton imported was 60,329,311 lbs.

only! The importation of cotton-wool from the East-Indies, which in 1792 was exactly seven pounds weight, now amounts to upwards of ten millions!

In this state of things, and considering the successful competition which British fabrics maintain with those of India, even in that country itself, the government have determined to propose the reduction of the enormous duties of $87\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on India calicoes, and $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on India muslins, to 10 per cent., which will leave scarcely a temptation to the illicit introduction of those articles.

A schedule of the proposed reductions of duty upon other commodities has been officially printed;* and we subjoin the following list of the most material changes in articles known in the East-India trade:

The relief which these reductions will afford to trade is manifest; the effect will be not merely to give additional impulse to commercial transactions in commodities already familiar to the arts and to the wants of Europe, but to introduce others. Our last number† contained a description of several valuable dye-stuffs well known in the Malayan countries, but to which our countrymen are strangers. The cultivation of many articles might be introduced into our own eastern territories, from South America, or elsewhere, which the prospect of heavy duties in England on the surplus produce, may have probably prevented. To instance only one article, that of cocoa, a preparation from the cacao, cacaoyer, or chocolate-tree, of South America (Theobroma Cacao, Linn.), the culture of which has been attended with considerable profit in Jamaica, and other West-India islands. There is no reason for apprehending that this wholesome article of diet could not be produced in the East-Indies. Thunberg met with some of the plants in good condition at Batavia; and specimens are now to be seen in the Botanical Garden at Calcutta. The duty on cocoa is to be reduced from 1s. per lb. to 6d.

The amelioration of our commercial system is, however, advanced but little until the shackles be removed from the trade of our colonies. It has not been merely our own policy, but that of all nations who have had foreign settlements settlements for purposes of trade, to limit the commerce of those settlements, as far as practicable, to the parent state. Mr. Huskisson* described this to have been the very essence of colonial policy. Spain, Portugal, and even regenerated Holland, persevere in the selfish system. Relaxations, on our part, of this jealousy, have shewn the benefits attending a more liberal mode of conduct, and that our true interests are not strengthened by, but opposed to, the project of confining the channel of trade in our dependencies to Great Britain. It is, therefore, the plain intention of ministers to break up, gradually and prudently, the long-existing system of commercial preferences and privileges; and, among other changes, we take it for granted, the mode in which our commercial intercourse with the east is now carried on will undergo a material alteration.

This Journal has constantly advocated the exclusive privileges of the East-India Company, not because it has been bound to do so (as some have ignorantly and foolishly alleged), nor because its interests are linked in any manner whatsoever with the existence of them; but from the honest persuasion, that those exclusive privileges, however objectionable in point of principle and theory, have, under the very peculiar and unprecedented circumstances of the case, been productive of much public benefit. Nothing is less difficult than for mere theorists, or superficial declaimers, to raise an outcry against the East-India Company, and, by resorting to common-place topics, reduce an advocate of their monopoly to an apparent dilemma. But a question which involves the security of the most valuable of our possessions, the intellectual and moral welfare of a large portion of the human race, as well as the interests of a great public body, is not to be lightly disposed of. We are not prepared to maintain that, ceteris paribus, the East-India trade, abstractedly speaking, is not comprehended in the universal proposition to which we have before adverted, that freedom is essential to the prosperity of all foreign commerce. The East-India Company are as much urged by interest to adopt this principle in their territories, as the Government of Great Britain can be to act upon it so far as regards the commerce of this country. That body must not be confounded and identified (as seems to be the view of some flippant writers) with mere joint-stock companies. As lords of the soil the Company have a far greater interest to promote the prosperity of their subjects, than to derive a paltry profit from their own investments; and to suppose them ignorant of the benefits accruing from the application of those very principles to commerce, which they must feel so advantageous to themselves at home in their capacity of traders, is next to absurd.

The Company's privileges, however, should be the last abolished. They are entitled to this indulgence, not merely on account of the wealth which has enriched this country from their possessions, for this is an accidental distinction; but because of their public spirit, the honourable character of their dealings, and the manner in which they have administered their office as princes of India, and fulfilled their duties to the people placed under their government. When the salutary principle of free-trade has been applied still farther than it has yet been, the East-India Company's chartered privileges may justly be withdrawn, provided proper measures be adopted to secure to them the preservation of their territorial rights and possessions. Yet it is very difficult to perceive how this object can be secured, if any individual, whatever be his real views, who has money enough to pay his passage in a steam-vessel vessel bound for India, can ship himself thither without obstruction. Such is the peculiar constitution of the Hindoo character at present, that the excess of any passion which may have full scope in other countries, without deranging the equilibrium of society, would hazard, in India, the dissolution of an authority which depends solely upon opinion, perhaps of prejudice. It would, in our honest belief, be the height of impolicy and injustice, to widen the access of individuals thither, to suffer enthusiasm, folly, faction, every bad passion, freely to elaborate mischief, and sap the foundations of British power, until provision be made to reimburse the Company for the loss of territory; and until this country has become reconciled to parting with the most splendid dependency which a nation ever possessed.

It must be evident to every candid inquirer into this subject, that the Company are labouring to secure the public interests as much as their own. It is true, indeed, that the former incur a very unequal share of the risk; for if intestine commotion, or foreign war, be, as they foresee, one of the consequences of an unrestricted intercourse between India and Europe, the Company will have to support all the burthen of the contest, if it be successfully terminated; and if otherwise, will have merely a nominal claim against this country, which cannot, in the nature of things, be liquidated. Peculiar considerations seem, therefore, to take this out of the general class of such cases; and the principles of free trade, like those of a free press, which are equally universal, are to be applied here with due consideration of all circumstances. Hindostan is not in a natural state in respect to many essential particulars; the people are enslaved by the grossest prejudices; they are habituated to a despotic government, and to no other; their peculiar laws are in opposition, not merely to those of other nations, but to common sense, and even decorum; they are divided from each other by barriers which no government can subdue by mere authority. To prepare the Hindoos for unrestricted intercourse with Europeans, and for a participation in the benefits of a free press and a free trade, the cement of their society must be broken up, and they must be forced, in some respects, to retrograde. The grand solvent is education, slow in its operation, but sure in its effects. When writers of talent, who have no sinister designs to accomplish, vehemently urge the immediate resumption of those privileges which the East-India Company have enjoyed for a period of two hundred years, we either discover, or have good reason to suspect, that they know but little of the subject upon which they treat. That theory and principle are opposed to any restriction upon the East-India trade, every English writer upon the economy of nations has demonstrated, and it is too obvious to admit of doubt; but the expediency of abolishing, for the sake of encouraging and extending commerce, those restraints which have been devised for political purposes, is what we have never yet seen satisfactorily proved.

When this momentous subject shall come, as it must come in a few years, before the legislature, their decision will be greatly assisted by the clear and philosophical views which now prevail in regard to the nature of commerce and the internal economy of nations; and they will be guided by experiments practically made, and not by loose conjecture. The several portions of this great question will then have acquired new light; and if it be deemed safe and expedient to incur the fearful responsibility of levelling the barriers which impede communication between Europe and the East, we fervently hope that our forebodings and apprehensions may prove altogether groundless.

ROUTE TO LUDAK.

Extract of a Letter, dated Suobathoo, December 11, 1823.

Mr next camp was at an elevation of 12,500 feet, nearly on a level with the last trees, which are the birch. Close to the camp was a stream, sheeted over with ice, which never thaws. I was now surrounded with hoary peaks, and the dell had closed into a gorge. The following day brought me to the pass in the snowy range. At a height of nearly 14,000 feet the sward broke up; and at 15,000 feet the slope of the mountains facing south began to be thickly covered with snow. Here our respiration was affected, and we experienced great debility, and consequent sluggishness. Halting every few yards, we made slow progress over the snow, which, freezing in the sun's rays, reflected a heat and brilliancy that almost blinded us. At three o'clock, after much exertion, I reached the crest of the pass (therm. 30°), and pitched my tent upon the snow, which covered every point, a fresh fall having confounded rocks and heaps of snow together. I got the barometer up, with some trouble, and made all snug for the night, which was setting in with a serene sharpness not easily conceived. By sunset the temperature had fallen to 21°, and then the night came, worse than the day. I soon began to be oppressed by heart-ache and fulness, and the increased motion of the blood induced giddiness; my face was in a flame, my eyes burning, and the pain in my head intolerable. I felt as in the first flush of a fever—hot, cold, and drowsy at the same time, and had a dreadful thirst, which I could not satisfy, as all our water was frozen. At ten o'clock beer in bottles began to freeze, and soon after Madeira: every thing was acted on by the frost, and there was an incessant cracking: the sharp air making its way through all the clothes I could heap together. I despaired of seeing daylight; the moon shone full upon us, the sky was as dark as ebony, and the stars rayed and flashed like meteors. Morning came and disclosed a congealed group of people and things. The thermometer was down to 6° inside of the tent; on the outside, the beer was converted into a lump of ice, and the bottles burst in pieces; the Madeira was slush; the tent ropes were stretched to their last hold, and the pole was bent over the table. I never passed such a night of misery, and shall not again expose myself to such a trial. It is impossible to form any idea of the sensations induced by the rarefaction of the air: there is an anxiety, and a sense of suffusion, quite intolerable; and on the slightest motion the breathing is hurried, and it is impossible to get a full inspiration; the air being here reduced to nearly one half its density at the level of the sea, the elasticity of the surface of the body is taken off, and there being no sufficient counterbalance to the circulation, the blood beats against the relaxed system and deranges the whole. The extreme height of the pass, by the barometer, is 16,500 feet, and it is flanked by peaks rising to 18,500 at least; the crest is less sharp than most other passes I have seen, the slopes declining very gradually. In the rainy season, much of the rock is disclosed; but so early as the middle of September fresh snow again falls. A flock of beautiful birds, like golden pheasants, visited us in this desolate domain, and came so close that we might have caught them, but I could not quit my bed. At eleven o'clock I got up, and began the descent towards Ludak, under the sedative effect of my night's sufferings; in fact, I was quite confused. The snow deepened at every step, as what lay near the pass was hardened by the frost. We got on very slowly till we came to rifts in the old snow, half concealed by the fresh fall; the guides dreaded approaching them, and led the way with ropes tied round their waists, to haul them up in case they slipped: they began a circuit that would not have cleared us of the snowy tract till night, and none of us could stand another trial. At last we were stopped by a dreadful rent in the snow, and the guides declared they would not be responsible for our safety. I stood horrified at the scene, and with great reluctance ordered a retreat.

The only route into Ludak now left me was by the valley of the Sutluj, through the rugged and picturesque region of

4 M

Kunawur;

Kunawur; the river continued its course in a dark ravine, sometimes tearing its way amongst masses of granite, and then softening into deep blue stillness. The country may be said to lie within clusters of mountains sheathed with perpetual snow, there being no table-land or undulated plain in any one part. The inhabited portions are confined to the vallies of rivers, or gorges of torrents; and the villages are scattered along their banks at a general elevation of 9,000 feet, but in the interior they rise to 12,000. The seasons vary with the height of the level; in the lower regions of the vallies, the climate at summer is warm. The finest grapes occur near the margin of the river, and in the dells of streams flowing from the snow, where the solar reverberation is great. In this region, also, the finest flavoured honey is gathered. At a height of 9,000 feet the climate is delicious; our European fruits come to perfection, and the forest trees and all the wild flowers of our country are spread over the soil. The pasture-zones occupy a belt between the limit of the trees and the confines of perpetual snow. Near the frontier of the table-land we find villages at 12,000 feet; the heaviest crops of barley are gathered here, and numerous willows, poplars, and junipers thrive in this upland tract. The climate corresponds to that of the Highlands of Scotland; but the sun has more power. Frosty nights begin in the middle of September, and the winters are extremely rigorous; little snow falls where the air is so dry. As we penetrate towards the Chinese frontier, the country and scenery change; trees shrink from the arid atmosphere, become stunted, and vanish; vegetation is sapless and scanty; the mountains themselves diminish into bluff masses, over which the people ride on horseback. In July and August the air is humid, and clouds flit about the peaks, crawling along their sides like mists changing their place; and, according to the variations in the density of the atmosphere, they sometimes roll down in a body and settle in the bottom of the valley, where they rest motionless till some atmospheric change sets them in agitation, when they move off, as if by consent, and rising till the air can no longer support them, they form a belt round the crests of the peaks, which shoot through their sides, and appear like islets in the ocean. Such are the general features of the country through which my route lay. The traveller in his course finds himself environed by cliffs which are perpetually breaking loose; his daily occupation is climbing to the tops of mountains, and descending again to their base; at one time shivering on the verge of congelation, and immediately after oppressed by heat. Precipices of a frightful depth are often skirted by means of rude staircases of frail construction; and torrents are crossed by cradle-bridges of twigs swinging in the wind. The inhabitants of Kunawur are very black, with now and then a flush of red in their face.

On the 18th, being very ill, owing to my imprudence in eating sour grapes, I was obliged to pass the night at an elevation of more than 13,000 feet; therm. 20°. On the following day, after incredible exertion, we crossed the range at an elevation of 14,500 feet, the wind blowing furiously, and chilling us to the bones: the grandeur of the view from this spot cannot be imagined. We were on the pass at noon, and by three o'clock in the dell below, at a height of 9,000 feet, where is situated the populous village of Soongnum, the inhabitants of which live comfortably, subsisting chiefly on their flocks; their open honest faces do not belie their manners, which are frank and courteous. The mountains on each side rise to within the verge of congelation, and seem to lock up the vale in perpetual repose. The Darbaang, a fine stream, waters the dell, and rises from masses of perpetual ice, at the foot of a pass to Ludak, 18,600 feet; but I durst not attempt it so late in the year. Even in the beginning of September, I had the temperature there at noon under a bright sun 23°.

On the following day I crossed the mountains that shut in the dell, by a pass, 15,000 feet, but without snow. I stood on the crest at noon, therm. 25°; in front was a granite range of most desolate aspect, not a blade of vegetation visible; the snow itself only finding a resting place at 19,000 feet: beyond it, through a break, were seen snowy mountains, pale with distance, appearing to rise out of the table-land on the banks of the Indus; and from the angles of altitude which I observed, their pale outline, and the broad margin of the snow, they cannot be less elevated than 29,000 feet. The impression which their faint cloud-like portraiture leaves upon the mind of the spectator, who views them on the verge of the horizon, language fails to convey; it is like something that we have seen, but retain only a vague and ill-defined idea of, appearing through the dimness of distance as objects mingling with the skies. As I had no time or place for fixing their position, I adopted Humboldt's plan of vertical lenses, the results of which should give an approximation to their height. My route now being along the course of the Leh, or Speetee river, which is nearly half the size of the Sutluj, every thing in this neighbourhood bespoke the action of water. We found horizontal strata of sandstone, marl, and loam, in the most regular layers, and at prodigious heights; granite reposing above clay, and sandstone above granite. Eastward, the tableland is strewn over with ammonites, at heights of 16,500 feet.

From Sheealkur onwards, was new ground to me, and I was occupied surveying. Our territory here confines upon China and Ludak. Sheealkur is a part of Busahir; but this state still extends a day's journey before it infringes upon Ludak. The access is by a pass 14,000 feet high. From this lofty spot I saw far into the country N.E., till the view was limited by the crest of a range that sends its waters to the Indus; but there was not a sign of table-land; nothing but barren desolate rocks, without snow, yet of incredible height. the sky over them was tinged with a light shade, as if by the horizon of a plain. The country is extremely arid; not a tree is to be seen; the soil yields only tufts of furze; and we find the same characteristics of a desert as occur in that to the west of India; but instead of water-melons, there are crops of ice, like mushrooms, sprouting from the soil, and which, in some parts, afford the only supply of water to the inhabitants. In the heart of the mass of ice is the thinnest weed, which, compared with the bulk it supports, may be considered like the stem of a water-melon. This, by some process unknown to me, nourishes the ice, and it goes on increasing, spreading out like the leaves of a plant; the ice is very thin and porous;

but how it exists I cannot say, for I found it where the temperature was above 50°, and it grows in warmer places.

My camp was to-day at the frontier village of Bussahir: thermometer 23° at sunrise. Next day I forded the Speetee on a yak (bos grunniens). The river is here elevated 10,400 feet above the sea, and all beyond this is Ludak: the route lay in the valley, which opens out, and the stream ripples over a bed of sand and pebbles. Notwithstanding my elevation, the sun's rays darted through the rarefied air, and were reverberated by the naked rocks, and produced a glow of heat uncomfortable even at this season of the year. In my second day's journey in Ludak, I passed a small village, belonging to the Chinese government, situated in a plain where the lakes freeze in the night, and are frequented by wild geese and ducks, which I shot, ate, and relished. At this place are numerous paintings and works of sculptors, remarkably well finished, and we are left wondering at the origin and ingenuity of the agent in so secluded a spot. Although at an elevation of 11,000 feet, the soil is vastly productive; I measured poplar trees of twelve feet in girth. The day was dark and snowy upon the neighbouring mountains, but the clouds had not power to quit them, and we escaped with a little sleet. The route hitherto had been a few points to the north of west; but the river at one bend sweeping round to due north, we arrived at Dunken, a fort of Ludak, perched upon the face of a cliff at an elevation of almost 13,000 feet. The climate is consequently rude and disagreeable; but the sun's rays are sufficiently powerful to keep the people comfortable on the roofs of the houses in the dead of winter. A thermometer in the sun rose to 126°, while the temperature of the air was 32°.

This is truly a singular spot; the rock on which the fort stands is limestone rubble, apparently in the last stage of decay; the cavities and scoops worn into it, by age and weather, have undermined its foundations, and it is besides full of rents, into which the sun shines, and, astonishing to say, as they enlarge they become the abodes of people. The thermometer at sunrise was 19°; a little snow fell during the night, and winter was obviously in the air. What the people do in the severer season, considering that the climate was already so harsh, I cannot guess: the wood is collected with great labour from a distance, and sparingly used; furze is almost the only fuel. To-day I passed vast flocks of sheep, tended by shepherds from the banks of the Indus, who seem of a different stock from their neighbours, the Lutakees. They had fine horses and dogs with them, and were altogether better disposed, and in easier circumstances. They are a hardy race, living in a plain without trees or cultivation, in tents made of yaks' hair. Their sheep are noble animals, rising nearly breast-high, and carry heavy loads. On what they feed, to thrive so well, I cannot guess, for I saw nothing but tufts of furze. Green grass is said to fill without effect, consequently neither these or the shawl-wool goats will live out of their native element. From Dunken I descended to the river, which is here elevated 11,500 feet; the dell is of a fine expanse, and the eye rests with delight upon the scene, after the roar and foam of the Sutluj. My camp, at the village of Lara, was 12,000 feet above the sea, and at night the ground was sprinkled with snow. Thermometer 19° at sunrise; an hour of sunshine cleared the soil, and I prosecuted my route with spirits; the streams were all sheeted with ice, unthawed in the sun's rays; and cascades, arrested in their fall, exhibited solid columns of ice, which only melt when spring returns. My next day's journey brought me to Rangreek, in a plain sloping gently to the river; elevation 12,500 feet. The snow began to fall in the night, and there was no cessation of it for two days, till the whole face of the country was one uniform desolate expanse. In the bottom of the valley the snow lay two feet deep, and the mountains appeared like heaps of pure snow. How I was to make my way over the elevated tract, beyond the inhabited country, was a subject of great anxiety. I gazed upon the snowy splendour of the valley with horror. The thermometer fell to 6° during the night, and I began the march, at eleven o'clock, in a temperature of 20° . Nature smiled upon the snow, not a cloud was in the air, and a solemn stillness prevailed. I surveyed, by the tract of the yaks, and got on pretty well through the snow, the greatest inconvenience I experienced being from the sun's rays, which darted upon us with a fierceness the more sensible from the sharp chill of the air, which was never heated beyond 25° : the reflection from the snow dazzled me, as I took no precaution for my eyes, and suffered dreadfully from its effects.

At three o'clock, after being four hours in the snow, we came to the margin of the river. The sun had already left the dell; here we were instantly beset by the cold. Our shoes and stockings, previously moistened by the thawing snow, now froze; we gradually became benumbed, and on passing by a cleft in the shore of the river, we were struck to the bones by a sudden gust of wind, which rushed down like a current, and three of the coolies in the rear were caught in its eddy, and sunk down under it. I pulled out the thermometer, and found it 16° ; my hands could no longer point the theodolite, and I ceased surveying; making a free use of brandy, I pushed on over the sharp edges of the frozen snow. There was no exposing the face to the wind; our breath congealed upon our beards, and the clothes grew stiff on our backs. In fording a stream, the water froze as fast as it touched us, till feet and legs were as stiff as wicker-work; two coolies were here overwhelmed by the frost, and fell to the ground. I could not assist them; it was fly or die. We still travelled through the snow, and I began to despair; the sun was near setting; no village was in sight, and the frost assumed a degree of severity quite alarming. At five o'clock the village appeared at the foot of the mountains, terminating a dead level plain, without a speck or bush to break the snowy waste: we arrived in a miserable state, the thermometer being down at 12° . I could not prevent my people from getting into the fire; their limbs had lost all feeling; and then came that dreadful sensation of thawing and re-action. I was forced away by the smoke, leaving a group of wretchedness to their lamentations too much to endure: they lay like carcases. I passed the night in a shed, in a temperature of 6° . My face was literally snow, and my eyes felt as if they were burning in their sockets. The cold penetrated through every thing, the air outside being at zero; half my camp were useless, and the remainder refused to stir, and how could I push them to their destruction? I was now within one day's journey and a half of the last village in this route; and being here at an elevation of 13,000 feet, and the bed of the river only 400 feet lower, the limit of the inhabitants and cultivation in this valley cannot be below 13,500 feet. Lassur is the last village. Beyond this, there is a steep ascent to a pass, from which the country rises in an inclined plane, where there is a desert, which in the best of times occupies five days in passing it. In summer, Tartars with their flocks resort to it for pasturage. It freezes here even in July; what must be the degree of cold in this region in autumn, the depth of snow, and the horrors of the journey, without shelter or fire-wood? I made every effort to persuade a few of my people to accompany me, but only four offered to share my misfortunes. Thus compelled to leave all my instruments behind, what was to be gained by risking so much to so little purpose? Geography was my object. Another fall of snow, or some unforeseen obstacle on the road, would have destroyed every thing, as the time which I had assigned to myself would not admit of my retrograding, if I advanced another march. I was therefore reluctantly compelled to abandon my project, and here ended my tour, as it began, in disappointment. The weather was now settled and serene, and the cold increased. Thermometer 2° below zero: what must it be in the dead of winter, and on the summits of the mountains of snow? Even on the high land between this and Ludak, or at Lassur itself, the cold is beyond any thing that Parry experienced in the latitude of 74, and I was here in a parallel of 82½; such is the effect of elevation. In summer, however, the climate is fine, but the nights are always sharp. Leli, the capital of Ludak, was still ten days' journey beyond me; but the whole route is to be accomplished on horseback.

Of the character of the Lutakees I cannot speak favourably; they are a rapacious race, with all the vices, and none of the virtues, of real savages. They are cowardly and assuming. Their youth is without honour, and their age without respect. They are ragged and greasy, and nature has not favoured their outward form. The women are forward, and highly immodest;

prudery is an accomplishment unknown to them; and I suspect that female chastity may be bought for a trifle. I lived with a family during the snowy weather, and had an opportunity of seeing the economy of their household. They live comfortably enough, eating three times a day; their chief subsistence is soup, but the flesh of the yak is a common dish. Tea is drank by the better classes, and beer made from malt is found in every house; old and young seem to be at the cask all day. Juniper is burnt before meals as incense; but, in bad weather, when the people cannot stir out, it is kindled in the house, and the smoke blown into the faces of the people about to eat. Their superstition resembles that of my own countrymen; in the making of malt circumspection is observed, lest the evil eye of some old hag should occasion the failure of the process. They have an abhorrence of putting the feet upon the grate. To my surprise, the whole family slept promiscuously together in the room I occupied; old and young, males and females. They repose upon their breast in an inclined position; but they undress before going to rest. A sheep-skin cloak, with the fleece towards their body, is their garment for the night. The family with whom I lodged were rather a fine specimen of the inhabitants, who perhaps improve on acquaintance, and they certainly are quite officious where it is their interest. I think they shew better in their natural character. Pitch your tent in the field, and you are liable to be imposed upon; but step inside, and you become a member of the family. The Lutakees believe that there is a race of people who feed upon dead bodies (human carcases), and that they have unnatural countenances. The valley of the Spetee is the only regular one I have met with, as the mountains are not usually continuous, but appear in vast insulated masses, like hillocks standing upon a plain. The rise of the soil is generally 25 feet per mile. The villages are scattered. In returning, I had the temperature, on successive days, at 1°, 3°, 7°, 10°, and 15°, the river freezing fast at the margin, and the stream full of ice. The geese and ducks had forsaken the lakes, and the water-courses were turned to lines of solid ice: such is the horrid aspect of the country, and its eternal winter!

RUSSIAN MISSION TO CHINA.

THE river Kuitoon, which gives name to this station, falls here into the Shara (Yellow river). The people here are very rich in cattle; we saw some buffalo cows, the milk of which is much esteemed by the Mongols. We were again visited by some idle lamas, a set of people whom we found even more ignorant than the lay-Mongols, all their science being confined to reading the Ganshoor, a Tibetan book, which they seem to do mechanically; for the captain of the station read some Mongol words we shewed him, which the priests could not. The former, a zsangin (captain) of this station came galloping up to us. He seemed to envy the fine close beard of our Archinandrite, of which the Mongols have scarcely any. They let, however, their mustachios come down as far as they will grow, whilst they shave their heads high up, and plait the top hair into a tail, the same as the Bujarts and Calmucs in Russia. In the afternoon we saw a Chinese caravan of twenty-five camels moving towards Kiakhta, along the road on the opposite side of the river; we now perceived that there must have been another motive than that assigned, which made our guides lead us off the main road, but we were not able to ascertain it.

Sept. 6. A cold northerly wind, with a little rain during the night; the wind continuing during the day. We waded through the Shara, which is here but ten fathoms broad. We advanced through meadows and over a ridge of hills about seven wersts, when we came to a pagoda at the foot of Mount Guntoo-Ssamboo, on a projection of which stood a pyramidal Ssuburgan or chapel. The pagoda was small, built of wood, the walls painted white, and the roof red. A few dark red tapers, made of the rind of a tree and musk, were burning within before the idol, which, like most other articles used in the lamaic worship, came from Tibet. Two lamas were so intent on their reading, that they scarcely deigned to cast a look upon us. The priests live in three tents standing near the temple. We travelled this day about twenty-five wersts, principally along the Shara, through very fine meadow land, in which we saw some cattle, and a few hay-cocks. In one place we saw a white tent belonging to a Chinese pedlar, a race of people who travel about Mongolia with small ware, which they exchange for sheep. We met a Mongol waggoner, leading sixteen carts, each drawn by one ox, carrying sugar-candy from Oorga to Kiakhta. Among the numerous groups whom curiosity had brought on our road, was an old man with a little boy before him on the saddle, to whom he minutely described every article of our dress. The thermometer was 5° (Reaumur) above zero; and some of the Mongols already appeared in their winter dresses.

Sept. 7. Ice during the night; the day cloudy; the wind still northerly. We travelled on for about seven wersts, when we reached the top of the Zaidam (salt-ground). On descending we had the isolated volcano, Bancec, on the left. To the south-east we saw the Mangatai (steep mountains), which are the abode of many wild goats and deer, foxes, steppe-cats, and a few bears. We advanced this day only twenty wersts, and halted at the foot of the Tumuky mountains, after we had forded the river Bain,* which we had been skirting for several

* Some of our writers call this river, the river Bain-Gol, forgetting that Gol, the same as Daria, means river; or, they say the lake Khukha-u-see, Kara-Kul, see and Kul meaning lakes.

several wersts. Several of our Cossacks had taken cold on crossing the Eero, and were now ill; and it is to be observed that the common people in Siberia weaken their constitution by the frequent use of the brick-tea, which they drink twice or three times a day. The Mongols greatly admired the construction of our wheels, theirs consisting of nothing more than two cross-bars, surrounded with wooden hoops, and united by an axle which turns round with them. The country seemed very populous, as the flocks and herds were numerous, and in good condition.

Sept. 8. We ascended the Tumuky with great difficulty, and then descended through a defile towards the Kharà (black river). There is the most striking similarity between this plain, and those of the Eero and Sharà: enclosed between mountains, they all three occupy the right bank of the river. Our road chiefly lay through narrow defiles with overhanging rocks. From one high spot we had an extensive view of naked hills, the sharp tops of which appeared like a regular succession of blue waves. In many places we met with red raspberries. We had to cross the Kharà before we halted for the day, after having travelled a distance of eighteen wersts. There is, however, another road leading to this place, which is thirty wersts long, and turns the mountains. The difficulty of proceeding with wheel-carriages in this country is indescribable; our camels, besides, began to flag, having, according to custom, been left to fast for a fortnight. This station lies at the foot of Mount Khukhtoo-tsholoo (blue stone), in the midst of fertile meadow-land, although we did not see much cattle on it.

Sept. 9. Day of rest. We shot some wild ducks, and caught some fish in the Kharà, which latter, however, we again returned into the river, in compliance with the prejudices of the Mongols. Milk and dried cheese is the principal nourishment of these people, although they also eat beef (?) and mutton, if their cows and sheep are numerous. They also make a kind of spirits of milk, which, however, they only drink in summer: some of them milk the camels. Their industry is very limited; they make felt of wool, and-strings from horse-hair; but with the exception of bad smiths, they have no trades at all. They suffer much from cold in winter, wood being scarce in some parts, and the fuel they generally use is the dung of animals, amongst which, that of cows is preferred for giving most heat. Our Boshkha amused himself in learning a few Russian words, in the pronunciation of which, however, he experienced great difficulty; yet we always found that the Mandshoos pronounced our language more readily than the Chinese. The singing of our Cossacks seemed to please our attendants.

Sept. 10. The day cold and dull. We saw to the east of the Mangatai chain, at a great distance, Mount Duloshee, which rises, like Mont-Blanc, isolated, and has the appearance of an immense cone; and still farther east, Mount Mandal, the highest we had yet seen. We observed, during this day's journey, a great many herds and tents, and frequently fields covered with millet, barley, and wheat. The latter had been surprised by the cold whilst yet green. It is generally the practice to pull up the corn by the root in reaping it, and to have it threshed by horses. The banks of the Borò, a small stream, along which we passed, were covered with cranes that walked about without fear; while innumerable swarms of wild ducks swam on the water. Great crowds of people, men, women, and children, on horseback, and in their best attire, were passing by us; some returning from Oorga, where they had been to worship the new Kutookhta, or high-priest, a child seven years of age, while others were going there. Having advanced sixteen wersts in a direct line, and on a level ground, we arrived in the valley of Zaun-Mâdo (hundred trees), at the foot of Mount Nocen (Lord), where our missions had always halted; but we advanced seven wersts farther, to the station Khorimtoo. Among the pilgrims we met this day, was a large caravan, the people of which had been as far as Tibet, to fetch their high-priest with his retinue from the bosom of his family, for which purpose the people of Calkhas had collected a thousand camels. The poor animals were exceedingly jaded; but we were particularly struck by the appearance of one, which was of snowy whiteness, and of an enormous size. The people were all very civil, and saluted us as they passed. To the south of this station is a mountain of the shape of a rampart, terminating in the rock called Khorimtoo (place of festivity). The hills are covered with forests, in which the grandees of Oorga are in the habit of hunting; wherefore no one is allowed even to enter them. Our Tussoolaksheec, however, was civil enough (in order to prevent our walking in them) to tell us, that there were many bears in the forest. When the emperor goes to his hunting-palace of Shekhe, situated to the east, without the great wall, the Mongol princes are ordered to hunt at the same time in other places, or attend him. The best horsemen are assembled, who drive the game within a large circle, when the Mandshoo grandees begin the slaughter. If a Mongol were to shoot at one of the animals, his life would be forfeited; he may, however, pursue any game that escapes through the ring. The best game, especially wild boars, are presented to the monarch.

Sept. 11. We advanced through a very mountainous country for about twenty wersts, when we reached the summit of the Marassotoo (fir-mountain), where a high fir-tree spreads its branches, and seems to enjoy a great portion of the veneration of the people. Here several roads, leading from the northern parts of Calkhas, unite into that which leads to Oorga. We went five wersts farther into the fruitful valley of Khunzâl, where we halted. We still saw many pilgrims, among whom was one lama so old, that two servants were obliged to support him on his horse, and two boys about seven years of age, who were carried in baskets on a camel, and were destined to the priesthood. Indeed, every Mongol family considers it a duty to have at least one member in the holy office, which accounts for the great number of lamas. The caps of these lamas are covered with sheep-skin dyed yellow, which gives them a very singular appearance. One party that was passing us had a stud of twenty horses and mares, destined as a present to the high-priest. On inquiring the value of one of those animals, we were told that it was equal to sixty pieces of brick-tea, i. e. twelve lanas, or twenty-four roubles.

Sept. 12. A frosty night, and foggy morning, but afterwards a fine day. We only marched twenty wersts this day to the station near the river Burgultai. We saw on the road, mountains covered with forest, kept as preserves for the Wau (governor-general) and the other grandees of Oorgu. We also saw many flocks of sheep, which animals in this country resemble those of our Calmucs, having fat tails, long ears, and are all white. Some of the poor people kept goats.

Sept. 13. We rested. During the night, hoar-frost by moonlight. There was some exchange of civility between our attendants and us, which again cost us some presents. The people here seemed poor, and many of them were drunk: the vicinity of a town was clearly perceptible. Some of the Mongols sang to us: they have but one air, which is of a mournful strain, but very harmonious: the principal burden of their songs is the horse; besides, they sing the intercourse among relations, the departure for the boundary-guard, the chase on a bay-horse, &c.

Sept. 14.

Sept. 14. Rain and fog, with a strong northerly wind throughout the day. We travelled eighteen wersts, and encamped near the river Arshan. We again met many pilgrims, among whom was a Gendoon, or chief, with a large retinue. His tent was carried by several camels, and a great number of led-horses followed. His wife sat in a Chinese carriage drawn by one horse; the ladies' saddles are the same as those of the men, with the exception of being covered with a well-worked carpet, instead of the leather cover which the men use. Immediately after our arrival, the Boshkho went forward to Oorga to announce the arrival of the mission, which consisted of 43 persons, with 84 camels, 149 horses, and 25 oxen. The death of the emperor began to be talked about, and we perceived that most of the Chinese and Mongol officers had taken off the button and tassels from their caps, which, together with the wearing of white garments, and letting their hair grow for 100 days, constitutes their mourning on such occasions.

Sept. 15. We were desirous of resting this day, the weather being exceedingly bad; but we were informed that the Wan expected us at Oorga, for which reason we were obliged to proceed. The Mongols showed great reluctance to assist us, and even ventured to disobey the Tussoolaktshee, because they were of the clerical district of Sabine. They were, however, not too proud to accept bread and meat from us, which they devoured with greediness, being all very poor. We ascended the Guntoo-mountains, the highest we had yet crossed, the ascent of which was five wersts. At the top of the highest summit we saw a large Obo, surrounded with wooden pillars, bearing inscriptions in the Tibetan language. The snow lay several wersths deep. We met a young chief from the neighbourhood of the Sselenga, attended by his family and people, returning from their pilgrimage to Oorga, leading from twenty to thirty sheep with them, as provisions for the journey.

From the top of the Guntoo, we descended through a long stony valley, extending to Oorga, a distance of twenty wersts. We saw many tents and buf-faloes, whose calves were grazing on the highest and steepest tops of the hills. There are two or three temples on this road, one of which is very large. It was sunset before we arrived at Oorga, a town almost entirely composed of felt tents; and were lodged in the Russian court, which stands very near the palace of the Kutookhta.

THE INDIAN ARMY.

LETTER V.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: On the subject of the regiments of European infantry it is unnecessary to occupy much of your readers' time. Let their establishment be the same as his Majesty's, consisting of eight companies each, and, if hereafter augmented, a proportionable increase of field officers; with this difference, that there should be three subalterns per company (the flank companies lieutenants only), and among the native followers attached, a haveldaur, naigue, and a certain number of pioneers.

We now come to the native infantry; each regiment consisting of not less than eight, nor more than twelve companies (in the latter case to have two grenadier and two light companies), with the following establishment:

- 1 Colonel.
- 1 Lieut.-Colonel, if less than twelve companies; if twelve, two Lieut.-Colonels.
- 1 Major, if less than ten companies; if ten or more, two Majors.
- 1 Adjutant.
- 1 Quarter-Master.
- 1 Surgeon.
- 1 Assistant Surgeon.
- 1 Or more Native Assistants.
- 1 Native Adjutant.
- 1 Haveldaur Major.
- 1 Drill Haveldaur.
- 2 Drum and Fife Majors.

- 1 Haveldaur, } of Pioneers.
- 1 Naigue, }
- 1 Puchally.

Each Company to consist of

- 1 Captain.
- 1 Lieutenant. } Flank Companies, two
- 1 Ensign. } Lieutenants.
- 1 Soubedaur.
- 1 Jemedaur.
- 1 Staff Haveldaur.
- 4 Haveldours.
- 8 Naigues.
- 2 Drums, fifes, or bugles.
- 92 Privates.
- 10 Boys.
- 9 Puchallies.
- 2 Pioneers.

I have omitted, in both the native cavalry and infantry, serjeant-majors and quarter-master-serjeants; they are of little further use than as clerks, and are a serious injury to the European infantry, by drawing from it the best non-commissioned officers. Let them be discontinued as casualties occur, and, in lieu of them, let the adjutant and quarter-master be each allowed a clerk.

I shall once more address you on the subject of the Military Seminary.

A RETIRED EAST-INDIA OFFICER.

Cheltenham, Jan. 31, 1825.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: The perusal in your journal for May last, of a letter signed "A Bengal Retired Officer," upon subjects which interested me, first suggested to me to offer you a few remarks. These I should have sent before, had I not been desirous of seeing, previously, the operation of the new organization of the army, and some reputed alterations; having now waited their effect, I transmit what I have to drunahich, should you deem worthy, I sang to obliged by your inserting. harmonize agree with the writer, that the sing the: of gratitude be (I have no chase on ly) anticipates, will actuate the officers of the Indian army, for the mark of liberality on the part of the Court of Directors, alluded to in the first paragraph of the letter, viz. increasing the pension of their half-pay officers, by making them equal to those of the King's service.

With regard to the second topic, although I hail, as a boon, the alteration in the formation of the army, inasmuch as it provides a liberal retiring pension as lieutenant-colonels commandant for many old and meritorious officers, who otherwise must have sunk under the influence of climate, without the means of leaving India;

India; and likewise in giving the rank of regimental captain to some subalterns, after a dreary service of sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen years; yet I cannot agree that it has added to the efficiency of the army generally; as the number of officers in each corps of infantry remains just what it was. It is true the efficiency of the cavalry branch is much increased; for the liberality of the honourable Court has allotted to their regiments of eight troops only, as many officers as to the regiments of infantry of ten companies.

The third subject of your correspondent's letter relates to "irregular corps of horse and infantry, and Sebundy corps;" in which, I suppose, he means to comprise what are termed, in the phrase of the Bengal government, "local and provincial battalions, and corps of local and frontier horse." I shall not offer an opinion, whether such corps should have the proportion of officers which the writer of that letter mentions; but shall merely observe, that the system which now prevails, of taking officers from the weak list with corps of the line, to do duty with such local corps, without filling up the deficiencies so occasioned in the corps of the line, is a manifest injury and injustice to the army; and that, if such plan continue, a large increase of officers will be necessary to prevent "the regular corps" from falling short of that number of officers which your correspondent considers requisite to the efficient maintenance of even these "irregular corps."

This leads me to the consideration of the subject I had mainly in view in addressing you--the present state of the Company's army. I believe no one at all conversant with the subject will deny, that most corps of that army are in a state of lamentable deficiency with regard to European officers; owing to the great number withdrawn permanently from the regiments to which they belong, to fill situations which prevent their ever joining their regiments. These may be comprised under the following heads:

- 1st. Employed on the general staff.
- 2d. ——— garrison, district, and other staff.
- 3d. ——— in diplomatic and political situations.
- 4th. Doing duty with local and provincial corps, with residents' escorts, the pioneers, and hill beldars.

5th. Employed in service of native princes.

6th. ——— as surveyors of roads, buildings, &c. &c.

7th. ——— in miscellaneous civil situations, many of them not in any way connected with the service of the army.

The number of officers thus withdrawn from their corps, leaves the proportion remaining for regimental duty much too small for the good of the service. Of this proof is not wanting in the wretched state of inefficiency of two detachments lately taken into the field against the Burmahs; a reference to the number of officers with the wing of the 23d, under Capt. Norton, and of a detachment of three companies of the 20th Bengal N.I., under Capt. Trueman, will fully illustrate this part of the subject.

It has been said that the principal objection to attempting a remedy of this defect is the difficulty of adopting any measure which would bear equally upon each corps. This difficulty, no doubt, does exist, in some degree, but not to such an extent as to prevent considerable relief being afforded, as I trust I shall be able to show.

In the first place, I would suggest that each regiment should be commanded by an "effective" lieutenant-colonel: by the term "effective," I mean an officer who has no appointment to prevent his joining his corps. To this effect, all lieutenant-colonels on the general staff, or in any other situation, to prevent their regiments deriving the benefit of their presence, should be supernumerary, or in excess to the number of regiments.

So far the service might be improved without causing any supercession; and the benefit would accrue to the state as well as to the individual: for a lieutenant-colonel, in permanent command of a corps, is likely to maintain a much more efficient state of discipline, and better internal economy, as well as to feel greater interest for the welfare of the men under his command, than a major, or a captain, who, though he may be fully as competent to, and as zealous in, the command of the corps, as an officer of superior rank; yet from the precarious nature of the circumstances in which he is placed, he he cannot feel himself equally identified with its interests.

The next desirable object is to increase the number of officers, in such ratio as, after deducting those who are merely borne upon the strength of corps, will leave a sufficient number for "regimental duty," and put the "effective list" of regiments upon a respectable footing, which is not now the case. This appears to me not difficult to effect.

If, for instance, the Court of Directors determine, that for a regiment of ten companies (1,000 men) a certain proportion of officers is requisite, it will be easy, by ascertaining the aggregate number of captains and lieutenants now drawn from the line, to fill situations which deprive their corps of their services, to find out the average number furnished by each corps, and an increase of officers commensurate should be added to the establishments throughout the army.

Thus, by way of illustration: taking it for granted that the infantry of the Bengal army furnishes 140 captains and 280 lieutenants for staff duty and other situations, that infantry being divided into 70 regiments, it follows that the average furnished by each regiment is two captains and four lieutenants; and these should be added to the present establishment of corps, to keep up the effective strength. The complement of ensigns should also be kept up, instead of being, as for the last ten years, incomplete. Even at this time there are not cadets sufficient in Bengal by 100 to fill up the vacancies in the infantry; the East-India Register will bear me out in this assertion. I know that the number withdrawn is more than I have assumed; if it were not, the regiments would be more effective than they are. The fact is, they have often only one, seldom more than two, and in hardly any instance more than three captains present.

Were a measure of the kind suggested to be adopted, the existing evil would be greatly remedied, and the promotion caused would benefit corps equally. It is true, after all, the number of officers present with each corps would not (any more than now) be exactly the same; as the nomination of officers to staff appointments depends upon circumstances which no government can control, and would happen unequally, taking more from one regiment than another; but this again might be remedied by officers being drafted to do duty with local and other corps (not of the line) only from such regiments as were strongest, after deducting those employed on the staff.

It appears that, when the army was newly organized and formed into regiments, some twenty-five to thirty years ago, the Court of Directors were of opinion that one half the number of officers apportioned to a King's regiment, was proper to be maintained with a Company's corps of equal strength; and 1 lieutenant-colonel, 1 major, 4 captains, 11 lieutenants, and 5 ensigns were attached to a battalion of 10 companies; and I have no doubt at that time such an establishment was ample for regimental duty. But then staff appointments were trifling in number, compared with what they now are; and few were taken from their corps in that or any other way. The same number of officers now exists; the only difference being the addition of a captain, and reduction of a lieutenant: but it exists nominally only; for, besides the immense increase of staff appointments, and other situations, many of them of a nature quite foreign to military employ, the corps of the line are still farther drained by officers being withdrawn from them to do duty with local and provincial corps, of which, under the Bengal government, there are fifteen or sixteen of each description, nearly equal to one-half the infantry of that army.

Whether such a system prevails under the other presidencies of the Indian government I know not, my experience being confined to that I have named; but if it does not, the Bengal army labours under this additional disadvantage, besides those which it is liable to in common with the other services.

The proportion of officers with the infantry regiments in Bengal has been still farther decreased by two late measures of the Government during the past year; one, ordering each corps to be increased 100 privates and 20 non-commissioned; so that, instead of 1,000 rank and file, as heretofore, they will now be 1,120 men: the other, directing four flank battalions to be raised from corps; the effect of which will be, that each corps furnishing a company to these flank battalions will lost two officers with that company; and, in furnishing a grenadier and light company, four officers. The corps from which these companies are withdrawn are, notwithstanding the impoverished state of the list of officers remaining with them, to be completed to the full establishment, by raising supplementary companies of the new strength of 100 privates and 12 naigues and havildars, without any addition of European officers.

Whether the hon. Court will have as much cause to see the impolicy of this system of keeping the establishment of officers upon the present inefficient footing, as those who have been passing the best years of their life in subaltern drudgery have to feel its hardship, remains yet to be proved.

If I have more particularly alluded to the Bengal army than any other, it is because, from long residence there, I am better acquainted with the state of things under that presidency; and that I believe some of the evils pointed out, if they do not apply exclusively to Bengal, yet apply to it in a far greater ratio than to either of the other establishments.

Your journal having already been the medium of bringing subjects of this nature before the consideration of those who have the power of remedying defects in the management of affairs in our Indian possessions, encourages me to hope that you will extend the same indulgence (if you think it equally entitled) to this letter as you have done to others.

I remain, &c.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: Having met with several articles of interest to the Indian army in your valuable miscellany, I am induced to request the favour of your insertion of the following remarks:

First, The Court of Directors are probably not aware of the great supercession many of their officers will sustain, by the late order they have sent out, and which has appeared in the Bombay Government orders of Sept 1824, deferring the brevet rank of captain until fifteen years after the date of their commissions, as 2d-lieuts., cornets, and ensigns, respectively. Many of the cadets who went to India twelve or thirteen years ago, were not promoted to ensigncies, &c. until two or three years after their landing in India; although "de facto," as much in the service of their employers, from the moment they set foot on ship-board to proceed there, as any officer of his Majesty's service. Unless this order therefore be repealed, instead of superceding, they will be superceded by, the King's officers two or three years, as well as by more fortunate individuals of their own service, whom the late alterations have brought to the verge of promotion, in some corps, while those who have been twice the time in the service remain third or fourth lieutenants, in others.

Secondly, In any alteration the Court of Directors think fit to make, regard should be had not to injure those officers, who, having entered their service under the existence of different regulations, have a right to expect the observance of them to themselves.

Thirdly, I am induced to make this remark, because the Court have already once before altered the ranking of their cadets, from the date of the season of appointment to that of their leaving England; thus depriving every officer, not then a brevet-captain, of from upwards of a year to a year and a half's rank; but this new regulation defers it until an indefinite period: it may possibly be seventeen, eighteen, or even nineteen years, before some of the Bengal cavalry cadets of the seasons 1810 and 1811 attain the rank of captain by brevet; and, during the intermediate time, they will be every day superceded by those who have not been half the time in the service, but will unavoidably be more fortunate in getting the regimental promotion.

Fourthly, The leading principle of the Company's service has hitherto been understood to be, that a certain period of service shall put every individual upon an equality, so far as depends upon government, and independent of adventitious circumstances; but these repeated alterations are subversive of that principle, and make that service one of comparative advantage to one, and hardship to another class of their servants.

Fifthly, If the Hon. Court deem it expedient pedient to assimilate their service to that of his Majesty, let the assimilation be complete; not only in such particulars as are prejudicial to their own officers, and particular classes of those officers; let them rank as his Majesty's officers do, from the period of their actually entering the public service. Until such is the case, do not take from them the operation of rules under which they entered that service, which only put them on an equality with King's officers. At all events, if the Court determine that they shall rank only from the date of their first commission, let the operation of such a rule be suspended for two or three years, when it will not be attended with its present hardship; until it shall affect only those whose landing in India and appointment as ensign, cornet, or 2d Lieut., was contemporaneous; which has been the case with those who went out since 1814. Those of later years have, in some instances, had commissions of even prior date to their landing in India; but let it not prejudice those whose misfortune has been sufficient in being kept out of that rank long after their landing, from circumstances not depending on themselves. If any one whose perusal this should meet will refer to some of the cavalry regiments of each presidency (particularly to the 4th regt. Bengal Cavalry), they will become sensible of the great hardship that the army generally will sustain, and to obviate which (in some degree) the brevet was originally given.

Sixthly, So unequally as the lieutenants of the Company's army now stand, in different regiments, with reference to their actual period of service, the practice of the Court should revert to the original regulations in use prior to 1820, as the only means of affording some relief to those who are unfortunate in their present standing, and who have enough to deplore in not being promoted by regimental rank, without the mortification of being deprived of the benefit of that usage, which would prevent their being commanded by boys. The latter will have quite sufficient solid advantages, in coming into receipt of regimental pay and allowances as captains, long before their seniors, without the invidious distinction of being put over their heads by the operation of an ex post facto regulation.

In the hope that the hon. the Court of Directors may become acquainted with the operation of this late regulation, and that, if so, they will feel disposed to grant the redress in their power, I have ventured to address you, and solicit you to oblige me, by giving publication to this letter.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: After the excellent letter of a "Bengal Retired Officer" which appeared in your Journal for last month, on the subjects of the new rank of lieutenant-colonel commandant, and the small number of European subalterns with the native regiments, there is little for me to add on those subjects.

With respect to the nondescript rank above-mentioned, there can be but one opinion, I think, or, at least, a very few exceptions. It may be very well for a London pastry-cook, or man-milliner, at the head of a corps of "home-bird" volunteers; but it is much to be regretted that such a rank should ever have been introduced into our regulars.

Every word that the "Bengal Retired Officer" has said about the subaltern rank is perfectly true; only he has overlooked the circumstance of flank companies having two lieutenants (at least in the muster rolls) and not one lieutenant and one ensign; I ought to say, it was customary in the coast army, as far as my recollection carries me.

I was never fortunate enough to obtain a staff appointment, consequently I always remained with my corps, one of the happy few, doomed to bear all the toils of guard, drills, and all the drudgery of regimental duty. I am sorry to give any portion of the military service such an ignominious term as drudgery; but when a corps is reduced, by the fortune of war, from twelve to four officers, and kept so some years, with all the same duties to be performed, it falls particularly heavy on the few, and justly deserves the appellation.

This month brings us the saddest news from Calcutta I ever heard, and I am more grieved at the punishment our poor

sepoys have met with, than at the cause: for I feel too well convinced that a bit of the old leaven has been at work, which some years since agitated the heads abroad, and caused dissatisfaction and mutinies. I allude to that baneful hankering for saving money, clipping, cutting, and retrenching. You must know, Mr. Editor, that we used to be harassed, year after year, with threats and rumours of stopping our tent allowance; and now I understand, by the newspapers, that they wanted to make an inroad on the old custom of our poor sepoys having carriage to remove their baggage from one station to another; but I will not pursue this subject.

Our Governments, I believe, are organizing militias, which are to be officered from the line: this is an additional reason for the necessity of increasing the subalterns of the native regiments. The number of officers also volunteering from the line for the Burmese war, and the ravages created by that war, will much diminish the useful subaltern arm; and it behoves us to be well provided for such contingencies, which, the longer delayed the greater the urgency, and ultimately the worse for the army: for it requires a few years to make an officer.

I beg to suggest that the complement of officers for every native regiment in the service ought to be—five captains, twelve lieutenants, and eight ensigns.

The consequent little promotion of two ensigns per regiment, to be lieutenants, would be hailed with gratitude by the army; and the addition of three more to the present number of five ensigns would be a great aid towards regimental duties, without affording cause for the well-known despair of promotion, which attends a ninth and tenth ensign.

THE SEA-SIDE.

To my lost spirit there's a holy charm
In wandering on the lonely sea-beat shore,
At evening's quiet, calm, and pensive hour,
Far from the cares of life, to meditate Wherefore and whence existence on me dawn'd;
Or if, when this delusive scene is o'er,
The thinking principle survives, and in Some happier spot, 'midst ether's wide expanse,
'Midst stars, and suns, and planetary orbs,
A glorious immortality enjoys.

There is in Nature's deep serenity,
The dark blue, heaving, solitary main,
The murmur of its ceaseless billows' roll,
The plaintive breeze that dies along the shore;
The placid moonbeams' melancholy light;
The distant hills, half fading from the view,
And seeming with their woods wrapt in repose,— Heaven's azure cope, with worlds on worlds begemmed,
In tranquil brightness smiling down on us:
There is, in this blest scene of calm delight,
A spell to soothe the grief-perturbed mind,
To purify the heart from base desires,
And raise the soul above this gross terrene.

THE ORDERS OF SOCIETY.

MR. BURKE has, wittily, as some think, and elegantly, in the opinion of others, described a certain class under the figurative designation of "The Corinthian Capitals of polished Society." Hence, probably, must be derived the epithet "Corinthian," which, in a too fashionable vocabulary, is applied to a person of elevated station who condescends to mix in, and partake of, the amusements of the licentious vulgar: a practice, which affixes a disgraceful distinction to the character of the present age.

How far the phrase thus tropically employed by the orator could safely be submitted to the rigid test of criticism, it is not my present object to inquire. I quote it merely to introduce a striking analogy which it has suggested, betwixt the orders of architecture and the orders of society; which will serve to explain and illustrate a term frequently employed, when we speak of a civilized portion of the human race in the aggregate;—namely, "The Social Fabric."

The reader shall be spared an investigation into the origin of the art of architecture; I will not consume his patience by endeavouring to decide whether the leaves of the acanthus really suggested the ornaments upon the capital of a Corinthian column; and whether the abacus was or was not a tile. I will carry my compassion still farther, by shunning the use of the obscure terms by which architects distinguish the various parts of a building. It would seem, indeed, that as this art was the original cause of the confusion of tongues, the muse, or goddess, who presided over it, took especial care that the language appropriated to its peculiar service should exhibit a distinct evidence of the event, by being what Hudibras calls "a Babylonish dialect."

The orders of architecture may be strictly reduced to three: the Doric, the Ionic, and the Corinthian. The first is chiefly distinguished by solidity, strength, and simplicity. In the severe examples of this style, every approach to unnecessary ornament is studiously avoided. The second, which retains much of the substantial character of the former, deviates from it essentially in one particular; namely, by admitting a considerable share of external embellishment. The third order abounds with decoration: strength is postponed to grace, and dense solidity is exchanged for gay magnificence.

In the construction of an edifice, where all the three orders are combined, the Doric is placed below, where it supports the upper portion of the building, for which purpose it is adapted by the characteristics it has been already shewn to possess. There is something in the very appearance of a Doric pillar which shews that it is designed to bear a great weight; and a spectator, ignorant of the rules of architecture, who saw it mounted aloft, would think it out of its place.

It requires few words to shew how happily the character and use of the Doric order coincide with those which belong or should belong to what is termed the lower order of society. By this term is not meant the very lowest, the tag-raggery, the rabble, the canaille; a class which exists, of course, in every society, and may be compared to the rubbish of the foundation. It refers to the mass of individuals, constituting the largest proportion of all nations, and consisting of the labouring and industrious classes. They form the basis of society; and their character approximates to perfection in proportion as it includes the distinguishing traits of their prototypical order, strength of body, and simplicity of manners.

A man cannot ascend at once from the lowest to the highest rank, without exhibiting a very unseemly spectacle. A ship-chandler may, as in a certain comedy, comedy, become in reality a lord, as Christophero Sly was in imagination ; but the "scent" of his origin will "hang round him still." Let it not be inferred that this observation implies the existence of a perpetual barrier between the two ranks. A Doric column, by the aid of the chisel, may be transformed, according to circumstances, into an imperfect, or a perfect, specimen of the true Corinthian.

The converse of the case may be more easily brought about by neglect or accident. The most exquisite example of an architect's skill in either of the upper orders, when bruised and battered, degraded from its position, torn from its base, and robbed of its capital, affords no index to its proportions whereby it can be distinguished from the plainest Doric.

The Ionic order, as before observed, is improved, or deteriorated—for it is difficult to determine which is the most accurate expression—by acquiring a certain share of ornament. Its proportions, too, are different from those of the former. Still, however, it is less remarkable for elegance than for strength. It takes a superior degree in the edifice, being placed above the Doric, but below the Corinthian. Hence we may assimilate the Ionic to the middle order of society ; that class of persons who aspire to some degree of taste in their pursuits, and elegance in their mode of life. They nevertheless should not altogether forsake the example of the other ; that is to say, they desert their true characteristics when, in aiming at refinement and luxury, they make an entire sacrifice of simplicity of manners. All those who possess wealth, without rank or title, are comprehended in the class which occupies that situation in the social fabric, which in the unsocial is assigned to the Ionic order.

The Corinthian style is the symbol of that exalted class which supereminet omnes. From the slender proportions of this graceful order, it is obvious that it was never designed for the support of a lofty massive building. An example of a Corinthian portico placed beneath a range of huge Doric columns would furnish as grotesque a spectacle as a nobleman in his coronation-robes carrying a sturdy coalheaver, or an archbishop in pontificalibus crouching beneath the weight of a drayman.

It happens, occasionally, that architects, not having the fear of Vitruvius and Palladio before their eyes, consult their own convenience rather than the rules of their art ; or, perhaps, out of regard for that axiom of the schools, exceptio probat regulam, disregard the rules for the sake of demonstrating the existence of them. Impelled by either of these motives, they sometimes confer upon one order the proportions of another ; thereby creating an order, or rather disorder, of their own. The reader may see an example of this hallucination in the building which is the residence of the Board of Admiralty, where an Ionic portico is supported by columns prolonged to a ridiculous excess. And so unhappily, in the social fabric, the arbitrary will of an unskilful builder places individuals in posts disproportionate to their capacities, where they invite scorn and contempt. Accident sometimes co-operates to make a more glaring disclosure of their unfitness ; as the Semaphor, on the summit of the building referred to, attracts observation to the absurdity conspicuous below it.

The parallel may be further illustrated by remarking, that a confusion of orders would be equally fatal in both cases. A building projected to be supported by columns of different height on the same level, would be in a more perilous condition than the absurd portico represented in one of the pictures of Hogarth's Marriage à la mode. On the other hand, what a lamentable spectacle does that society offer, where the subordination of ranks has ceased to be maintained !

From this last reflection, let a serious lesson be extracted. Those who are adapted by the accidental circumstances of birth, or by causes less independent of their own control, to fill a superior rank in the structure of society, should be scrupulously apprehensive of weakening their claims to the respect of their inferiors. The familiarity engendered by an association of men of rank and title with the vulgar in low and brutalizing pursuits, is calculated to prepare the way for that derangement of the orders, which may end in the total subversion of the SOCIAL FABRIC.

THE LION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

Two varieties of the lion are found in South Africa, namely, the yellow and the brown, or (as the Dutch colonists often term the latter) the blue or black lion. The dark-coloured species is commonly esteemed the strongest and fiercest. I doubt, however, whether there is any real or specific distinction; for the mere difference of colour may be either altogether accidental, or the consequence of a variation of food and climate in different districts.

The lions in the Bushmen's country, beyond the limits of the colony, are accounted peculiarly fierce and dangerous. This is doubtless owing to their acquaintance with civilized man, the possessor of the formidable roer or rifle, and still more perhaps to their natural awe of mankind having been extinguished by successful rencontres with the miserable Bushmen. These poor savages, though they possess the assagai, or Caffer javelin, are deficient in address or courage to use it, as the Caffers do, with effect upon this powerful beast of prey; and their light arrows of slender reed, though often effectual in ultimately destroying the largest and fiercest animals, by the infusion of a deadly poison through the slightest puncture, yet afford no available defence against the direct attack of this ferocious and headlong antagonist.

It is said, that when the lion has once tasted human flesh, he thenceforth entirely loses his natural awe of human superiority. It is at least too certain, that when he has once succeeded in snatching some unhappy wretch from a Bushman kraal, he never fails to return regularly every night in search of another meal; and often harasses them so dreadfully as to force the horde to desert their station; and will even follow them like a vampire throughout their wanderings, till they either succeed in destroying him, or till he has finally devoured the whole band.

From apprehensions of such nocturnal attacks from the lions, these wretched hordes are said to be in the habit of placing their aged and infirm nearest the entrance of the cave or covert where they usually sleep, in order that the least valuable may first fall a prey, and serve as a ransom for the rest.

The prodigious strength of this animal does not appear to have been overrated. It is certain, that he can drag the heaviest ox with ease a considerable way; and a horse, heifer, hartebeest, or lesser prey, he finds no difficulty in throwing upon his shoulder, and carrying off to any distance he may find convenient. I have myself witnessed an instance of a very young lion conveying a horse about a mile from the spot where he had killed it; and a more extraordinary case, which occurred in the Sneeuwberg, has been mentioned to me on good authority, where a lion, having carried off a heifer of two years old, was followed on the spoor or track for fully five hours (above thirty English miles), by a party on horseback; and throughout the whole distance, the carcass of the heifer was only once or twice discovered to have touched the ground. Many examples, not less remarkable, might easily be added, which would fully prove the lion to be far the strongest and most active animal, in proportion to his size, that is known to exist.

Mr. Barrow has represented the lion of South Africa as a cowardly and treacherous animal, always lurking in covert for his prey, and scampering off in shame and fear if he misses his first spring. I apprehend, that that intelligent traveller has in this, as in some other instances, been been led to draw an erroneous conclusion, by reasoning too hastily from limited experience or inaccurate information. The lion, it is true, not less now than in ancient times, usually "lurketh privily in secret places," and "lieth in wait" to spring suddenly and without warning upon his prey. This is the general characteristic of every variety of the feline tribe to which he belongs; and for this mode of hunting alone has nature fitted them. The wolf and hound are furnished with a keener scent and untiring swiftness of foot to run down their game: the lion and leopard are only capable of extraordinary speed for a short space; and if they fail to seize their prey at the first spring, or after a few ardent and amazing bounds, they naturally abandon the pursuit from the consciousness of being unequal to continue it successfully. The lion springs from nine to twelve yards at a single leap, and for a brief space can repeat these bounds with such activity and speed, as to outstrip the swiftest horse in a short chase; but he cannot hold out at this rate in a long pursuit, and seldom attempts it. The monarch of the forest is, in fact, merely a large cat, and he must live by using the arts of a cat. He would have but a poor chance with the antelopes, were he always magnanimously to begin roaring whenever a herd approached his lair. He knows his business better, and in fact generally couches among the rank grass or reeds that grow around the pools and fountains, or in the narrow ravines through which the larger game descend to drink at the rivers; and in such places one may most commonly find the horns and bones of the animals which have been thus surprized and devoured by him.

Even in such places, it is said, he will generally retreat before the awe-inspiring presence of man, but not precipitately, nor without first calmly surveying his demeanour, and apparently measuring his prowess. He appears to have the impression, that man is not his natural prey; and though he does not always give place to him, he will yet in almost every case abstain from attacking him, if he observes in his deportment neither terror nor hostility. But this habitual deference is not to be counted upon under other circumstances, nor even under such as now described, with entire security. If he is hungry or angry (and the latter mood of mind is supposed to be the unfailing accompaniment of a craving stomach;) or if he be watching the game he has killed, or is otherwise perturbed by rage or jealousy, it is no jest to encounter him. If he does approach, the traveller must elevate his gun and take aim at the animal's forehead before he comes close up and couches to survey or spring upon him; for in that position, though he may possibly give way to calmness and self-possession, he will tolerate no offensive movement, and will anticipate, by an instant and overwhelming bound, any attempt then to take aim at him. These observations are advanced, not in the confidence of my own slight experience, but upon the uniform testimony of many of the back-country Boors and Hottentots, with whom I have often conversed on such subjects to dissipate the craai of a dreary journey, or an evening outspann in the interior.

The Bechuana chief, old Peysho (now in Cape Town), conversing with me a few days ago about the wild animals of Africa, made some remarks on the lion, which perfectly correspond with the accounts I have obtained from the Boors and Hottentots. The lion, he said, very seldom attacks man if unprovoked; but he will frequently approach within a few paces, and survey him steadily; and sometimes he will attempt to get behind him, as if he could not stand his look, but was yet desirous of springing upon him unawares. If a person in such circumstances attempts either to fight or fly, he incurs the most imminent peril; but if he has sufficient presence of mind coolly to confront him, without appearance of either terror or aggression, the animal will, in almost every instance, after a little space, retire. But he added, that when a lion has once conquered man, he becomes tenfold more fierce and villainous than he was before, and will even come into the kraals in search of him, in preference to other prey. This epicure-partiality to human flesh in these too-knowing lions, does not, in Peysho's opinion, spring either from necessity or appetite, so much as from the "native wickedness of their hearts."

The overmastering effect of the human eye upon the lion has been frequently mentioned, though much doubted by travellers; but from my own inquiries among lion-hunters, I am perfectly satisfied of the fact; and an anecdote which was related to me, a few days ago, by Major Macintosh (late of the East-India Company's service), proves that this fascinating effect is not restricted exclusively to the lion. An officer in India (whose name I have forgot, but who was well known to my informant) having chanced to ramble into a jungle adjoining the British encampment, suddenly encountered a royal tiger. The rencontre appeared equally unexpected on both sides, and both parties made a dead halt—earnestly gazing on each other. The gentleman had no fire-arms, and was aware that a sword would be no effective defence in a struggle for life with such an antagonist. But he had heard, that even the Bengal tiger might be sometimes checked by looking him firmly in the face. He did so. In a few minutes the tiger, which appeared preparing to make his fatal spring, grew disturbed, slunk aside, and attempted to creep round upon him behind. The officer turned constantly upon the tiger, which still continued to shrink from his glance; but darting into the thicket and again issuing forth at a different quarter, it persevered for above an hour in this attempt to catch him by surprise; till at last it fairly yielded the contest, and left the gentleman to pursue his pleasure-walk. The direction he now took, as may be easily believed, was straight to the tents at a double-quick time.

Poor Gert Schepers, a Vee boor of the Cradock district, was less fortunate in an encounter with a South African lion. Gert was out hunting in company with a neighbour, whose name, as he is yet alive, and has been perhaps sufficiently punished, I shall not make more notorious. Coming to a fountain, surrounded, as is common, with tall reeds and rushes, Gert handed his gun to his comrade, and alighted to search for water. But he no sooner approached the fountain, than an enormous lion started up close at his side, and seized him by the left arm. The man, though taken by surprise, stood stock still, without struggling, aware that the least attempt to escape would ensure his instant destruction. The animal also remained motionless, holding fast the man's arm in his fangs, but without biting severely, and shutting his eyes at the same time, as if he could not withstand the countenance of his victim. As they stood in this position, Gert collecting his presence of mind, began to beckon to his comrade to advance and shoot the lion in the forehead. This might have been easily effected, as the animal not only continued still with closed eyes, but Gert's body concealed from his notice any object advancing in front of him. But the fellow was a vile poltroon, and in place of complying with his friend's directions, or making any other attempt to save him, he began cautiously to retreat to the top of a neighbouring rock. Gert continued earnestly to beckon for assistance for a long time, the lion continuing perfectly quiet; and the lion-hunters affirm, that if he had but persevered a little longer, the animal would have at length relaxed his hold and left him uninjured. Such cases at least, they maintain, have occasionally occurred. But Gert, indignant at the pusillanimity of his comrade, and losing patience with the lion, at last drew his knife (a weapon which every back-country colonist wears sheathed at his side), and with the utmost force of his right arm, plunged it into the animal's breast. The thrust was a deadly one, for Gert was a bold and powerful man; but it did not prove effectual in time to save his own life; for the enraged savage, striving to grapple with him, and held at arms-length by the utmost efforts of Gert's strength and desperation, so dreadfully lacerated the breast and arms of the unfortunate man with his talons, that in a few minutes the veins and muscles were torn to shreds, and his bare bones laid open. The lion fell at last from loss of blood, and Gert fell along with him. The cowardly companion who had witnessed this fearful struggle from the rock, now, however, took courage to advance, and succeeded in carrying his mangled friend to the nearest house; where such surgical aid as the neighbours could give was immediately but vainly applied. Poor Gert expired, on the third day after, of a locked jaw. The particulars of this story were related to me by my late neighbour, old Wentzel Koetser, of the Tarka, and by other respectable farmers in that vicinity, to whom both Schepers and his friend were well known.

The circumstances of the following anecdote, anecdote, which was related to me in the Landdrost's house, at Beaufort in the Nieuwveld, are very similar to the preceding, though not equally tragical. A boor of that district, of the name of De Clerque, one day riding over his farm, had alighted in a difficult pass, and was leading his horse through the long grass, when a lion suddenly rose up before him at a few yards' distance. He had in his hand only a light fowling piece, loaded with slugs; and hoping that the beast would give way, he stood still and confronted him (the plan universally recommended in such emergencies); but the lion, on the contrary, adventing and crouching to spring, he found himself under the necessity of firing. He took a hurried aim at the forehead, but the slugs lodged in the breast, and did not prove instantly mortal. The furious animal sprang forward, and seizing de Clerque on either side with his talons, bit at the same time his arm almost in two, as he mechanically thrust it forward to save his face. In this position he held him a few seconds, till his strength failing from loss of blood, the lion tumbled over, dragging the boor along with him in a dying embrace. De Clerque, however, escaped without any fatal injury, and had recovered and visited Beaufort a few days before I was there, in 1822.

The hero of the following story is a Hottentot of the Apter Sneuwberg. I have forgot his name, but he was alive two years ago, when the story was related to me at Cradock, in that neighbourhood. This man was out hunting, and perceiving a buck (antelope) feeding among some bushes, he approached in a creeping posture, and had rested his gun over an ant-hill to take a steady aim, when observing that the creature's attention was suddenly and peculiarly excited by some object near him, he looked up, and perceived with horror, that an enormous lion was at that instant creeping forward and ready to spring upon himself. Before he could change his posture, and direct his aim upon this antagonist, the savage beast bounded forward, seized him with his talons, and crumbed his left hand, as he endeavoured to guard him off with it, between his monstrous jaws. In this extremity, the Hottentot had the presence of mind to turn the muzzle of the gun, which he still held in his right hand, into the lion's mouth, and then, drawing the trigger, shot him dead through the brain. He lost his hand, but happily escaped without further injury.

I shall close this paper with an anecdote of Lucas van Vuuren, a Vee boor, residing on the late Colonel Graham's farm of Lyndoch, and for two years my next neighbour at the Bavian's river. It shews that even our colonial lions, when pressed for a breakfast, will sometimes forget their usual respect for "Christian men," and break through their general rule of "let-a-be for let-a-be." Lucas was riding across the open plains, near the Little Fish river, one morning about day-break, and observing a lion at a distance, he endeavoured to avoid him, by making a wide circuit. There were thousands of spring-boks scattered over the extensive flats; but the lion, from the open nature of the country, had probably been unsuccessful in hunting. Lucas soon perceived, at least, that he was not disposed to let him pass without further parliance, and that he was rapidly approaching to the encounter; and being without his roer, and otherwise little inclined to any closer acquaintance, he turned off at right angles, laid the sambok freely to the horse's flank, and galloped for life. But it was too late; the horse was fagged, and bore a heavy man on his back; the lion was fresh, and furious with hunger, and came down upon him like a thunder-bolt. In a few seconds he overtook, and springing up behind Lucas, brought horse and man in an instant to the ground. Luckily the Boor was unhurt, and the lion was too eager in worrying the man to pay any immediate attention to the horse. Hardly knowing himself how he escaped, he contrived to scramble out of the fray, and made a clean pair of heels of it till he reached the nearest house. Lucas, who gave me the details of this adventure himself, made no observations on it as being any way remarkable, except in the circumstance of the lion's audacity in pursuing a "Christian man," without provocation, in open day. But what chiefly vexed him in the affair was the loss of the saddle. He returned next day with a party of friends to search for it, and take vengeance on his feline foe. But both the lion and saddle had disappeared, and nothing nothing could be found but the horse's clean-picked bones. Lucas said he could excuse the schelm for killing the horse, as he had allowed himself to get away; but the felonious abstraction of the saddle (for which, as Lucas gravely observed, he could have no possible use) raised his spleen mightily, and called down a shower of curses whenever he told the story of this hair-breadth escape.*

THE BURMAN EMPIRE.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: A connected and concise description of the topography and history of the Burman empire would be a suitable article to accompany the accounts of the progress of the war, in the Asiatic Journal. I flattered myself to have seen it 'ere this, as the subject must excite a lively and universal interest; and the extensive circulation of the Asiatic Journal must carry it into countries and situations too remote for Europeans to procure easily books treating of it. I have been some years in the Indian army, and can say I very seldom had it in my power to procure books; I am, therefore, sure that some topographical and historical description of the country we are contending with, in a periodical work of such a wide range as the Journal must have, would be highly acceptable to my old friends and acquaintances in India. With the view of contributing my mite to the above subject, I present you the following extract from an early traveller, giving the ancient account of those countries, now the seat of war, or bordering thereon, which may afford entertainment to those of your readers, who, as well as myself, feel an extraordinary interest in every thing connected with the services of our Indian army. I have given the ancient spelling with all its faults; and should you think this communication worthy of insertion, I hope it will excite some abler hand to take up and pursue the subject. Some of my brother officers, now in that country, may have the best of opportunities of collecting materials for such a work; and I would hint to them not to let them pass unprofitably.

The extract referred to is from Vincent Leblanc's Travels. His veracity is much questioned at the present day; but as a brother traveller and myself have found him correct in as far as our own travels enable us to judge, we are inclined to think more favourably of him. The book was printed in 1660, and is entitled, "The World Surveyed: or the famous Voyages and Travailes of Vincent le Blanc, or White, of Marseilles; who, from the age of fourteen years to threescore and eighteen, travelled through most parts of the world: viz. The East and West-Indies, Persia, Pegu, the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco, Guinny, and through all Africa, from the Cape of Good Hope into Alexandria, by the territories of Monomotapa, of Preste John and Egypt, into the Mediterranean Isles, and through the principal provinces of Europe, &c. &c. Originally written in French, and faithfully rendered into English, by F. B. Gent."

OF BENGAL.

Bengale is bounded eastward by the province of Edaspa, that joins to the Kingdom of Aracan; one of its limits southward is Castigan, or Catigan (Chatigam or Chitigong), at the third mouth of the Ganges, over against the kingdom of Verma, or Barma, where are the mines of chrysolites, sardonix, and topases.

Verma (Burma) hath formerly belonged unto the kingdom of Bengale: the people are very civil, and given to trade. Catigan (Chitigong) belongs to the kingdom of Bengale, which reaches over 400 leagues of land; and the Lordship of Aracan, a kingdom kingdom between Bengale and Pegu, stronger by sea than land, and wages often war with Pegu, and some years since (they say) hath swallowed up Pegu, but ruined by neighbours, and therefore the king is called King of Aracan, Tiparat, Chacomas (Cachar?), Bengale, and Pegu.

OF SIAM.

The town of Siam stands upon the fair and large river of Mekan, that springs from the famous lake of Chiamay: it is stately walled, and contains 30,000 houses, with a castle strongly walled, built upon the water, as Venice. Chiamay lake is 200 miles about; whence many great and famous rivers arise; as Ava, Caypumo, Menan, Cosmin, and others; they overflow like the Nilus. This lake is bounded eastward with vast forests and impassable marshes and fens. The kingdom of Siam hath formerly suffered many changes, some few years before we were there. It was subject to continual revolutions, till Bramas, King of Pegu, took occasion to besiege Odias; but leaving his life in the siege, his successor utterly demolished the town, and obtained the white elephant I spoke of; since then, Siam hath revenged herself upon Pegu.

OF MARTABAN.

From Siam we came to the kingdom and town of Martaban, sometime subject to Pegu, but since to the kingdom of Siam. There is plenty of rice and other sorts of grain; mines of mettals, rubies, and other stones, and the aire is very wholesome. The capital town is Martaban, sixteen degrees north; it hath a good harbour, scituate upon the river Caypumo, or rather an arme of the sea, where the tide runs strangely towards Pegu; for, whereas ordinarily it flows by degrees, with an easy motion, without violence; but here it fills that arme of the sea or river on a sudden, and flows with such fury and impetuosity, as it were mountains rolled up in water; and the most rapid torrent in the world doth not parallel this in swiftness; and, by three passages, fills the harbour with a most fearfull force and rapidity. Martaban joins to the territories of Dougon, the remotest town of Pegu. At Martaban, some years before we made our travails there, a rich and potent king, named Chaubaina, was besieged by Bramna of Pegu. That inhumane tyrant of Pegu put him to a cruell death, and sack't that flourishing town: this town had twenty-four gates.

OF PEGU.

We went from Martaban to Pegu, four small dayes' journey distant by land, and no more by sea, although 'tis much further; but their frigates swift sayling bring all to one; and putting forth with the tyde, if your ship strikes upon a rock, and is able to bear the shock, it glides over like a baloon; for no arrow flies fleetly. I have not seen the like fury of the seas in any place of the world as at Martaban and Pegu; for there is a gulph of water, and the tyde taking her course, meets with those waters; the one rolling against the main body of the sea, there is a terrible conflict, they withstand each other for a time, at length the weakest must yield, the two bodies separate with such swiftness and vehemency, that it seems a great hill overturned; nor is there a courage so great it daunts not; and where before a hollow was seen empty and dry, covered over with ships on a suddain, the surges are so violent, you would believe the infernal powers were all united to toss those ships.

The kingdom of Pegu is one of the largest, richest, and most potent of the Indies, next to the Mogul (Mogor) and China, but to the two last are lately happened strange revolutions; they are extremely fallen off from their state, and have been dismembered by the kings of Tangu (Tongho) and Aracan, who had in my time the possession of the white elephant, that bred so much contention in Siam.

This kingdom, in my dayes, contained many others; viz. two empires, containing twenty-six crowned states. Southward, Pegu confines upon Martaban and Siam, eastward, upon Bramas, Camboya, and Cauchin Chine; northward, upon Ava, Taxatay, and Aracan; westward, upon the gulf of Bengale. The town of Pegu is very large, and square, five gates at every side, encompassed with a deep work or trench, full of water-crocodils. The walls are built of wood, with watch-towers of rich work and gilt, gilt, repaired every tenth year: the houses are stately edifices. At New Pegu the King keeps his court: the streets are exactly streight and large. About the heart of the town you discover almost all the streets, which is a gallant curiosity. Old Pegu is built after the same model, and there the merchants inhabit.

In new Pegu the streets are set with palm-trees, and cocoas loaden with fruit: the new town was framed and built by the line, near a forest of palmes, towards the north, in a large field. In the trenches (filled with water by the river that washes that coast) there are certain baths accommodated purposely. The towne is as bigge as Fes. The king's pallace stands at the farther end of new Pegu, sheltered from the north wind by a little hill: there grow all sorts of trees, five sorts of palm trees, inclosed with a wall like a park. From Pegu to Siam 'tis sixty-five dayes' journey by camels. You hear for what reasons the King of Pegu waged war with Siam, that bred so much ruin and desolation—for a white elephant only; a fatal and unhappy beast that hath cost the lives of five kings, as it happened to the last King of Pegu, who had it lately taken from him by the King of Aracan.

The king's pallace is built square, with a dosme: at every corner stands the statue of a gyant of polisht marble, who, Atlas-like, upheld this goodly fabrick; and are represented with such tortions of face, you would think they complain of their load. The stone 'tis built with is smooth, and resplendent as glasse: 'tis environed in with a deep trench. You enter over a draw-bridge, through a gate of excessive height and strength, where are the figures of a gyant and his wife, each of a piece, and of a mixed coloured marble: the pavement is of the same. They spare neither gold nor azure, and in galleries you shall see carved the histories of all their wars. From thence you descend some steps of marble into a lower court, encompassed with ballisters or rails, where there is a pleasant fountain, whence the water is conducted into severall gardens by pipes; the gardens are fenced with strong walls, one of them is three miles long; the river Caypumo runs through one end of the garden, westward: there are many other gardens and palaces nearer hand, built of marble and porphyry, and a lake a mile about. One of these palaces is allotted the queen and her court, which joyns to a park stored with exquisite and rare beasts. In the lake belonging to the king's palace are seen all sorts of water-fowl; and near this palace there is another park stored with tame beasts and birds. There is also a park for lions, tigers, and other fierce beasts; and 'tis a sad and dayly sight to see criminalls devoured by them.

The kingdom of Pegu is rich in mynes of gold and silver, rubies, saphyrs, garnets, and other precious stones: these daily augment the king's treasures. In one court of his pallace at New Pegu, there is such store, that 'tis little esteemed, not one man to guard it, nor the dores kept shut. There stands a figure or statue of a proper tall man, all of beaten gold, a crown upon his head of the same, enriched with rubies; and round it four statues more, of youths, all of gold, which seem to be idols. In another court is represented a gyant sitting, of silver, with a crown of the same, but far richer set with rubies. In other courts stand statues made of gause, a mixture of many metals: the crowns of these latter are richer than the others, with rubies and saphyrs.

The Peguans go all clothed alike, in cottons, linnens, and silks the best; and all are barefoot ever, whether walking or riding. Their buildings are costly, carved and wrought, sparing neither gold nor azure. When the king or any nobleman builds a palace, he provides himself with the purest gold to gild it. At Old Pegu are many refyners, and gold and silver-beaters, who work it into leaves (as we do) for the ease of the gilders; for they gild the very walls and towers, and their houses, after the Persian fashion. New Pegu is almost all so built, and nothing spared to make up a sumptuous splendid structure. Merchants, and other tradesmen, and shop-keepers, live in strong houses well-built, of stone or brick, close shut with strong gates and locks, and call ~~these~~ houses, godoms.

The kingdom of Pegu is cut through in many places by that great river, called (by the higher Indians) Amoucherat; and by the natives, the river of Pegu, or Caypumo, the Marahan, that runs by several branches through the level, and fertilizes the soyle. This river rises at the lake Chinay, passes through Brama, or Brama, washing it with her

her waves refined gold. She runs through the kingdom of Prom, where are the famous towns of Milintay, Calamba, and Amirandou (Amirapoor?), those two cities joyn Ave; then to Boidia (Camboja?), called by the higher Indians, Siam; then to Berma, or Verma, whereof the capital is Carpa, and thence upon Tasatay, and the kingdoms of Pandior and Muentay. The King of Pegu subjected the kingdom of Berma two years after he conquered Siam. Then there are Vilep, Abdiare, and Caypuma, whereof the chief is Canarene.

The king, by his lieutenant, hath conquered many other countries, who subdued all the provinces of Siam, Berma, Javay, Manar, and others, unto the kingdom of Perperi, Tarnassarim, Maragouri, Guertale, Langoura, Nigrane (Negrais?), and Joncolan (Jonkseylon?), that touches Malacca. Winning Siam, he got Ben (Bancock?), Ploan, Odian, Macaou, and others, conquered before by the King of Siam.

The town of Dagon (Dougou?) is two dayes' journey from Pegu: Martaban is four: Guzan, two days journey from Caponin, where begins the great gulph of Saharie, at the mouth of the Caypuma. This river, with that of Ava and Siam, overflows like the Nile, from mid May to mid August, which improves the country very much.

The climate is so temperate that 'tis green all the year long; the people are rather whites than blacks, and well shap'd; women, gay and neatly dress'd, but all wear white.

Some years before we arrived, there was in the country a king of the ancient royall race, who had many deputies in the countrey of Berma, towards the lake Chiamay; amongst the rest, one in the kingdom of Tangu, that rebelled against him, defeated and slew him, and made himself King of Pegu. They called him the Brama of Tangu, a great and potent tyrant, who, by force of armes, joyned many kingdoms to his empire; as Prom, Melintay, Calcam, Bacam, Mirandu, Ava, Martaban, and others. He afterwards was put to death by a Peguan lord, called Xemin, or Zatan, who made himself King, but was defeated and slain by another, called Xouindoo, who likewise, being made king, was not long after defeated and put to death by Chaumigren, of near alliance to Braman, who became one of the most powerfull kings that hath reigned in Pegu, who brought totally under the empire of Siam, with twelve other great kingdoms more.

The king that reigned in Pegu in our time, called Brama, was, as I think, the son of this Chaumigren, afterwards hard enough dealt with by the kings of Tangu, Aracan, and Syan. But it is time to advance to the provinces and towns of high India, subject or confining, and neighbours to Pegu; as Abdiare, Vilep, Canarene, Cassubi, Transiano, Tasatay, Mandranella, Tartary, and others.

Persevering in our traffick through the towns and provinces of this great empire of Pegu, we came to the town of Abdiare, and Vilep, a kingdom in high India, subject to the Peguan. We parted from Vilep with a good company, and within three hours came to the descent of a hill, exceeding shady, near a pleasant fountain, where the whole company stayed for refreshment. Proceeding on our way, at length we took to the river Jiame, and in three days came to the village called Tanza; and, on the morrow, to Canarene, a faire town, rich and flourishing as any in India, the capital of a kingdom of the same name; confining eastward on the country of Tasatay, south on Carpa, and northward on Moantay, a great kingdom. The town is seated betwixt two great rivers, Jiame and Pegu; it is in circuit about foure leagues, magnificently built. In customes and conditions, the people differ much from those of Pegu, for they never go barefoot. The king of Canarene is potent and wealthy in mines of gold and silver; he hath also one of emerald, and some mines of turkesses (turquoises).

The cold is so sharp and rigorous here in the monsoon winds, that travellers lose their toes. From the town of Canarene we made some dayes to the Mandranella, a faire town, fifty leagues from Tasatay, upon the Zingis, a large and deep river, that bears great vessels. They traffick with the Chineses, and the people of Bugazan come thither for all necessaries. From Mandranella we went to Cassubi, both a kingdom and a town (sometime subject to the King of Bengale), where we first discovered a most high mountain, and then the town. The town of Cassubi is faire, great, and of good traffic; the men of good stature, and something tawny; the women very beautiful and kind; and the aire there is likewise temperate.

The town is environed by high mountains, garnished with pure fountains, and fruit trees of all sorts, but chiefly quinces: here grow, likewise, excellent grapes. Upon the trees there is abundance of manna, which they gather diligently before sun-rising; for it dissipates and vanishes so soon as the sun-rayes come upon it. They sell it very cheap, though it is very purgative. I remember that gathering some once of a tree that resembles our sallows, I thought I had taken scammony.

The town is crossed by the great river Paroget, stored with merchandizes of all sorts: There is a vast space encircled with walls, in the middle whereof stands the palace royall, where there is kept a great market of all sorts of merchandizes, thickly ermynskins, and martins of three kinds. We made some stay at Casubi to sell and truck our merchandizes.

From Casubi we took our way towards Macharana, a daye's journey and a half from thence, which I may reckon about fifteen leagues, and came to a village entirely surrounded with palisadoes, close by a pleasant river.

Still, as we travelled through these parts, we were every where troubled with apes and monkeys. 'Twas our custom, in the fields, to erect a little tent of cotton cloth, with a pole in the middle, and cords to hold it; and having made our repast, we went to rest, while two of our company stood sentinel, to see that our horses or beasts of carriage strayed not away. The author travelled from Casubi to Transiane with a numerous convoy of all nations—Moors, Gentops, Malabates, and others—because there is no other travelling through these forests, repleat with tigers and other fierce beasts. The town of Transiana, which is likewise the name of the kingdom lying between the towns of Sian and Tinco, is the last in subjection to the empire of Pegu towards the north; having westward the province or kingdom of Tazatay; northward, the kingdom of Carforan; south, Pegu; and eastward, Cauchinchine, situate upon a pleasant river that comes from the lake D-Aracan. The country is temperate enough, except in the extreme heats of summer, when they must of necessity travel by night.

Here they have a myne of diamonds, besides those of gold and silver in abundance. The people are insolent and proud; of make and fashion, like the Persians. The prince is very powerful, and is provided with a thousand elephants. The country hath the fairest and most fertile herbage in the world, and abounds in all sorts of commodities. As we travelled through the country, we came one day to a mountain of extraordinary height, called Culma, or Columa, grown over with all sorts of trees, as sandal, danum, ebony, palmes of all sortes, and others. These mountains have a resemblance to the Cordilleras of Peru, of a long extent.

West of Transiana lies the kingdom of Tazatay, otherwise called the Red Kingdom, or the Land of Liarrean, or Hiarcan. Leaving the town of Transiana, after three dayes' traivale we came on the top of a mountain called Brasisir; here we had convenient accommodation that night. In the morning, going down, we crossed a river, and came to another great mountain; having ascended, we arrived at Tamboo, and alighted from our beasts. We found plenty of provisions for our refreshment, and a good old man and his wife gave us freely of what they had. Beyond this mountain was another, which the author visited, and from thence returned to Pegu, where he took shipping for San Thomase, on the Coromandel coast, and Goa.

I include no extracts about Tartary, or rather Tibet, or Boutan, as the author candidly acknowledges all he has written about that country was from the report of other merchants he met at Pegu.

Of Aracan, he says "betwixt Pegu and Bengale there is a kingdom called Aracan, the prince whereof is very potent, rather by sea than land, and often wars upon Pegu."

EAST-INDIA HOUSE DEBATES.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Why, really, Mr. Editor, you must be half-ruined by the mass of paper you have given us this month for our two shillings and sixpence; and all owing to the long-winded speeches by our India-House orators. I am sometimes forced up to that sink of corruption, and centre of elegance, London; and there, among other tedious things, I hear these same speeches; and when dressed out by you, in your Journal, I am sure I read them quite a different thing from what they sounded in my old ears in the uncouth room where I saw, the other day, much squabbling in selling that promoter of scandal and disturber of sleep, ten, which, in our next charter, we must, somehow or other, contrive to sell cheaper.

We country-proprietors are impressed with the most exalted ideas of the transcendent talents and merits of the Marquess of Hastings. We think that he has done more for the Company than all former governors, great as the merits of some of them may have been. He got through two wars of unprecedented difficulty, with consummate talents and address. He has doubled our revenues without committing the integrity of the British public character. He served his friends, probably, less than any former governor-general. No specific charge of mal-administration, and much less of corruption, is brought against him. His whole administration, in difficult times, was a complete model of good government. Though possessed of absolute power, who can say, and much less prove, that he abused it? By able combinations, and judicious foresight, he brought to a happy conclusion, a war, that at one time threatened the annihilation of British power in India. Had he remained there, the savage Burmese war had never happened. If forced on him by the rude barbarian, whose white elephant is suckled by twelve females, he would have made a diversion on the side of Rangoon, while the main army would have entered on the north-west side, and would have got to the capital. Thus, the war would have been terminated without the disaster at Chittagong, and the consumption of life in the swamps of Rangoon. As things are, Mr. Editor, we shall add three millions to our debt, and be forced, ultimately, to add to the British oriental empire the territories of the king of the white elephants; as they are, by much, too near our capital to be allowed to remain, without check or control, in the hands of a malignant and desperate enemy. Those who are most conversant in the affairs of India, have, on the soundest principles, invariably maintained what recent experience strengthens and confirms into a standing political axiom; which is, that at all times, the Governor-General of India ought to be a high military character of known talents and repute. As often as we deviate from this rule of true wisdom, the risk is incurred of losing an empire held by public opinion and the sword.

Much useless expenditure arises frequently from an idle practice among our proprietors and members, in too often calling for the printing of papers, of which little or nothing is heard afterwards. These papers, however, evince at once, the splendid political and military talents of Lord Hastings, and the able and vigilant superintendence of the Court of Directors, in an efficient discharge of their vast duties. Lord Hastings, like all human beings, may have his amiable weaknesses; and in the strongest minds, this milk of human nature is most prevalent; but, at the same time, there breathes not a character of higher feelings of honour, or of more unspotted integrity. We, ignorant and rusticated proprietors, were utterly astonished at the long debates about nothing, and without any rational object in view. We were still more surprised to see a question brought to ballot that had little more to do with the late Governor-General than the Emperor of China. We owe a great debt of gratitude to this distinguished nobleman, and let us discharge it, in part at least, by speedily granting to him the pension of five thousand a year. I, old as I am, will readily take a long journey to vote what was never better merited. I would act from feelings of justice, having never received any favours from this beneficent nobleman, who has not been well-treated, however unintentionally.

THREE STARS IN THE HOUSE.

A PICTURE OF THE MORAL AND POLITICAL CONDITION OF GREECE IN THE YEAR 1824.

By MICHAEL SCHINAS, A NATIVE OF GREECE.*

DESCENDANTS of those to whom Europe is indebted for its knowledge and its civilization; reduced to servitude by the followers of a barbarous and intolerant creed, the Greeks took up arms to rid themselves of the yoke: pro aris et focis, was their motto; deliverance or death, was their prospect. The anarchy which prevailed in the different parts of the Ottoman empire, and the symptoms of decay which it manifested; the war between the Turks and the Persians, and their broils with a great northern power; the proximity of the Bulgaro-Servian and Wallacho-Moldavian people, who were Christians, and ought to make common cause with the Greeks; the interests duly appreciated of common and general policy; and, finally, the support of Christian Europe, and especially of that preponderating power, for whose objects Greece has so many times been sacrificed: these were the foundations of their hopes. Nevertheless, experience soon proved to the Greeks the fallacy of the calculations which had seduced their imagination. The pachas might have grounds of complaint against the sultan or his ministers; they might raise the standard of revolt; but the standard was ~~not~~ that of the prophet, and they never assist infidels who endeavour to ~~withdraw~~ themselves from the sacred authority of the caliph. The people of the Save and Lower Danube, comprising a population of nearly two millions, remained inactive. The incapacity of those who had the management of affairs in Wallachia wonderfully assisted the schemes of certain foreign agents, labouring upon the spot to maintain the ancient order of things. The monarchs of Europe, in the last place, and especially their ministers, prepossessed with the danger attending sudden and unforeseen innovations in politics, hurled their solemn anathemas against the enterprize of the Greeks. They conceived themselves bound to regard it in the same point of view as the commotions in the west; whereas it was but a legitimate defence of man's social rights: and this deplorable misapprehension, springing from a false system of politics, restrained them from aiding a generous nation, whom, on the contrary, they abandoned to its fate.

Such were the circumstances under which the insurrection burst forth in the Morea, in the Spring of 1821. To stifle it in its infancy would have been the work of energy combined with prudence. But rage took possession of the sultan's mind; he meditated a massacre like that which the Roman historians charge upon Mithridates†. The sword of vengeance, in the hands of a ferocious people, ~~flashed~~, though indistinctly, over all the Greeks. The eastern church was decimated; its temples were overthrown or profaned. Families lamented their supporters, whom, exiles and wanderers, they beheld languishing in banishment and misery. Constantinople, Smyrna, Cydonia, Salonica, Cyprus, offered to the nations of Europe, aghast with horror, the spectacle of the slaughter of thousands of unarmed Greeks. Thenceforward all compact was at an end. The flames spread far and wide: Candia, most of the isles, Livadia, part of Epirus, struck up the hymn of liberty. Despair created resources; every thing was converted into a weapon,—men marched to sieges with clubs,— and necessity revived, as it were, the heroic times. Individuals opened their purses to defray the expenses of the war; the people offered their arms; the merchant-vessels of the islands braved the fire of the tyrant's proud fleets, which they soon began to handle roughly under the command of Toubasi. Every man of influence became a chief; every Greek, a soldier. The people, strange to the use of arms, and to the air of freedom, commenced their military education in skirmishes, and a war of partizans. Their blows were uncertain: often terrified by the phantom of tyranny, the images of whose rod and fetters were perpetually before their eyes, they were on the point of laying down their arms. But unlooked-for success reanimated their courage, and re-inspired them with confidence; and they completed their education in this salutary conflict. Soon afterwards, the insurgents got possession of Malvasia, Navarin, and Tripolizza. Corinth capitulated towards the close of the year. The representatives of the people then assembled under the presidency of Alexander Mavrocordato, and proclaimed, upon the ruins of ancient Epirus, the independence of Greece. Laws were required: they promulgated a provisional constitution, and formed a central government, which they swore to defend. The executive was vested in a senate, composed of deputies from the provinces, in conjunction with a council of five members. A supreme tribunal superintended the conduct of those of a subordinate rank. The government was to continue always national; that is to say, its object was to be always the good of the greatest number; but, in peace, it was to admit modifications which experience sanctioned. Months glided away. Greece, scarcely informed of the unseasonable insurrection at Chios, learned the catastrophe of that flourishing country. The succour despatched by the national government arrived too late. But Canaris flew from Psara (Ipsara) with the torch in his hand; he fell upon the Barbarians at Chios; and the Capitan Pacha found a grave in his blazing vessel. The hero of Psara afterwards attacked the enemy's fleet in the port of Tenedos, and forced it to fly to the Dardanelles. Nevertheless, the fall of Ali Pacha, and the wealth furnished by his treasury, had driven the Albanian hordes towards the rocks of Suli. The Suliots, after a resistance almost preternatural, capitulated through want of succours, and quitted their country with the honours of war. The battle of Peta was lost. Acarnania and Ætolia were invaded; but the bravery and resolution of the immortal Bozzaris and of Mavrocordato saved Missolonghi, besieged by the Turks, as well as Peloponnesus, and frustrated all the projects of the enemy. The citadel of Athens had surrendered to the Greeks, whilst discord raged in Livadia. Favoured by the disputes between Odysseus and some of the members of government, a corps of 30,000 Turks penetrated into the northern part of the Morea, surprised Corinth, and dispersed the government, which did not rally till on board a national flotilla, then cruising into the Argolic gulph (the Gulph of Napoli). Hypsilantis, Colocotronis, and Nikitas, opposed their own courage and that of a handful of brave men to the torrent of invasion, and the Morea was saved. The enemy perished in detail; Napoli de Romani opened its gates, and Corinth followed its example. At the beginning of 1823, a general meeting assembled at Astros, on the confines of Laconia, and the Argolis, and the offices of the government were refilled, in the terms of the constitution. Peter Mavromichalis was named president; Theodore Colocotronis, Sotiris Charalampis, Andrew Zaimis, and Andrew Metaxas, composed the executive council. A misunderstanding, however, soon discovered itself between the senate and this body, who wished to get rid of the shackles of law and to act separately. Whilst these transactions were taking place, the Pacha of Scodra, at the head of 20,000 men, marched against Western Greece. Bozzaris met him at Carpenissi (Karpenish), repulsed him, and died gloriously. The Pacha penetrated into Ætolia with fresh reinforcements, and besieged Anatolica; but the heroism of a feeble garrison forced him to retire, and to evacuate all this portion of the Greek territory. The Morea presented a very different scene. Dissension broke out amongst the constituted authorities. The senate separated from the executive council, quitted Tripolizza, and returned to Cranidi, a little town situated towards the extremity of the eastern entrance of the Argolic gulph. Conformably to the terms of the law, a committee of nine senators was appointed to investigate the subject of their retirement. This committee, in a solemn report to the senate, charged the majority of the executive council with trampling the laws under foot; with a desire to govern despotically, and with a view to private interest; with appropriating to themselves the public revenue; and with giving themselves up to every species of disorder. The senate, consequently, declared the retired members to have forfeited their office. This was to them the signal of revolt. New elections took place; and George Condouriotis, of Hydra, was called to the presidency; Panniotis Botassiss, of Spezzia, was made vice-president; J. Colettis, A. Spiliotakis, Nicolas Londres, were their colleagues; Theodoret, Bishop of Bristhenes, presided in the senate, composed of nearly fifty deputies. Such were the first occurrences in the year 1824.

The troubles attending this intestine discord consumed the time and means necessary for opening the campaign. The Greeks, therefore, far from acting on the offensive, were fortunate in incurring as little loss as possible from an enemy who presented himself under the most menacing aspect. Tripolizza, Corinth, Napoli, were in the hands of the malcontents. The government, weary of negotiation, and certain of the people's support, decided upon energetic measures. They established themselves at the wind-mills, two leagues from Napoli; from whence they declared the malcontents enemies of their country, and adopted measures to reduce them to obedience. The malcontents were blockaded, and beaten in the environs of Argos, Tripolizza, Calamata, and wheresoever they appeared. The people every where declared for the laws. Soon after, the garrison of Corinth sent in its submission; and Theodore Colocotronis evacuated Tripolizza. Napoli opened its gates, after a three months' siege, and the government made its solemn entry therein towards the end of June. Uniting moderation to firmness, like every wise and national authority, they healed the wounds of the country by proclaiming a general amnesty. Having tranquillized interior feuds, and closed the hideous gulph of civil war, they turned their attention towards the enemy, who had already exerted upon different points the fury of his ravages. Towards the south, Candia had been invaded, and a part of its population carried into slavery. The courageous efforts made in the isle of Cussos (Caxo) could not preserve it from the exasperated attacks of an enemy who effected its ruin. To the north, the Capitan Pacha, having failed in a descent made upon the Thessalian isle of Skiatho, succeeded in throwing supplies into the places on Negropont. His fleet having retired to Mitylene, disgorged thousands of murderers upon Psara; and this little islet, a scene of the sublimest devotion, became the tomb of the victors and the vanquished. This terrible stroke opened every eye. Far from dispiriting the Greeks, it powerfully excited their courage. The sentiments of the people, as well as of the rulers, became exalted in proportion to the events, and measured the gravity and extent of the danger with the calmness of general resolution. "To be, or not to be; that was the question." Maritime operations operations were those upon which, from the plans pursued by the enemy, the fate of this campaign, and even of the whole war, seemed especially to depend; and the Greek marine was immediately put upon a respectable footing. Psara was retaken, its fleet was saved, and the rock abandoned. The enemy was beaten before Samos, Cos, Chios, always by an inferior force. His fleets were no longer burnt by night, and whilst in port; but under full sail, and in open day. At length he sustained new losses in the sea of Candia: this last victory affords reason to hope that the Greeks of this important island, who still defend themselves in the positions of St. Roumeli, Trypiti, Mirabello, and Lassidi, will hasten to desert them for offensive objects, and to deliver their brethren from the yoke of a satrap of Egypt. If we cast our eyes over the continent of Greece, we perceive, every where, the same perseverance, and the same success. In the east, the invincible Goura repulsed the barbarians on the field of Marathon. Dervisch Pacha, the commander-in-chief, completely beaten at Gravia and at Anplani, in Phocis, fled, and left all his baggage behind him. In western Greece, Mavrocordato, the director-general, adopting seasonably the most efficacious measures, disconcerted the plans of Omar Pacha, who flattered himself with the hope of being able to invade Acarnania and Ætolia for the third time. Besides which, the Greeks, acting on the offensive, penetrated to the walls of Arta.

Such are the military results of this year. Amongst the difficulties of all kinds which seem to be multiplied, by a deplorable fatality, to the prejudice of the weakest, the Greeks make complaints against the agents of certain Christian powers employed in the Archipelago. It would be easy to tell what nations these agents belong to, and to cite their names and nations: documentary evidence in this respect is not wanting. But we should be drawn into discussions foreign to our purpose, and to the nature of this paper. Let us now examine the internal condition of the country.

Greece, whilst under the yoke, furnished many millions to the sultan's treasury, and to the wealth of the nobles and of individual Ottomans.* Restored to itself, it was without resources. This poverty is merely apparent and transient; it was owing to the want of a firm and regular administration, which could prevent the pillage of the public property. Moreover, the ravages caused by the invasions, of which the Morea and the trans-Isthmic provinces were the theatre in 1822 and 1823, paralyzed agriculture, and suspended all private transactions. A wise and vigilant authority has already removed in part the traces of these misfortunes, and it is fully competent to maintain and to perfect its work, if, as it is rumoured, its powers be prolonged for a second year. The impost already, distributed in just proportion, begins to find its way into the national coffers. The state property is publicly confirmed: this immense territory, the fruit of the progressive rapacity of the conquerors, seems to have been deposited in their hands to recompense one day the courage of the emancipated people: they ought to receive back what belonged to them from time immemorial. Urgent necessity dictated the sale of a portion of this territory, in the beginning of the year; but favourable as this project was to the increase of the number of proprietors, as well as to public prosperity, it is now deferred until a calmer period. A severe responsibility is introduced into the expenditure. A loan contracted under advantageous conditions has laid the foundation of national credit. The confidence which is now appearing, tends tends to encourage industry of every kind, and to cause the circulation of the representative sign of value. Commerce is reviving. Absorbed by the efforts of an unequal contest, the Greeks seem, during three years, not to have been the same people who came round to offer Europe, when at war, the products of their hazardous speculations. Foreign tonnage supplied, in its turn, aid to them during their contest. But last year, the hospitable ports of Ancona, of Leghorn, and of Marseilles, beheld Greek vessels once more bringing the productions of their country under the independent flag. We have seen this flag cruising about, welcomed every where, coasting the peninsula, passing the pillars of Hercules, and floating even to the banks of the Thames.

Every thing in Greece puts off the dull hue of slavery, and assumes the brilliant uniform of liberty. Judicious regulations of the police now prevent or extinguish the germs of a destructive disease, which the stupidity of the late government conceived it almost a duty to protect. Public health being guaranteed, the facility of communication can be provided for; and post-offices are established on several of the principal routes. Inspectors are appointed to the ports. Military administration is not abandoned to the will of the chiefs, whose attention is engrossed by the cares of their commands. Special officers are nominated to superintend the various wants of the camps; and a better order is beginning to prevail throughout all the departments of the public service. The government has resumed the organization of the corps of regular troops, instituted in 1821, and dissolved in 1822, owing to imperious circumstances. The military code of France is adopted by Greece. The distribution of justice is in the most approved forms. The judicial hierarchy has been already established according to convenient gradations: there is a first tribunal and a chamber of appeal at Missolonghi. Arbitrary power is banished; a citizen can be arrested only according to legal forms; he is tried immediately, and is acquitted or condemned in open court. Thought is free; and the public mind has full exercise. Four Journals appear twice a week: at Missolonghi, The Greek Chronicle, and The Greek Telegraph: at Hydra, The Friend of the Law, the government journal: at Athens, The Ephemerides of Athens. All four are edited in an excellent spirit, that of the genuine national interest. If any complaint is to be made against the editors of these excellent papers, it is that they do not always place themselves within the reach of the people's comprehension. Time will doubtless improve the works destined to popular instruction, and the cultivation of public taste; but one thing is worthy of remark, and deserving of eulogium: the government, in order to familiarize the people with discussions of general interest, and to lay the foundation of their political education, gives every facility to the reading of these journals, of which they cause, from time to time, a certain number of copies to be distributed gratis. The establishment of booksellers' shops and reading-rooms is announced at Syra, Hydra, Napoli, and Missolonghi. The temple of the Muses is re-opened. Public instruction emerges from a chaos wherein it had been plunged during the first years of the war. Schools, libraries, printing-offices, instruments, all have been swallowed up in the abyss dug by the scimitar of the descendants of Omar! A school of ancient Greek and French is in full activity at Missolonghi: it is under the direction of Demetrius Paul, a young professor of considerable attainments, and full of patriotism, who studied at Paris. Missolonghi, a miserable hamlet before the present revolution, and which subsisted only by the produce of its fishery, seems to have risen from beneath the sea, with which it is on a level, and to be aspiring to become a flourishing city. After opposing its courage to the shock of two formidable invasions, it is at length length defended by an enclosure of solid walls, provided with regular fortifications, constructed by a Greek engineer. It has become the adopted country of the illustrious Byron, whose cenotaph is placed beside the tombs of Kyriacoulis, Normann, and Bozzaris.

Athens possesses a primary school, according to the mutual method, introduced by Dr. Anargyros Petrakis, who has travelled in France. A lyceum is about to be established, which is consigned to the direction of George Gennadiou, a very zealous scholar, who has been professor at Bucharest and Odessa: this lyceum will occupy one of the convents of Athens. The Society of Philo-muses, dissolved by the late storms, are rallying again; they propose to publish a journal, to promote the intellectual and moral improvement of this part of Greece. A priest of Salamis has planted upon his own estate an establishment for the mutual instruction of the children of the island. The priests of Greece are fathers of families. The bishops took the lead in the revolution. If the patriarch be at Constantinople, the church is wherever the faithful are found. Families, church, state, blended together, make consequently one common cause.

In the month of July, the senate charged a committee of five members to present a general plan of public instruction. The committee proposed the establishment of elementary schools for districts; lyceums for the provinces, where Greek, Latin, and French, might be taught; and a national university, comprehending the four faculties of philosophy, civil law, medicine, and theology. The complete execution of this plan having been deferred for a time, it is hoped that it may be modified and matured by reflection. Meanwhile, a model-school of mutual instruction has been opened at Argos on a vast scale. Gregory Constantas, a venerable deacon, professor of philosophy and belles-lettres, and deputy of Thessaly, has been nominated director of public instruction.

It is here we should mention the sacrifices of John Yavvakis for the good of his country. He was a native of Psara, and having participated in the exposition of Orloff against the tyrants of Greece, he was forced to retire, whilst young, into Russia, where, upon the banks of the Don, he acquired, by his active industry, considerable wealth. Far from forgetting his native country, he has constantly contributed to its progress in instruction. At the cry of liberty, he forwarded magnificent presents. He did more: though eighty years of age, he quitted estates, honours, repose, and came to offer Greece his person and his property. He learned, on his journey, the catastrophe of the island where he was born; he shed tears, without giving way to discouragement; he embarked, landed, after fifty years absence; he saluted Greece, free, gathered up the wrecks of his country, and became the founder of a new Psara on the territory of Malvasia. He is at present (Dec. 1824) employed in founding hospitals, and has deposited a sum of 200,000 talaris (more than a million of francs) for the establishment of an university, to the offices of which he has appointed Comnas, Vamvas, and other professors eminent in Greece. Thus, a single individual has undertaken what the efforts of many persons combined, or those of governments, accomplish elsewhere. We shall soon, therefore, behold, upon the soil of Greece, governed by its own laws, an institution, the rival, but not enemy, of that which is in exercise at Corfu, under the enlightened auspices of Great Britain. The Ionian islands are part of Greece; the hearts of their inhabitants have always beat for the glory of the same country; both seek instruction with the like ardour. The distinguished professors of their university, Piccolo, Asopius, Philitas, Politis, &c. will feel their emulation redoubled, and will know how to direct it in a cause so noble and patriotic.

In this great movement, where the mother of the arts, left to herself, sought to recover her rank as a nation at the price of her blood, it is at once just and consoling to consider the aid which respectable persons, and associations formed in civilized countries, hastened to supply continually. Germany and Helvetia distinguished themselves by courageously setting the first example. France contributed to the entertainment and the return of the expatriated Greeks. The presents of M. Firmin Didot excite admiration in Greece towards the art of topography, and make its wonders be prized. Holland, America, and India, opened phil-hellenic subscriptions. Emulation excited the generosity of the British nation. A principal committee diffused its precious services over the whole expanse of Greece. Corporations, universities, rivalled each other in zeal, and the magistrates seconded the popular ardour. Bentham adopted the son of Bozzaris. Ten young Greeks arrived in London, to complete their education amongst the British people. Lord Guildford and many of his fellow-countrymen lavished their munificence at the city of Athens. * The liberality of Murray contributed to the fortifications of Missolonghi. At length Byron arrived, devoted himself wholly to Greece, and disappeared like a brilliant meteor.

M. DU VAUCEL.

ALFRED DU VAUCEL, after having served in the French armies, and distinguished himself at the siege of Antwerp (where he was aide-de-camp to General Carnot, and obtained the decoration of the Legion of Honour), upon the restoration of tranquillity, renewed his studies in natural history, in which he had the advantage of being aided by the celebrated Cuvier, his father-in-law. After some interval he was sent out by the French government as Naturaliste du Roi, and arrived at Calcutta in May, 1818, where he was associated with M. Diard in the office of investigating the natural history of India, and collecting specimens for the Museum of Paris. They were occupied in the vicinity of Calcutta till the end of 1818; and in that short time, were able to send, amongst other things, a skeleton of the Gangetic dolphin, the skull of the Chowritailed cow, a description of the tapir, two horned pheasants, and a male shawl-goat. The latter animal continued to thrive perfectly in France, where considerable pains have been taken to rear this animal.

From Bengal the two naturalists proceeded, with Sir Stamford Raffles, to Sumatra, where they reaped a rich harvest up to the end of 1819. The results of their labours were forwarded to England, under an engagement with Sir S. Raffles to that effect. Amongst a vast number of curious objects thus remitted, was a specimen of the dugong, the nearest approximation to a genuine mermaid yet discovered. A description by the French naturalists was inserted by Sir E. Home, in the second part of the Philosophical Transactions for 1820.

In 1819, MM. Diard and Du Vaucel quitted Bencoolen; the former continued his inquiries to the eastward, and is now on his way back from Cochin China: M. Du Vaucel returned to Bengal. Four extensive consignments of specimens and preparations were received at Paris in the course of 1820-21, and deposited in the galleries of the museum.

In 1821, M. Du Vaucel set out to explore the forests of Sylhet; he penetrated beyond the frontier, travelled through part of Cassya, and was the first European who visited the immense cave of Bhuvana.

His

His exposure to the unhealthy climate of Sylhet brought on a jungle fever, which compelled him to return to Calcutta, bringing with him a vast number of animals and birds, either new to zoology, or of great local and general interest.

The next object of his inquiry was the country of Nepal. Circumstances prevented the gratification of his wishes, and he was obliged to content himself with exploring the country along the foot of the hills. He spent a great part of 1822-23 in Benares and Goruckpore, and made immense additions to his zoological treasures. Fatigue and exposure, however, with the effects of the former fever, rendered further exertion impracticable; and M. Du Vaucel returned to Calcutta.

The collection which he brought with him consisted chiefly of birds, the animals having been previously sent away. There was also a considerable number of alligators, lizards, snakes, insects, and minerals. The number of specimens amounted to many hundreds.

He continued to languish some months after his return from the upper provinces without any amendment; and, as the only remaining hope, was prevailed upon to go to sea. He accordingly left Calcutta, towards the close of last rains, for Madras; but it was then too late, and he arrived at Fort St. George only to breathe his last. He died in the house of Herbert Compton, Esq., the Advocate-General, the latter end of August 1824, at the premature age of 31.

M. Du Vaucel was not merely a collector of specimens; he was a lively observer of national peculiarities, and an intelligent describer of the objects of his immediate pursuit, or those which arose from its prosecution. His description of the cave of Cassya, and the extracts from his letters in the Revue Encyclopédique, afford sufficient proof of his merits in the latter respect; and his communications to the Asiatic Society evince both his knowledge and love of natural history. His last paper, which is in the current volume of the Asiatic Researches, is a proof of his talent also in the acquirement of languages. He arrived in India with a very limited knowledge of our tongue, but the paper in question, on the Hippelaphus of Aristotle, is written in English, and was so written by himself.

TRANSACTIONS IN NORTHERN INDIA.

PUBLIC attention in India is so absorbed by the war on the Eastern Peninsula, that the events which are taking place in the north-western frontier of our territories seem to provoke but little curiosity. The movements of Runjeet Singh, the enterprising rajah of the Sikhs, have lately been of rather a suspicious character; but the details received are meagre and imperfect.

For some time past Runjeet has been threatening an advance into the Afghan territories. The prince of Cabul, Mirza Shuhabuddeen, is endeavouring to gain possession of the throne, which is usurped by his brother. The Sikh rajah professes to support his pretensions, and has placed a body of troops at the prince's disposal, who, however, makes no progress. He is now at Attock, waiting the result of an application to Runjeet respecting the latter's invasion of Cabul.

By an account from Umritsur, dated in September last, it appears that the Maharajah, Runjeet, had visited that holy city, and directed its fortifications to be put in complete repair; announcing his intention of immediately proceeding to Cabul. He told the Sikh chiefs that "if that kingdom should submit to his authority, he would do every thing they might expect from him, or even more." A subsequent account mentions his arrival at Lahore, with the whole of his army, from whence he marched to Vizierabad, on the Chunab (Accessines), where, according to the Lahore Ukhar of the 7th October, he was encamped.

Meanwhile, a serious disaster has befallen a portion of his army. The zemindars of Durbund having risen, to the number of 10,000 horse and foot, three Sikh sirdars marched to attack them near Gúndghur. The insurgents were defeated; but re-assembling during the night, whilst the Sikh forces were unprepared, they surrounded a body of 1,000 Sikhs, and routed them, killing two of the sirdars and 800 of their men. The Maharajah has, in consequence, put his troops in motion to join the beaten army; and as the scene of these transactions is upon the verge of our frontier, some apprehensions are expressed in the Calcutta papers, that Runjeet intends to cross the Sutlej, and thereby violate the Company's territory. It is probably on this account that the Commissariat Department in Bundelcund is busily employed in arrangements which favour the opinion that a body of British troops will proceed in that direction.

Yar Mahomed Khan, the governor of Peshawur, under the Sikh rajah, seems to be fully employed in defending his province against the assaults of the various tribes around him. The governor of Chowpanee assembled a large army with the intention of marching against Peshawur; but he has been defeated by Yar Mahomed, and has retreated to Jalalabad. The Eusofzyes, the bravest and most independent of the Afghan tribes (according to Mr. Elphinstone) make serious inroads upon Peshawur, plundering and wasting the territory.

The governor of Moulton is likewise in continual conflict with the Jutee tribes, who, it is acknowledged in one of the Ukhbars, succeeded in surprizing the Moulton camp.

Thus the Lahore prince has full employment on every side. Meanwhile, intimations are given in the native papers that Russia is preparing to interfere. The Jami Jehan Nooma, of July 14, states that "copies of two letters (intercepted, we presume) from Mirza Camran (at Cabul) were enclosed for the perusal of the Maharajah; and it is a public report that a large body of troops are procured in the kingdom of Russia." The same paper adds, that Mr. Walker* presented a letter from Russia, and acquainted the court (of Runjeet) with the intention of that government contained in the letter.

We are not disposed to place much reliance upon these vague statements; but the mere mention of Russia in these transactions is a fact not to be overlooked.

* Runjeet Singh has some troops in his service commanded by European officers; two of whom are named Jones and Walker.

MYSTERIOUS agent of omnipotence,
 Author of good and ill, of joy and woe;
 At thy behest, rich streams of gladness flow,
 Or sorrow's bitter flood,—no matter whence.
 Thou know'st the secret links 'twixt mind and sense,
 And at thy will bright visions come and go.
 Spring's grateful breath, the melody of sound,
 Love's thrilling touch, and beauty's radiant smile,
 Derive their chiefest charms from thee:—meanwhile,
 The cells, where raging frenzy bites the ground,
 Thy votaries fill.—Thus evil, rank and vile,
 Poisons the good which in this world is found.
 The cypress here beside the laurel grows,
 And the rude thistle near the blooming rose.

IMITATION OF HORACE.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR : The accompanying jeu d'esprit was written by a gentleman in the civil service, in consequence of the late lamented Mr. Ross recommending the establishment of a school in the zillah of Cuddapa (or Kurpa), of which he was Collector, for the education of native children intended for the public service; especially with a view to their moral improvement. The author gave copies of it to some of his friends, but I believe it has never appeared in print. Perhaps you may think it worth that honour in your Journal.

DISPUTES IN THE TEA TRADE.

WE have received a letter, which enters at some length into the circumstances of the war which rages amongst the brokers and others concerned in the tea trade. The matters in dispute arise from two sources: the monopoly of seats in the East-India Company's sale-room by the senior brokers; and the printing of the marked catalogues (which represent by conventional signs and symbols the character and qualities of the teas put up to sale) which has hitherto been performed by the trade, and for which the Company make an allowance, we believe, to the amount of £1,000 per annum.

As it is obvious that only one bidder can be pronounced the buyer of a lot of tea; and as its exact value is in general tolerably well known in the sale-room, the individual who can so place himself as to be the first to attract the observation of the presiding director, may buy just as much as he pleases; whilst another who is perched aloft, or on one of the subsellia, and depends upon strength of lungs or violence of gesticulation, must often chew the bitter cud of disappointment. In consequence of this circumstance, seats came to be considered as property; and those placed close to the director were purchased, and conveyed to descendants as regularly as heir-looms, by the wealthy brokers. The monopoly was long felt as a grievance; and on the 2d March, the juniors took possession of the advantageous seats, and refused to quit them without some pledge or understanding that a new order of things should be introduced.

The difficulty in this case is to get rid of the pretensions of the purchasers of seats, who have been allowed for years to enjoy the privileges attached thereto. The only expedient is to remodel the sale-room; and accordingly a plan has been submitted to the Court, which, if adopted, will place the director opposite to where he now sits, and the brokers' benches on each side of him, as those of the members in the House of Commons.

The other cause of disquiet is a desire, on the part of the London tea-brokers, to desist from printing the marked catalogues, on account of the facility which they offer to individuals to sell tea, by means of them, in the country at lower prices than the brokers think fair.

It is not less from a sense of justice, than of policy, on the part of the East-India Company, that they refuse to sanction the measure desired by the brokers; and have intimated to them, that if they discontinue issuing the marked catalogues as usual (which they are at liberty to do), the Company will undertake the office themselves.

PROFESSOR LEE'S REPLY TO THE REMARKS ON HIS VINDICATION.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: As you were so good as to indulge me with the insertion of an article in your Journal, on a former occasion, I hope you will not refuse me on this, when I assure you, that I have no controversial feeling to gratify, the only object of my communication being public good.

My former communication was in reply to a review printed at Glasgow; my present remarks are intended to answer the main part of about 100 pages more by the same author, lately published at the same place. I then confined myself to the principal articles in the review, and I now intend to adopt the same plan; taking for granted, as I did then, that no good end can be answered by dwelling on what appears trifling, and of no public interest.

The first argument I shall notice in this second publication, is one which is intended to shew, that the Arabic grammar is unnecessary to the Persian student. The argument argument is briefly this. If the dictionaries will supply all the irregular Arabic plurals, the student need not study the principles of the Arabic language in a grammar. But the dictionaries do supply these irregular plurals: ergo, the grammar is unnecessary. One of the words chosen for the discussion of this question is دار a house, which is said to have ten forms of the plural number; only two of which, it is also said, are to be found in the alphabetic order of the first edition of Meninski. I remark: In this case, then, allowing the assumption of our author, eight forms of the plural may occur, which the student, ignorant of the Arabic grammar, will have no means of finding.

But, our author has discovered, in consequence of my former remarks, that the second edition of Meninski is the best now in use. Let us turn to it (for I happen to possess a copy, contrary to our author's expectations). Here then we find only nine forms of the plural; and, in the alphabetical order, we have only seven of them, which leaves a deficit, from the original number, of two. Now, if we turn to Golius, Castell, and the Kamoos, we shall find that eleven broken plurals of this word are given; and further, that there is a slight difference in these authorities as to some of the forms. And here we find, that the best dictionary is deficient in three forms of the plural of this word. Let us now turn to Richardson, which, according to our reviewer, is the dictionary now in use. Here, then, we have two forms only of the eleven above-mentioned. Now, in these cases, what is the student to do, allowing our author every thing he has asked for? The answer must be, I suppose, "he must do as they do in France, as well as he can!"—But, if he has given one week's consideration to the Arabic grammar, the whole difficulty vanishes. He has only to look for the root in a good dictionary, Golius or Costell, for example, and all is plain.

But the far most amusing part of our argument is yet to come. Our reviewer has argued, that, allowing Sir William Jones to have expressed an opinion in his day, that a knowledge of the Arabic language was necessary to the due understanding of the Persic, the case was now altered, because Meninski's dictionary was not the one now in use. My reply was, by this reasoning it might be shewn, that as the times are changed, we must not now cite the opinion of Sir William Jones as his opinion. Certainly not, answers the reviewer; it would be degrading to his understanding to suppose he would hold any such opinion now. But, continues he, it should have been said, the circumstances of the times, not the times, are changed. If then we adopt this amendment, we arrive, at the rule, that, whenever the circumstances of the times are changed, the opinions expressed by writers before this change took place, have also undergone a change. This is a sort of logic, which I think needs no comment. Our author seems to have had some misgivings on this point; for at page 16 the question is given up, in a way no less logical. "In both cases," it is said, "the conclusion is unsupported by the premises, since a change of circumstances does not change the opinion of a man now dead," &c. How a conclusion is supported by premises, it is perhaps hard to say; but that the conclusion had nothing to do with the premises, there can be no doubt.

In pages 11 and 12, Dr. Wilkins experiences a slight rebuke, for having inserted the indicatory syllable part. before certain participles beginning with مت; because, it is said, great confusion must be the consequence. By informing the student, therefore, that a certain word is a participle, which, upon our author's principles, he could have no means of knowing, must necessarily puzzle him! Let us try an example or two: متابع may be either a verbal noun or masdar, or a participle in the feminine gender, and may occur as both in the same sentence. Now, in this case, how is the student, ignorant of the Arabic grammar, to ascertain the construction of such passage, particularly if the part of speech, to which these words belong, has not been marked in the dictionary? He must trust, of course, to unassisted nature; and conclude his studies just as he began them, perfectly ignorant of the Persian language. Our author thinks, therefore, that the principles of the Arabic grammar may be learned from the dictionary; a position, I will affirm, entirely his own: but when the dictionary makes the slightest advances towards this desirable end, he objects and blames the editor.

But he has stumbled upon another difficulty: he wants to know how the student is to understand the derivation of participles from nouns, adjectives, and other participles, as given in Richardson's dictionary. I answer, I have not yet been able to find any of these participles derived from participles or adjectives: but I do know, that it is regular and right to derive participles from nouns; and if he will look again through Mr. Lumsden, he will no longer find any difficulty on this subject.

Let us now pass on to page 15 of the remarks. I had said in my last communication, that the examples mentioned by M. de Sacy, as exceptions from the rule, respecting the application of the article to the last only of two nouns in construction, were to be resolved by the introduction of the preposition من, and consequently, that those exceptions fall properly under another another rule. The reply we now have to notice is: "Let the professor try the effects of this his art of grammatical transmutation upon the phrase الضارب العبد the striker of the servant, which is also adduced as an exception by de Sacy."

This is a fair question, and I will endeavour to give it a fair and satisfactory answer. It gives me pleasure, Mr. Editor, to meet such a question as this; because I am sure it will be answered in such a way as will be serviceable to my friend, and probably to his pupils. In the first place, M. de Sacy does not cite this phrase as an exception to his rule. It is true, it is found at page 147 of the second volume of his grammar; but there it occurs under a different rule, as the merest tyro will perceive: الضارب being considered as a participle or adjective with the article, and العبد as its complement.

In page 110 of the same volume, this construction is given under what M. de Sacy terms "l'annexion imparfaite," and it is there laid down as analogous with the phrase حسن الوجه. Now, if we make our author's phrase definite by prefixing some such word as زيد, it will be necessary to affix the article to the adjective or participle, and we shall have زيد الحسن الوجه, a phrase which we shall also find in M. de Sacy's grammar.

Suppose, then, we say زيد الضارب العبد, will it now follow, that these last two nouns are in construction? I believe not, and I have no doubt our reviewer will be of the same opinion.

I could wish our author now to turn to page 128 of my edition of Sir William Jones's Grammar; he will there find تقد العالمة الزوج. How does it happen, that when he reviewed this grammar, he did not discover the last two nouns to be in construction?—That, notwithstanding his spirited appeals to the classical authority of Black-eyed Susan, and the Yellow-haired Laddie, he is still to be informed of the real import of this construction?

He will reply, perhaps, that the learned Frenchman labours under certain prejudices; and that we are both wrong. Let us see, then, what the native grammarians say on this construction; and, as our friend informs us, that he never reads them, because Mr. Lockett has told him that they are useless, I will translate my extract. In the Commentary on كأنه of Ibn Uthājīh, published at Calcutta by Sheikh Ahmed, we have the following remark on the phrase الضارب الرجل, which, our author will allow, is perfectly analogous to his phrase الضارب العبد.

After stating that this phrase could not be allowed by analogy on the supposition of these being nouns in construction, the author of the Commentary proceeds, لكنه جاز حملا علي الوجه المختار في المحسن الوجه, "but it is allowable when referred to the approved principle (exemplified in the phrase) المحسن الوجه."

We may now, perhaps, dismiss this question without the fear of being troubled with it any more.

Let us now proceed to the question next in importance. The reader will recollect, that I had referred the student to the dictionary in order to inform himself what vowels were proper for the middle radical letter, both in the preterite and future of Arabic verbs; and that, in doing this, I had followed the example of Mr. Lumsden. Our reviewer, in the first instance, denied that Mr. Lumsden had recommended any such practice; and, strange to say, he denies it still, notwithstanding my having cited Mr. Lumsden's own words to that effect: but, what is still more strange, he challenges me to produce one word from Mr. Lumsden to the point. He then cites Mr. Lumsden's words himself; and, forgetting that he had denied that any such passage existed, he next challenges me to prove the truth of Mr. Lumsden's assertions! Let the reader take it in his own words (p. 21): "We challenge Dr. Lee to produce this rule from any part of Mr. Lumsden's writings." Moreover, the Doctor quotes from Mr. Lumsden as follows, "I have already stated, that the form of the aorist is very generally determined by the arbitrary authority of prescription alone." We then have challenge the second: "We challenge the Doctor to verify this assertion of Mr. Lumsden," &c., which need not be further noticed.

The next step taken by the reviewer, which is to prove the inefficiency of my rule, and the falsehood of Mr. Lumsden's assertion, is this: he actually counts a considerable number of the roots in Goliush, and determines, with a precision scarcely scarcely human, how many roots have not the medial vowel of the aorist marked in that dictionary; and the conclusion arrived at is, that my rule is a lex inanis. In the next place, he argues with great earnestness in favour of the rules usually given for finding this vowel: and finally, the reader is presented with a list of roots, forty-seven in number, in which this medial vowel is marked, a piece of information, it is asserted, not to be found in the Lexicon of Golius. A few remarks on this exquisite piece of grammatical inquiry shall suffice.

Among the native grammarians, the Arabic roots are classed under six conjugations, as follows: verbs having fathah for the medial vowel of the preterite, and zamma of the future, are assigned to the first conjugation; as pret. ^{فَعَلَ}نَصَرَ, aor. ^{يَنْصُرُ}يَنْصُرُ.

Those which have fathah in the preterite, but kesra in the aorist, belong to the second concl. as ^{فَعَلَ}يَقْرَبُ, ^{فَعَلَ}ضَرَبَ. Those of the form of ^{فَعَلَ}يَمْنَعُ, ^{فَعَلَ}مَنْعَ are of the third;

^{فَعَلَ}حَسِبَ, of the fourth; of ^{فَعَلَ}يَعْلَمُ, ^{فَعَلَ}عِلْمَ of

^{فَعَلَ}حَسَنَ, of the fifth; and of ^{فَعَلَ}يَحْسِبُ

^{فَعَلَ}يَحْسِنُ, of the sixth.* In the three first of these conjugations fathah is the medial vowel proper for the preterite, while that of the aorist is respectively zamma, kesra, and fathah. Let us now suppose that the student happens to know (which, however, is impossible, without recurring to the dictionary) that some root which may occur, ought to have fathah for the medial vowel of the preterite; how, in the next place, is he to discover, whether zamma, kesra, or fathah, is the proper vowel for the aorist? Our author will perhaps inform us. "Our rule, then, for the formation of the aorist from preterites in fathah is, that such verbs will have a zum or a kesra for the medial vowel of the aorist. When this rule is infringed upon, fathah must then be the medial vowel of the aorist; and this only happens when a guttural is the medial or final letter of the root" (page 37 of the Remarks).

Verbs having fathah for the medial radical letter of the root, will therefore have a zum or a kesra for the medial vowel of the aorist: ^{فَعَلَ}نَصَرَ, for example, will have zum or kesra, i. e. ^{فَعَلَ}يَنْصُرُ or ^{فَعَلَ}يَنْصِرُ.

Are we to understand, that either of these vowels may be used at pleasure? or only some one of them? This the rule forgets to tell us. But let us allow that it only means one of the two. In this case, how is the student to know which is to be preferred? Here, again, our rule is silent! After all, then, the student must go to the dictionary; for, without it, he cannot determine the medial vowel for either tense!

We are told, in the next place, that when this rule is infringed upon, fathah will be the medial vowel of the aorist. But how is the student to know when this infringement takes place? Our author tells us, that "this only takes place when a guttural is the medial or final letter of the root." And, a little lower down: "as every verb, however, having a guttural for its medial or final radical, does not rank under the exception, but, on the contrary, many such verbs follow the general rule, the number of exceptions is considerably diminished." It has been shewn, that the general rule, here appealed to, does not determine the medial vowel either in the preterite or the aorist. But, allowing that it did, how is the student to know, in the next place, when such verb comes under the exception or the rule? On this question, also, our rule is silent; and the student must at last turn to the dictionary to settle the point. Our reviewer, therefore, leaves the matter just as he found it, saving only, that he has thrown away his precious time in laying down a lex inanis.

But he urges: the Lexicon of Golius will not supply the student with this medial vowel, in a great variety of cases. In these cases, then, what is he to do? I answer: the student of the Peric will very seldom want to inquire; and, when he does, the Lexicons of Golius or Castell will, most likely, answer his purpose: and, as to the student of the Arabic, the question will but rarely occur, during the first stages of his progress; and, when he is further advanced, he may consult the Kánoos.

Let us now offer a few remarks on the list of roots already mentioned, and which, our author informs us, contains information not to be found in Golius. In some instances, however, the information is to be found in Golius; and, in most of the others, the Grammar of Mr. Lumsden will inform us, to whom the public is indebted for their first publication. In these instances, then, our reviewer has condescended to become "the slavish caterer of another man's stuff," contrary to his own professed principles; and, what is worse, has arrogated to himself the merit due to another.

* This is the order given by Guadagnoli.

The first example we shall notice is بَعَدَ, which he gives pret. بَعَدَ, aor.

يَبْعِدُ. But it also occurs بَعَدَ, يَبْعِدُ.

The author of the Kámoos says فَعْلًا

كُكْرَمَ وَفَرِحَ. Similar defects are observable in most of the others.

In the 8th example we have pret. يَسْرُو aor. يَسْرُو. But in Golius we are told, that this root has fut. O. and mediâ kesra, fut. A. and also that it has tanima for the medial vowel of the preterite. After all, then, Golius informs us, that both يَسْرُو and يَسْرِي are found as aorists to this verb! It will not be necessary to examine this list any farther; suffice it to remark, that what has been noticed has not been selected as the worst part of it.

Let us pass on to the exceptions attached to the second list. "Among verbs of the perfect and regular class," it is said, "there are only two exceptions to our rule, ni. حَسِبَ he reckoned, and نَعِمَ

he was happy, which preserves the kesra in the aorist." Here we are as far from the truth as ever: but it is fortunate enough for us, that we are able to point out the source of the error. Mr. Lumsden has, in page 128 of his Arabic grammar, cited these two words as exceptions to verbs of the measure فَعِلَ in the preterite, and فَعِلَ in the aorist. But Mr. Lumsden has not said, that these are the only exceptions. Our author has imagined, that because no other regular verbs are cited, there can none exist, notwithstanding Mr. Lumsden's admonition, that there are many examples of the same kind. In our sketch of the conjugations, it will be remembered,

حَسِبَ and يَحْسِبُ were given as a paradigm, upon which a whole class of verbs are conjugated. Surely the grammarians would never have done this for the sake of two verbs only. Upon turning over the Kámoos, I find the roots طَسِمَ, عَرِمَ, قَطَمَ, and نَصَبَ, with kesra for the medial vowel in both tenses. It is true, many of them are also found with other vowels: but this is also true of the words حَسِبَ and نَعِمَ. They form exceptions to the rule, therefore, just as good as those chosen by our author. The fact is, the greater part of the verbs found in this conjugation are also found conjugated in the fourth. The value to be set on this part of our author's lucubrations need not now be discussed: I would only remark, that they are perfectly of a piece with the luminous rule considered in a former communication.*

Let us now consider an example or two of his third list of roots; and, I have no doubt, we shall find that he does not become any more accurate as he proceeds. The first example that he gives (page 38) is يَأْثُرُ pret., aor. يَأْثُرُ. But Golius gives أَثَرَ pret., aor. يَأْثُرُ; and the author of the Kámoos, يَأْثُرُ pret., aor. يَأْثُرُ and يَأْثُرُ.

According to the Kámoos, then, this is a verb of the fifth conjugation, and, therefore, to be added to the exceptions above-mentioned: besides, he gives no example of this root with fathah on the middle radical of the preterite. It is probable, therefore, that our reviewer is again wrong.

We now come to the third example, يَجِبُنَ he was a coward. aor. يَجِبُنَ.

Golius gives جِبَنَ and جِبِنَ. The author of the Kámoos جِبِنَ and يَجِبُنَ

only. According to Firozabádi, therefore, fathah is not the vowel proper for the medial letter of the preterite. In both these examples, therefore, our author is wrong in the preterites; and in one he has given only one form of the aorist, when the verb has two, one of which is found in Golius.

Now for the fifth example, pret. جَزَا

he subdued, aor. يَجْزُو. But the author of the Kámoos gives جَزَا pret., and aor.

يَجْزِي; and even in Wilmet we have تَجْزِي.

تجزى. In every example which has been considered, therefore, our author's rules have failed him; and, even with Golius and the Kāmoos at hand, he has blundered to an extent hitherto unequalled by any reviewer, if we except our friend of Glasgow. But, after all, why have these examples been given, if the rule above-noticed will suffice? Is not this a tacit acknowledgment that it will not suffice?

I am very sure, Mr. Editor, it never will be expected that I should follow out nearly 100 pages of grammatical dogmatizing such as this: but, as it may be amusing to some of your readers, to see how learned reviewers cast about when detected in error, I will merely notice an effort or two of this kind, and then conclude.

Our author, when writing his review, had occasion to cite Alting as the author of an Arabic grammar. I suggested, in reply, that Alting never wrote one syllable on the subject. In the Remarks, we are referred to Watts's Bibliotheca Britannica, and Orme's Bibliotheca Biblica, in order to prove that he was right. And what do we find there? Why, mirabile dictū! that Otho, and not Alting, was the author of the grammar, just as I had stated. But, fearing that this might not be deemed satisfactory, another proof is offered. I had mentioned Santes, in my tract against Henderson, as having made a translation of the Hebrew Bible. Our reviewer replies: "We have read of the versions of Santes Pagninus, &c.; but Santes is the proper name of neither." Santes is the name, then, but it is not the proper name, without the addition of Pagninus! Might it not as well be argued, that Otho is not the name of Otho, we must say George Otho! and that Alting is not the proper name of Alting! But, my objection was not about a name, but a fact; and, disguise Alting how you will, still he was not the author of the grammar in question. A little further on, however, the reviewer takes the hint, and very properly cites Otho, not Alting: but still, he forgets to cite him by his proper name, George Otho.

In another instance, the reply is, that he spoke in a popular way, which every mechanic in Glasgow could explain; and, in another, instead of confessing at once, that he had written an unintelligible sentence, we have a long metaphysical account of the constitution of certain minds; and the conclusion, I suppose is, that a man is at liberty to write like a madman, as long as he can find madmen for his readers. We have also a most infelicitous defence of the exquisite rule given in the review, on the conjugation of concave verbs: but this I dare not notice. Again, it was asserted in the review, that the word جزا, pointed as a verb, was not to be found in any dictionary. I admonished the reviewer of a failure in his eye-sight; and he has discovered his mistake. But he returns to the charge, and boldly asserts, that what occurs in the Koran as a noun cannot occur in the dictionary as a verb; which is a truism, and what no one would think of denying. This is not all, however: he proceeds farther, and says, that the phrase جزا الاحصان as pointed by me, is a violation of the principles of grammar; i. e. a verb followed by its nominative is a violation of the principles of grammar!

In my former communication I had said, that the reviewer was known to me. I am sorry to find, that my allusions have not had the desired effect. I shall now speak more intelligibly, to him at least. Soon after the appearance of my edition of Sir William Jones's Grammar, a very inaccurate, and not very good-natured review of it appeared, to which I replied. At the same time I informed the author, that he was personally known to me. This produced an explanation, which, it should seem, did not satisfy him. Upon this he commenced the review already noticed, which appeared about a year after at Glasgow. In this he reviewed his own review, professing himself to be an independent writer, but joining most cordially with his former self, in degrading and abusing the reverend editor. To this I replied in your Journals of July and August last year; and, in consequence, I have been favoured with the remarks now noticed. Upon the spirit of these works I shall offer nothing more at present. The reviewer professes, indeed, to have been actuated by a love of literature, and by a sincere regard for the interests of the Bible Society. I may remark, literature can gain nothing by such lucubrations as these; and, as to the Bible Society, were it not well known that he has no kindly regard for its interests, his own review may be cited as a sufficient proof on the point. Such professions as these, therefore, I treat as "airy nothings." My good friend's name I shall not expose: I have no personal hostility to him. In future, perhaps, he will adopt a different course; but this I leave for his consideration. Hoping your goodness will excuse the length of this communication,

I remain, &c.

SAMUEL LEE.

Cambridge, April 12, 1825.

Review of Books.

Remarks on Professor Lee's Vindication of his edition of Jones's Persian Grammar, published in the July and August Numbers of the Asiatic Journal, 1824. Glasgow, 1825, pp. 95.

Dr. LEE's edition of Sir Wm. Jones's Persian Grammar was reviewed in vol. xv. p. 349 of the Asiatic Journal. The learned Professor was dissatisfied with some passages in that review: and our readers will find, in p. 577 of the same volume of this Journal, a letter from Dr. Lee, in which he defends and justifies his work, and complains of some animadversions in the Review, bestowed in a spirit far from "unkind" or "uncandid."

In a work published last year at Glasgow, entitled Critical Researches in Philology and Geography,* appeared an article in which Dr. Lee's work was examined at greater length: it displayed a familiarity with the subject of oriental grammar, but it was written in a tone of asperity. To this new assailant, Dr. Lee lost no time in replying through the medium of this Journal; and considering the article to be a "personal" attack upon him, and believing (though, as it appears, without reason) "the author and the motives to be well known to him," he wielded offensive as well as defensive weapons, and employed a style which, under any other circumstances, he would doubtless deem objectionable in a literary controversy. The writer of the article in the Glasgow work has put forth a replication in the publication now before us; and whilst we condemn the pointed and scornful style it displays towards a gentleman of great learning, it proves, we think, that Dr. Lee has much underrated his antagonist. The Remarks discover a very intimate acquaintance with the philosophy of oriental grammar.

He has, in our opinion, successfully demonstrated that there is no immutable law which requires that the Persian tongue should be taught through the Arabic. We have always entertained the belief that many unnecessary difficulties are thrown in the way of the English student, by Greek as well as Persian being accessible only through the medium of other languages than our own vernacular tongue. That the actual state of things obliges preceptors to follow the example of their predecessors is true; but to maintain that it is impracticable to teach the Persian but by the help of the Arabic is, as the Remarker observes, "to maintain a position which the industry of succeeding lexicographers will, we confidently hope, at no very distant date, shew to be false."

The intricacy of the question treated of, which we candidly confess ourselves hardly competent to decide ex cathedra, the fervid animosity which apparently actuates both parties, and, above all, the delicate situation in which we are placed, render it at least a matter of prudence to decline an investigation of the work before us, and to leave our oriental readers to form their own opinion of the merits of the controversy.

One passage, in reply to Dr. Lee's conjecture as to the character and motives of the person who attacks him, we deem it proper to insert:

"That we bear grudge to Dr. Lee, or have any personal pique at him, either on his own account, or on account of his literary celebrity, all our friends well know to be untrue. In short, no feeling of this kind has ever been entertained by us towards him, and we thought that it had been not indistinctly intimated, in more than one paragraph of our criticism, that motives of another nature had urged us to its publication. Dr. Lee may may rest satisfied, that had it not been for the connexion subsisting between him and the principal Bible and Missionary Societies, we should never have troubled the public with any of our trashy lucubrations, as he has been pleased to designate them. Our aim was this, and we think it was not ambiguously expressed, to inform Dr. Lee and the public, that if he could not edit a correct edition of a grammar, of a language in which he was understood to be an adept, he was not, in our judgment, a fit person to be employed as editor of oriental translations of the Bible. This is still our belief, and a perusal of his Vindication has tended to confirm us more strongly in our opinion; so that it was by no means any personal consideration that induced us to attack him, but a regard to the best interests of the Bible-Society, and the cause of missions."

Since this article was written, the preceding letter from Dr. Lee has been received. We publish it most readily; at the same time expressing our regret, if the Professor's suspicions be well founded, that the public benefit, which may spring from this controversy, cannot be acquired without a sacrifice of private friendship.

Rollin's Ancient History, with a Life of Rollin, and Notes. By JAMES BELL. Vol. 1. Glasgow, no date—(stereotyped.) pp. 624.

This work has also issued from the Glasgow press. We are no admirers of the works of Rollin. His narration is prolix; his facts are ill chosen; his style is spiritless. The editor has furnished some very judicious and instructive notes. We should have been better pleased with his labour, if he had employed himself in condensing, or, in fact, re-writing the Histories of Rollin, for which task he appears to us to be well qualified; and we are confident he would have rendered a very acceptable service to the public.

The Poet's Pilgrimage, an Allegorical Poem, in Four Cantos. By J. PAYNE COLLIER. London, 1825. Small 4to. pp. 120.

The aspirant after poetical fame at the present day has fallen upon "unlucky times;" he has to vanquish a prejudice which now reigns with unlimited sway, and which is as old as the age of Horace:—

*"Indignor quidquam reprehendi, non quia crasse Compositum illepidève putetur, sed quia nuper;
Nec veniam antiquis, sed honorem et præmia posci."*

The public taste is besides cloyed and perhaps vitiated by the mechanical perfection to which English verse is now brought. Genius is not, however, to be daunted by these and other impediments; and, accordingly, we occasionally meet with, amongst heaps of trash, a work which discovers the genuine spirit of poesy. Of this character we think the work before us to be: the author appears imbued with the spirit of the great masters, enlivened by a ray of intelligence which it is not in their power to impart.

The allegory, like the stanza and language of the poem, is Spenserian; it represents the author (Ignoto) as meeting, in his pursuit of poetic fame, with a pilgrim who strives to dissuade him. The following passage, in his answer to the old man, is worthy of insertion:—

"He is not worthy of a poet's name
Who cannot scorn, and woe, and want despise;
Who cannot glory in his after fame,
And that dear hope above all blessings prize!
This is no life where day by day he dies—
This mortal span: he lives in after times,
When fate a hare, cold memory denies
To all who once contemn'd his powerful rhymes;
Unless they live for aye, immortal in their crimes!"

They then proceed together, and first reach the palace of Fortune, the description given of which, and of the persons and objects seen there, is very poetical. The travellers leave this scene, and journey through a fearful country, where Ignoto loses his old companion and meets with a young one, with whom he travels towards the vale of Disappointment and Despair, bounded by bleak and rugged rocks.

“ No vegetation on those rocks was seen,
Which so inclos'd the valley, that the sun
Could never cast his blessed beams between,
To change the noisome vapours dank and dun ;
And sign of living creature there was none.
A few black pines their mouldering trunks uprear,
To shew the triumphs antique time had won ;
And here and there lichens and moss appear,
To make this fearful vale more melancholy drear.

“ No mortal sound the dismal silence broke,
But all the hollow seem'd as still as death :
The wolf's hoarse bark, or raven's tuneless croak,
Would there have sounded cheerful. Not a breath
Of passing wind moan'd through the vale beneath,
As if the breath of life itself were dead.
Not one short word one to the other saith ;
Gazing we stand, as if the silence dread
Had power to freeze our tongues—save sight, all senses fled.”

The succeeding canto brings Ignoto to the cave of Neglect ; and the whole of this part of the poem deserves high commendation. In the fourth canto he is rejoined by the venerable pilgrim, by whose aid he skirts with safety the Gulf of Oblivion ; and in his approach to the drear abode of “ pining Poverty,” he finds the ancient pilgrim in a new shape — that of a lovely lady — the “ poet's muse,” who promised to abide with him during his forced residence there, and “ cheer his misery.”

We can say of the “ Poet's Pilgrimage,” that it is an elegant little poem. If Mr. Collier will continue to write for posthumous fame, we think he stands a fair chance of acquiring it ; but if he looks for any other species of recompense, he may perhaps find reason to acknowledge the justice of the following lamentation, uttered by an author with whom he appears to be well acquainted :—

Quando la cortesia chiuse ha le porte,
Che con pulito viso, e macro, e asciutto,
La notte, e't di, vi picchian senza frutto.*

The Practice of Courts-Martial, and also the Legal Exposition and Military Explanation of the Mutiny-Act, and Articles of War, &c. By CAPTAIN HUGH, 48th Reg. Bengal N. I.—Second edition. The legal portion of the work revised and corrected, by GEORGE LONG, Esq., of Gray's-Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Pp. 1000. £1. 6s.

An analysis of this valuable work appeared in our Journal for March (p. 270) : we add nothing more than a strong recommendation of it to our military friends, who will find, upon examination, that it amply deserves such a recommendation.

Journals of the Sieges of the Madras Army, in the Years 1817, 1818, and 1819; with Observations on the System according to which such Operations have usually been conducted in India, and a Statement of the Improvements that [which] appear necessary. By EDWARD LAKE, Lieut. H. E. I. C. Madras Engineers. With an Atlas of Explanatory Plates. London, 1825. 8vo. pp. 255.

This is a work of great merit. To the military student destined for India, these Journals, illustrated as they are with plans, will prove invaluable; and we believe the oldest officers serving in that country, will collect the most essential information from the details which are given in them. Nor can this book be uninteresting to the European soldier: it will present him with the best view which has yet appeared of the progress of the art of fortification in India, and of the means which our countrymen have employed to subdue the strong holds of the natives, which they often defend with a valour and obstinacy which would do credit to any troops in the world.

The language in which this work is written is well suited to its character: it is concise and perspicuous. On the whole, this volume and its accompanying plates do honour to its author, and we can, without hesitation, recommend it to all our military readers.

FOREIGN WORKS.

GERMANY. Reise nach Turkomanien und Khiwa, in den Jahren 1819 und 1820; i. e. Journey in Turcomania and Khiwa, in the Years 1819 and 1820. By CAPT. M. N. MOURAVIEV, of the Imperial Russian Service. *Translated from the Russian.

The important trade carried on by the ancients on the Oxus, the Caspian, and Black Sea was interrupted by that great commotion which caused Asia to send forth its numerous tribes of Barbarians against civilized Europe, and which banished all security for mercantile enterprise. That trade was, in some measure, revived by the Venetians; but they, too, were driven from those regions by the increasing power of the Turks, whose ambition never permitted them to cultivate commerce; and it seems now reserved for Russia to restore a trade which cannot but be profitable to the industry of this growing empire, and which may ultimately serve to civilize those regions of central Asia which, for so many thousand years, have been the seat of barbarism and violence. It was impossible that a genius like that of Peter the Great could have overlooked so important an object, to which the geographical situation of his country seemed peculiarly to invite him; hence his efforts to establish ports on the Caspian and Black Seas, and to unite them, by means of canals, with the Baltic. But he did more; he sent Prince Bekowitch with a small army to Khiwa, to open a commercial route through that country with the south of Asia. This ill-judged measure, however, failed as much on account of the natural impracticability of subduing nations, such as the Turcomans and Khiwese, in the midst of their deserts, as on account of the incapacity of the prince, who, suffering himself to be ensnared by the superior cunning of the Asiatics, was destroyed with all his troops. Since that period, Russia seems to have changed her system, by wisely endeavouring to obtain by negotiation that which her arms would never obtain. During her last war with Persia in 1813, an emissary was sent by the Governor-General of Georgia to the Turcomans, for the purpose of entering into a league with their Khan against that power. The Turcomans readily consented, and actually despatched an embassy to Georgia, which, however, arrived only just in time to witness the conclusion of peace between the belligerents.

In the year 1819 the Governor-General of Georgia, General Germaloff, despatched the author of the present narrative on a new mission to Turcomania and Khiwa, with the view of entering into treaties with the Khans of those countries, which might secure to the Russians the establishment of a factory on the east coast of the Caspian, as well as a general protection to their trade and navigation in those regions. The author embarked at Baku, a port from which a considerable trade is carried on with Astrakhan. Sailing along the coast, he perceived distinct traces of a superior height of the sea at former times, and was informed that the depth of the water increased and decreased regularly, regularly, within periods of thirty years. He landed to the north of Astrabad, near Cape Serehrenoi. The Turcomans, by whom this part of the eastern coast is almost entirely inhabited, lead a migratory life, and live, for the most part, on the produce of their herds and flocks, hunting, or fishing, few of them pursuing agriculture. They export salt and naphtha in large quantities, chiefly to Persia, whence they obtain, in return, corn, muskets and other weapons, cloth, and domestic utensils. They reside under tents made of felt, and follow but few trades: the carpets and jewellery of their manufacture are, however, described as being of a superior kind. In their character the author recognized nothing of that generosity and energy so conspicuous amongst the Circassian tribes; on the contrary, he describes them as being selfish, covetous, cruel, and prone to the basest actions for the sake of lucre. They have hereditary chiefs, but they generally show them but little obedience, unless they possess energy sufficient to exact it; otherwise, they follow any daring adventurer who takes a lead among them. Thus, even the authority of their Khan is very limited. They are Mahomedans of the sect of Omar; one of the principal causes of their inveterate hostility to the Persians, who are of the sect of Ali. Their language bears very great affinity to that of the Turks, with whom they are evidently of one origin. The author was very successful among them; the chiefs of the districts of Hassan Kouli and Balkan met him on board the Russian corvette, where a commercial treaty was agreed upon. Few could, however, write, and they signed in the names of the remainder, who, in order to signify their assent, passed their fingers, dipped in ink, over the paper.

* A French translation of this work has appeared, by M. Cointe de Laveau.

This business being satisfactorily concluded, the author, leaving his ship at anchor before Krasnovodsk, proceeded on his journey to Khiwa. He, as well as his companions, rode on camels. They found, that wherever there was water, the country near it was carefully cultivated, and the people milder, and less inclined to plunder, than those near the coast. After a few days' journey, the author reached the desert which separates the inhabitable country of the Caspian, from Khiwa. This party had gradually been increased by Turcomans, who were going to buy corn at Khiwa; and the caravan now consisted of fifty people, and above two hundred camels. The mountains of Balkan, which stretch as far as the desert, gradually disappeared, and our travellers soon saw themselves surrounded by an ocean of sand. Not a living creature was seen in this dreary waste, in which the weary eye but seldom discovered a green spot on which it could rest. Now and then they met with a well of brackish water, near which the caravan halted, to rest and fill their water-skins: but, although shunned by every animal, man has made these deserts his abode, for there are several tribes of Turcomans who range over them with their flocks, and like the Arabs of their desert, plunder every traveller whom they think they can attack with impunity. Not far from the borders of Khiwa, the caravan fell in with the ancient bed of a large river, now dry, which, according to the tradition of the natives, was once filled by the Amoo-Daria (the Oxus of the ancients), in its course to the Caspian sea, and which was diverted, about five centuries ago, by a great earthquake, and forced to disembody itself into Lake Aral. That the Oxus formerly fell into the Caspian, is affirmed by Pliny, Strabo, and other ancient writers; and this tradition seems to confirm the fact beyond a doubt.*

The territory of Khiwa comprehends the valley watered by the many arms of the Amoo-Daria, and is about three hundred verst in circumference. This region, which is moreover intersected by numerous canals and aqueducts, is kept in the highest state of cultivation, and produces all the fruit and vegetables of the temperate as well as torrid zones. Suspicious, which seems to be the characteristic of all the eastern governments, was very high proving fatal to the Russian embassy. Mr. M. had committed the imprudence of taking notes in the presence of the natives, while on his way to this capital; and the Khan having been informed of it, and supposing him to be a spy, caused him to be arrested, with his whole suite, and shut up in one of the numerous castles with which the country seems to be studded, and which resemble the feudal castles in Europe. In this confinement he remained for forty days, when he was not only set at liberty, but also allowed to appear before his Khiwese majesty. He found the capital, which seems to be of an immense extent, enclosed within a vast number of beautiful gardens, the fresh green of which was beautifully contrasted by innumerable minarets and cupolas of an azure blue, towering above the high walls of the city. Mr. M. was solemnly received, and lodged in a splendidly furnished house, every room of which was laid out with costly carpets. A few days after his arrival, he was introduced to the monarch of Khiwa, who received him seated under a tent, erected in the middle of a large space, within three court yards, through which our author was led, before he reached the sublime presence. The Khan seemed in good humour; he acknowledged the advantages that would accrue to his country by a free, commercial intercourse with Russia, and declared his willingness to enter into a permanent treaty with that power.

Khiwa

* See the Nomenclator Ptolemaicus.

Khiwa proper consists of the great Oasis, formed by the Amoo-Daria before described, and which contains a great many towns besides the capital, whose inhabitants carry on a considerable trade with the Kirghees and other nomade tribes of the surrounding deserts, as well as with Persia and Bukhara. But the power of the Khan extends over a great part of the tribes of the desert, of which Khiwa forms the centre. The original inhabitants are Bukharians; but the present rulers of the country are Tartars (or, according to Mr. Klaproth's opinion, Turks) of the Usbeck-race. They are the hereditary defenders of the state, the holders of all public offices, and the class from among whom alone the Khan is elected. They call their vassals, i. e. the original inhabitants of the country, Oorgenetch, an appellation which recalls to our mind the English word Knight, and the German Knecht, both originally implying vassals. The country also contains many slaves, chiefly consisting of Persians, Russians, and Kurds, who, having been kidnapped by the Turcomans and Kirghees, are sold into Khiwa. The number of Persian slaves is said to amount to 30,000; that of the Russians to 3000. There are also many Jews, who have, however, for the most part, adopted the Mahomedan religion. The present Khan is endeavouring to level all distinctions among his subjects, and raise his authority on the overthrow of their individual privileges. The author found great difficulty in obtaining an estimate of the number of the inhabitants of Khiwa; however, he estimates those who live in fixed abodes at about 300,000, and the revenue of the Khan at about four millions of francs. He found the people more moral than the Turcomans. The Khan keeps a standing army of 12,000 men, mostly cavalry, who all pass for good soldiers; but in time of war he is enabled to increase their number to 50,000. Should the Russians succeed in forming a close alliance with this nation, it will be of great importance to them in a future war with Persia.

DENMARK. De Originibus et Fatis Ecclesiæ Christianæ in India Orientali; Disquisitio Historica. By MATTHEW HAQUIN HOHLENBERG. Copenhagen, pp. 165.

It is well known, that when the Portuguese arrived in India they found there certain Christians of the Nestorian sect, who were afterwards denominated Christians of St. Thomas, according to a tradition that St. Thomas preached the gospel to the Hindoos. This tradition has been treated by modern writers as a fable; but M. Hohlenberg agrees with Dr. Buchanan, who has defended the truth of the tradition in his Christian Researches. The Danish author examines the arguments against the tradition, and labours to prove that the Apostle was really the founder of the Christian church in India; he then traces the history of this church up to the arrival of the Portuguese. It is a great misfortune that the inscriptions which Dr. Buchanan has preserved have not been decyphered, as they might probably throw some light upon the subject.

NETHERLANDS. Verhandelingen van het Bataviasche Genootschap, &c.; i. e. Proceedings and Memoirs of the Academy of Arts and Sciences of Batavia, in 1823. Vol. ix. Printed at Batavia, 1824.

This volume contains, among other matters, four Memoirs. The first, by Professor Reinhardt, On the Height and Natural Situation of certain Mountains in Java,* has some curious remarks relating to the constitution of the atmosphere and to geognosy; and records some of the natural productions of those mountains. The second, by M. Van Sevenhoven, is a most interesting description of Palembang, under the respective aspects of its topographical, statistical, and political relations. The third, by Dr. Blume, a distinguished botanist, is a description of certain plants observed by him in a journey to Salak in 1822. The fourth Memoir is by the same author; it treats of certain oaks indigenous in Java. The Dr. describes ten different species under the names of Quercus elegans, Q. depressa, Q. glaberrima, Q. angustata, Q. pseudo-Molucca, Q. Sundalica, Q. pruinosa, Q. rotundata, Q. induta, Q. gemelliflora. The author is of opinion, that, for carpenters' work, the wood of some of these species is very little inferior in quality to the European oak.

FRANCE. Dictionnaire Français-Wolof et Français-Bambara, suivi du Dictionnaire Wolof-Français. Par M. J. DARD. Paris, 1825. pp. 32 and 300.

The Wolof language, which is almost entirely unknown in Europe, is spoken, according to the author, "throughout all Senegambia, and beyond the right bank of the Senegal; and it is, next to Arabic, the dialect, by whose assistance a traveller can be surest of making himself understood from the shores of the Atlantic to the banks of the Niger."

* See our present number, p. 683.

Niger." The service which any help to acquire this tongue will afford to travellers in Africa, cannot be too highly appreciated. We do not deem it necessary to say much upon the work before us, because a vocabulary and, we believe, a grammar (so called) of the Wolof language have been published in England (of which the French author seems unaware), under the auspices of a benevolent institution, set on foot by the society of Friends, to civilize the natives of Africa.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Saturday, April 16.

THE Society met at the usual hour; the Director, H. T. Colebrooke, Esq., in the chair.

The minutes of the preceding meeting were read and confirmed.

The Secretary announced the following donations:

By John Reeves, Esq., a Chinese map of the province of Quang-tung (Canton), and a celestial planisphere, accompanied by a descriptive catalogue of the constellations.

By Thos. P. Platt, Esq., Librarian of the British and Foreign Bible Society, on their behalf, copies of the translations of the Holy Scriptures into various languages, made under the auspices, or at the expense of the Society. This magnificent donation amounted to upwards of one hundred volumes, handsomely bound. A few of the oriental translations were wanting, which the Librarian stated would be forwarded when the Society received them.

By the Rev. S. Weston, copy of an Arabic inscription upon a stone received by a gentleman in England, in a bale of goods from Smyrna, with a translation by the donor.

By M. Amédée Jaubert, a foreign member of the Society, three French works, by the donor.

A pamphlet on colonial trade was transmitted anonymously.

Thanks were voted to the respective donors.

The Secretary then read a communication from Thos. Pell Platt, Esq., accompanying copies of certain Abyssinian MSS. relative to the nature, constitution, and condition of the Christian church of Ethiopia, and including a calendar of its saints, obtained by the British and Foreign Bible Society, by means of the Rev. Wm. Jowett, resident at Jerusalem, and transmitted by him to the Church Missionary Society in London.* Mr. Platt observes, in the communication referred to, that the contents of these MSS. seem not to have been altogether unknown to learned men in Europe. The treatise of Jos. Scaliger, De Emendatione Temporum (lib. vii.) contains an article entitled Computus Ecclesie Æthiopice, which is an imperfect transcript of one of the MSS. Ludolf, likewise, in his Commentarius Historiæ Æthiopice, avowedly borrows from one of the MSS.; but he has derived his information from an imperfect copy, or through an inaccurate channel.

Thanks were voted for this communication.

The Secretary then resumed the reading of Mr. Ross's Essay on the Life and History of Firdousi, the conclusion of which was again deferred.

The following gentlemen were elected members this day: James Disney, Esq.; John Melville, Esq.; Capt. Melville Grindlay, and Dr. James M'Donnell.

It was omitted to be stated, that Patrick Percy, Esq., was introduced and admitted at the last meeting.

Adjourned till May 7th.

* Translations of some of the prayers of the Abyssinian church, transmitted by Mr. Jowett, may be seen in the Register of the Church Missionary Society for March last.

VARIETIES;

PHILOSOPHICAL, SCIENTIFIC, AND LITERARY.

Sitting of Feb. 7. The following persons were admitted members:—MM. Leon Bezout, Brosset, G. Desmichels, and Conrad T. Haesler.

A letter from the Secretary of the Central Committee of the Geographical Society accompanied the transmission of the first memoirs published by the society, and expressed a desire to see its labours and those of the Asiatic Society mutually illustrate each other. The secretary was charged to transmit to the committee the thanks of the council, and to communicate the Asiatic Society's wish to concur in the promotion of geographical knowledge.

A note from M. E. Coquebert de Montbret, jun. was read relative to divers MSS of Ibn Khaldoun, which are supposed to exist in the different libraries of Europe.

Extracts relative to M. de Meyendorff's journey to Bokhara were communicated.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF BENCOLEN.

At a meeting of this society held at the court-house, Bencoolen, 19th May 1824, J. Prince, Esq., acting-resident, Fort Marlbro', in the chair.

Dr. Tytler, secretary, opened the business of the meeting.

A paper, by Mr. Hamilton, was read, containing notices of tin ore supposed to exist in the sand, found at the mouth of the Bencoolen river; it also contained remarks upon the geological situation and history of the metal generally.

A paper, by Dr. Tytler, was read on the nature of diseases attacking European and native constitutions, with a description of the principal maladies during the last six months, affecting the patients in the General Hospital of Fort Marlbro'. It appears that the most important disease noticed there is a formidable species of gangrene, in its symptoms closely allied to the Ergot of the French, and respecting which some interesting remarks are contained in the Philosophical Transactions for 1762 and 1765. The Ergot has been ascertained to proceed from the use of grain as food, previously vitiated by rain and other causes; accordingly the proposal for altering the food of the natives in the hospital has been attended with the most signal success; and a disease, formerly deemed unconquerable in the settlement, admits of being cured by regimen, aided by the exhibition of external remedies and medicines.

It is further stated in the paper, that at Bencoolen, within the period alluded to, the extent of mortality has been considerably less than could have been expected, and more inconsiderable than at any station of equal magnitude on the continent of India; and that only one patient died in the hospital during the month of April last. It is also the author's opinion that no particular insalubrity is inherent either to the climate or situation of Fort Marlbro', and that on the whole, in point of healthiness, Bencoolen is equal to any station in India.

A second paper was read by Dr. T. illustrative of the means adopted by him for diffusing medical knowledge amongst the native doctors and apprentices attached to the hospital, and explaining the plan upon which the medical school of Bencoolen is conducted. The pupils belonging to this institution, consisting of five Christian youths, three Hindoos and four Mussulmans, were then examined regarding their knowledge of anatomy; and the president and members were pleased to express their approbation of their attainments, and their high satisfaction at Dr. Tytler's success.

A paper was then submitted by Mr. Baskett, containing a motion on the part of the members of the society, engaged in the cultivation of nutmegs, that an agent be appointed in London to superintend the progress of the petition forwarded to the proper authorities at home, praying for a mitigation of the duties exacted upon the importation of nutmegs, the produce of this settlement into Great Britain.

Resolved, that Mr. Scott of London be appointed agent for this society, and carried nem. con. that Mr. Scott be elected an honorary member.

A quantity of nutmegs of very superior quality was laid on the table by Mr. Cursetjee; as also a bottle of powdered Mace, and specimens of cinnamon, by the same gentleman, the produce of his plantations.

A specimen of pepper from the plantation of Dr. Lumsdaine, was presented by Mr. Neish.

A specimen of granite, or quartz-rock closely allied to granite, discovered in the neighbourhood of Benteering, was presented by Dr. Tytler.

Dr. Tytler submitted his work on Morbus Oryzeus, or disease occasioned by the use of noxious rice for food, and also a copy of the new Nosological system for the classification of diseases, published by him.

A specimen of the culinary vegetables, cultivated in the gardens of Bencoolen by the Chinese inhabitants, was likewise placed upon the table by the secretary; and and two living specimens of different kinds of Buceros.

A very fine specimen of Siamang, or Simio Syndactyla of Sir Stamford Raffles; and a specimen of red monkey, named Simpe by the natives, were also exhibited at the time; and a stuffed specimen of alligator, found at (name of the place illegible), given to the museum by the same gentleman, together with ichthyological subjects, &c. and two samples of the artificial wax candles formed from vegetable oil, invented by Mr. J. Tytler, garrison surgeon of Moughyr, in Bengal.

Thanks were voted to Mr. Prince, and Dr. Tytler; the meeting then adjourned sine die.

THE LATE MR. RICH'S COLLECTION.

This valuable collection has been purchased for the public; it consists of Arabic, Persian, Turkish and Syriac MSS; gems and other antiquities, from Babylon and Nineveh; and coins, Oriental, Greek, Roman, &c.

The report of the parliamentary committee, to whom the petition of the trustees of the British Museum was referred by the House of Commons, is printed, with the opinions of various learned men as to the nature and value of the collection; it is a very interesting document.

With regard to the MSS. Professor Lee states that, taken on the aggregate, they are the best he had seen collected by any one man. Dr. Lee represents the Syriac to consist of 68 volumes; there is one copy of the Philoxenian version of the Gospels which is valuable; he only knows of one other copy, which is at Oxford. There are copies of the Nestorian and Jacobite editions of the Peschito version of the Scriptures, there being no other complete copy of the Nestorian edition in any of our libraries. The Nestorian and Jacobite sects separated as early as the year 500, and continued their editions in their own churches; the collection of them may be important on certain disputed passages. Some of the copies are a thousand years old; they are not all perfect, but as much so as they are generally found. There are two copies of the Gospels and two of the New Testament perfect, with the exception of the Apocalypse. After having examined more particularly the collection, Dr. Lee stated, that the MSS. are much less mutilated than he had before supposed. There is a History of the Persecutions of the Nestorians, which he believed to be unique, and an old Chronicle, which he considers a very curious historical document; it is written in Syriac and Arabic, in parallel columns, the Arabic in the Kufic character; it gives the dates of the bishops, and various persons of the Syriac churches, of the Persian kings, and of the dynasties of the East and West. With respect to the remaining part of the collection, he has examined accurately a fourth part of the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish MSS., and which he believes to be a fair specimen of the whole; they are extremely valuable, because they are the best books in those languages. They consist of history, poetry, and grammar, commentaries on each, and commentaries on the Koran; there are also works on geography, mathematics, and on the sciences generally. There is also a copy of the Koran in the Kufic character, which is, perhaps, the only copy in Europe. This collection of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish MSS. he thinks, cannot be worth less than £5,000.

Mr. Hine, Mr. Rich's assistant at Bagdad, knew that Mr. R. had paid between £6,000 and £7,000 for the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish MSS. alone.

With respect to the coins and medals, Mr. Marsden states that there is one coin, a Kufic Derham, represented to have been struck in the 79th year of the Mahomedan era, which he believes to be worth £100; there is only one other similar which is known, belonging to the Royal Academy of Sweden. The value of the collection, independent of the Greek and Roman part, he estimates at £1,000, including the Parthian and Sassanian coins.

Dr. Wilkins had examined this Kufic Derham; he believes the coin to be genuine, and agrees with Mr. Marsden as to its value.

Mr. Mathew Young, dealer in coins, observed the Kufic Derham; it is in fine preservation; believes it to be struck, not cast—such coins have never in this country sold for more than a guinea. He observed particularly a Thracian coin, considers it to have been cast, and worth only a few shillings; a genuine one, in fine condition, would be worth £100. He estimates the whole collection, according to what he is in the habit of charging for such coins, at £840.

Mr. William Bankes, a member of the committee, considered the Thracian coin as a cast, but being doubtless an exact impression from a true coin of extreme rarity; it may as such be worth £90 to complete a series.

Mr. Francis Palgrave observed, that the appearance of a coin being cast, was not a proof of its being a modern forgery, ancient moulds and ancient furnaces for casting coins have been often found; the reason for employing these moulds has not been satisfactorily explained.

With regard to the antiquities, Mr. Edward Landseer thinks them very valuable, and that the study of the hieroglyphical part of these gems may throw light on the inscriptions in the arrowhead character. He considers the cylinders to have been signets, and that their impression was given by rolling; with respect to their pecuniary value, value, he remembered one of a similar kind, found at Marathon, being valued at from 18 to 20 guineas; valuing the collection at that rate, it would be worth about £3,000.

Sir John Malcolm had looked over these Babylonish and Nineveh antiquities; thinks, from his own experience, that this collection has been obtained at great cost: upon a cylindrical brick being shown him, covered with the arrowhead character, he says it is the best specimen he had ever seen; he would give £50 for it; and he thinks Mr. Rich could not have expended less than £400 or £500 upon the remainder of this part of the collection, independent of the gems.

Mr. Francis Palgrave considered the collection of antiquities as very valuable, and thinks such a collection may lead to important results, when we see what Dr. Young and M. Champollion have done with regard to Egyptian hieroglyphics; he thinks the collection of gems and other antiquities may be fairly worth £1,000.

The committee submit to the house, that the sum of £5,500 is a fair and reasonable price for this collection of MSS., the sum of £1,000 for the coins, and the sum of £1,000 for the Babylonish and Nineveh gems and antiquities; and they recommend that the whole of the collection be purchased at those prices, making altogether the sum of £7,500, and that it be placed in the British Museum for the benefit of the public.

THE SEPOYS.

The first battalion of Sepoys ever raised in Bengal was that called the Lal Pultan, or Red Battalion, which distinguished itself in the battle of Plassey and on other great occasions; but in 1764 it mutinied on the pretext of some promises that were made to it having been broken. It was easily reduced to obedience; but Sir Hector Munro, who then commanded the army, thought a severe example necessary, and twenty-eight of the most guilty were tried by a Drum-head Court Martial, and sentenced to death. Eight of these were directed to be immediately blown away from the guns of the force then at Choprah. As they were on the point of executing the sentence, three grenadiers, who happened to be amongst them, stepped forth and claimed the privilege of being blown from the right hand guns. "They had always fought on the right," they said, "and they hoped they would be permitted to die at that post of honour." Their request was granted, and they were the first executed. There was not a dry eye among Europeans or Asiatics at the death of these fine fellows, no disturbance whatever caused. The battalion next raised was called Matthews's Battalion. In 1759, it showed equal gallantry with the English soldiers, in storming the strong fortress of Masulipatam, defended by a French garrison. This battalion was one of three which mutinied in 1782, under an apprehension of being embarked for foreign service. The mutiny was suppressed, the battalion broken, and drafted into other regiments, and two native officers and one or two Sepoys were sentenced to death, by being blown away from the mouth of a cannon. The sentence was carried into execution in the presence of those troops which had mutinied, and of one other regiment only; and it was effected without the smallest opposition, or even a murmur. The same battalion had also mutinied in 1763, but was soon recalled at that time to its duty. The last instance that we shall mention is, the two celebrated one at Vellore. After the native garrison of that fortress had placed themselves in a state of open mutiny, the Madras native cavalry and the 19th regiment of English dragoons were sent against them; the gates of the fortress were blown open, and the native cavalry acted with quite as much decision and bravery, in attacking their misguided countrymen, as did the English soldiers themselves.

BURMESE ORDEAL.

The following mode of trial by Ordeal prevails in the Burman Empire: A certain quantity of wax is weighed in two equal portions, and formed into two candles, which are lighted at the same instant; one is held by the plaintiff, the other by the defendant, and the holder of the candle which first burns out is adjudged to have sworn falsely, and of course to have lost the cause.—Singapore Chron.

STOCKADES.

The Burmese stockades, of which drawings and plans have been sent to this country, seem to be formidable fortifications of the kind. For a considerable space round the first inclosure the ground is thickly set with bamboo stakes, bonding outwards, extremely sharp, and lying hid in the jungle grass. In their effect upon a person attempting to make his way through them, they are not unlike dog-spikes. Next comes a high palisado of stout bamboos, firmly set in the ground, and bound close together. Then another palisado, which one might call a counter-scarp. When this is surmounted, a broad ditch or space, also set with spikes; and within, a third palisado, which we might term the scarpment, through the interstices of which the Burmese level their muskets at the assailants. In the body of this kind of fortress is a large shed, under which the garrison live. The Burmese soldiers always carry several bamboos for the purposes of fortification, and make a stockade in a night.

LUSUS NATURÆ.

A mendicant brought a bullock from Benares, which had three eyes; the third one was in the middle of the forehead. It had three horns, four ears, and a most curious beast it certainly was. A wealthy native purchased it, and kept it in his house; a great number of people constantly flock to behold this extraordinary animal.—Native Newspaper, Oct. 18.

VELOCIPEDES.

When these vehicles were first brought to India, the natives, who could not comprehend the pleasure of a carriage where the passenger did the duty of the horse, denominated them Pangul ka Gharri (a fool's coach).

A NATANT ARMY.

In a recent work on swimming, and its application to the art of war, M. le Vicomte de Courtivron, a French field-officer, recommends the formation of a company of swimming soldiers in every regiment, and describes the various important duties of which they would be capable; among which is that of conducting cannon placed on rafts to any desired position.

ANTIMONY.

We observe a singular caution given in the Penang Gazette against imposition in this commodity, resulting from an ineffectual attempt to reduce it on a common fire. It may be here noticed that the reduction of the ore of antimony is one of the most delicate and difficult operations in metallurgy, and never conducted successfully except in the great way, and with powerful furnaces and fluxes. Ninety-nine parts out of a hundred of the antimony imported into England, comes in the form of crude antimony, which is neither more nor less than the ore freed from stones, and other ordinary impurities, by the operation of melting on a common fire. The quantity of metal, which the ore so treated is capable of affording, is about 50 per cent; and the sulphuret, the only ore employed any where, does not appear to vary in its proportions.—Singapore Chron., Sept. 30.

FOSSIL ELEPHANT.

The Journal of Lyons gives an interesting account of the discovery of a Fossil Elephant, on the hill which separates the Rhone and the Saone to the east of the city of Lyons. Some workmen digging a pit in a clayey marl, found, at the depth of seven feet and a-half, some fragments of bones, which were white and rather friable. They were surprised to see these animals remain in what the gardeners call a virgin earth. I went to the place (says the writer of the notice), and soon recognised some of the bones of an elephant. Among the persons who were present, some pretended they were bones of a giant; others, not so ignorant, said they were the skeleton of a mammoth. Those who agreed with me that these large bones had belonged to an elephant, took it into their heads they were the remains of one of those belonging to the army of Hannibal.

CHINESE SAW.

A saw has been introduced into France and the colonies, which will saw the largest and longest trees when laid on the ground, and not placed on stocks as is the common practice. This instrument, originally of Chinese invention, has not been known; and though found already to be very useful, is susceptible of yet greater improvements.

JUNCTION OF THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC.

On the 4th of November (says an American paper) the President of Mexico published, by order, a decree of the Sovereign Congress, which authorized him to receive proposals for cutting open a communication between the two oceans, by the isthmus of Tehuantepec: and for rendering navigable the rivers of Alvarado, Panuco, Bravo del Norte, Santiago, and Colarod of the West. The enterprise of thus uniting the Pacific and the Atlantic is of the greatest importance.

RICE PAPER.

The substance called rice paper, which is brought from China and much used for representing richly-coloured insects and other objects of natural history, and for making artificial flowers, is ascertained to be a vegetable production. On being exposed to the action of boiling olive oil it was made transparent, and thus its structure was ascertained. It consists of long hexagonal cells, their length being parallel to the surface of the film: when in its usual state these cells are filled with air, which renders it soft and well adapted to many purposes. It is said to be the membrane of the bread-fruit tree, the artocarpus incisi-folia of naturalists.—Edinb. Journ. of Science.

EASTERN AND WESTERN BEAUTIES.

A correspondent in the Bengal Hurkaru states, as an incontrovertible fact, that the beauties of the west have greater attractions with the natives of India, than their aboriginal beauties. With the Mahomedan part, vanity directs the same preference; but their west is limited by the Mussulman empire. He adds the following fact: "Few people know that a ship which sails between this port and the Red Sea is secretly employed for the express purpose of gratifying the vanity of the eastern Omrahs of ingrafting a progeny on the genuine stock from the land of Mahomet. An annual importation of little nymphs is made from this favoured land, and the great are supplied with them according to their claims upon the consideration of the importers. Every attention is paid to the beauties on their transit to this country, and costly dresses, as well as jewels, are given them to enhance their worth with their future lords. A ship full arrived not long ago."

VOLCANOS IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

A letter from Mr. Rupell, dated Ambukol, 3d May 1824, states that in Kordoufan, in Central Africa, there is a chain of half-extinct volcanoes, particularly Djebel-Koddagi, where a very lofty conical summit smokes constantly, and throws out hot ashes without intermission. The Editors of the Bulletin Universel state that Mr. Rupell never was in Kordoufan; and they contend that, admitting the truth of the above representation, it does not show that Djebel Koddagi is a real volcano. The flow of lava is the only certain evidence; and even then, it would prove only an exception to the general rule.

A letter from this traveller dated 27th July last, states that, in consequence of the commotions in Western Africa, he had lost all his office's, instruments, and books, which he left at Ené.

WHITE COPPER.

M. Frick, a German chemist, has formed several alloys in imitation of white-copper, or the Pakfong of the Chinese. A mixture in the following preparations—

Copper.....	41.75
Nickel	32.25
Zinc	26.00

composed a greyish alloy, very little malleable when cold, not at all when heated; flattening with difficulty. Another, according to this formula—

Copper.....	50.00
Zinc	31.25
Nickel	18.75

produced a white metal susceptible of a beautiful polish, easily flattened, malleable when cold, unalterable by the atmosphere, and sonorous like silver. A third alloy, formed as follows:

Copper.....	53.39
Nickel	17.48

approached still nearer to silver in colour and sound. It was harder than that metal, very tenacious, but also exceedingly ductile. Its sp. gr. was at 15° 4 of Reaumur. 8.556.—[Bullet. Univers.]

ENTOMOLOGY.

Dr. Afzelius, in a paper published in the 4th vol. of the Transactions of the Linnean Society, remarks upon the name given to the genus Pausus, that it signifies a pause, cessation, or rest; it being the last described by the great naturalist. A writer in the Bengal Hurkaru considers this etymology as erroneous; he observes that Linné knew but one species of this genus, and in giving it the generic name of Pausus, he simply alluded to the paucity,* or fewness of the genus then known. He adds: Two insects of this genus, with a non-descript species, were found in the splendid collection made by Dr. Wallich, at Nepal, and taken to England by Major-General Hardwicke.

TELEGRAPHS IN INDIA.

The Semaphoric plan of telegraphs is about to be introduced into Bengal. A model of a semaphor is now at Calcutta; and part of the machinery is preparing on a large scale for trial: the indices or hands are of sheet iron; the counter-balance is of equal length, also metallic; below these, there is an auxiliary short wooden arm. It is represented to be more complicated than the Admiralty semaphor in England. A communication with Madras, it is expected, will require only 48 hours.

BELZONI'S EGYPTIAN TOMB.

The Egyptian tomb explored by the late enterprising traveller Belzoni was opened to the private inspection of many noble personages and eminent literary characters, English and foreign, on the 31st March, previous to its public exhibition. Mrs. Belzoni, the traveller's widow (who has a peculiarly strong claim upon the generosity of the British nation), received the visitors. The chambers are formed exactly after the models made by Belzoni; the figures, symbols and hieroglyphics are copied with scrupulous fidelity; and the tomb is, in fact, a perfect fac-simile of the original. The story in the principal chamber is comprehended, with a little attention, by the most superficial spectator. It relates to the actions of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, and exhibits various records of his victories. One is extremely curious: it represents Persian, Ethiopian, and Jewish captives, in their genuine costume, and with their peculiar characteristics of person. A new chamber, particularly interesting to the student of Egyptian antiquities, is now added to the tomb as formerly exhibited.

SATELLITES OF VENUS.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: In your Journal for this month, page 460, is an extract from the Calcutta John Bull, upon the discovery of two satellites near to the planet Venus, said to be distinctly observable by the reflection from a mirror, but not perceptible in the heavens by the naked eye. Had the person who made this discovery taken a little trouble before he propagated it to the world, he would have perceived that it was an optical illusion. I am at a loss to give a scientific elucidation; but let any of your readers examine the subject for themselves, and they will be satisfied that my assertion is true. By holding the mirror or looking-glass at right angles with the planet, two images will be observed, one on the right the other on the left of the reflected planet, thus Then, by turning the mirror, but still keeping it at the same angle, the images will appear to revolve round the planet; again, by allowing the rays of light from the planet to fall at a very acute angle upon the mirror, and the reflection from thence to fall in like manner upon the retina of the eye, the images will be multiplied or reflected six or eight times, thus, or with comæ ascending from the smaller dots, increasing in length with the distance from the planet's image. By turning the mirror, but still holding it at the same angle, and keeping the eye in the same position, the images will appear to revolve round the reflection of the planet, and in the opposite direction will appear in inverted order: all the images appearing at equal distances from each other. Query, do not these multiplied reflections occur in consequence of irregularities at the surface of the glass preventing all the rays from escaping by immediate reflection, and by refracting them at particular angles to the allured side, cause them to be again reflected, and become visible at various points? Perhaps these observations may attract some of your scientific readers, who may produce a solution of the problem.

I am, &c.

THE PEPPUL TREE.

The Peppul tree, or Ficus religiosa, often grows on old walls or houses. A writer in the Hurkaru says—"In a piece of waste ground in Clive Street (Calcutta) there stands an old post, in which some of the seeds of the ficus religiosa have been deposited, and which have produced a large tree, nearly equal in size to the post. On the roof of my godown, too, a tree of this description has taken foot, and has now attained to a considerable size; and so penetrating are its roots, that they have insinuated themselves through the roof, from whence they hang like a coarse red fringe. A few days ago some of these, having come in contact with the inside wall of the godown, had begun to shoot forth leaves, but I tore them off, being apprehensive of the consequences."

ASTRONOMICAL ERRORS.

It is said that, in consequence of the charge brought against the Greenwich Observations for 1821 (see p. 162), the subject has been agitated in the council of the Royal Society, and the publisher has been directed to sell no more copies of the work for the present.

REMEDY AGAINST THE BITE OF SERPENTS.

The shrub guaco, a sort of climber, or pliant willow, found in the warm and temperate regions of Santa Fé, about 45° north lat., not only possesses the property of neutralizing the venom of the rattlesnake, and other serpents, whose bite proves fatal in the course of a few minutes, but may be used as a prophylactic, and with such efficacy, that some doses of the juice of the pounded leaves, properly administered, will render a person invulnerable to the bite of these reptiles. M. Leguavel mentions several facts, attested by the local authorities, which prove that persons bitten by the most venomous serpents have been saved from ill consequences by the juice of the shrub guaco. We should like to know, from some of our botanical friends, whether the guaco is to be found in this country, and whether its properties are known.—[Cal. John Bull.

We hear, too, that Mr. Fraser has interspersed his work with a variety of anecdotes, characteristic of the King, Court, and Government of Persia, which are likely to be amusing as well as instructive; and having been an eyewitness to the progress of that dreadful malady, the epidemic cholera, which appeared in Persia during his residence there, he has been enabled to give a particular account of its destructive effects in some of the chief cities of that country.

Burmese War.

Copy of Letter from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell to Geo. Swinton, Esq., dated Head-Quarters, Rangoon, 4th Sept. 1824.

Sir: The enemy in the Dalla district having of late become very troublesome by their predatory excursions, rushing from the creeks and nullahs, with which the country abounds, upon unarmed boats, and even fishermen from the garison, and having again established his head-quarters of these marauding bands in the stockades taken by Lieut. Col. Kelly's detachment on the 8th ultimo, much strengthened by additional works, I once more determined to drive them not only from the stockades, but permanently to a greater distance.

For that purpose, I directed Major R. L. Evans, of the Madras army, with a detachment of infantry, accompanied by two mortars from the brigade, commanded by Capt. Timbrell, and some howitzers from the Madras artillery, under Capt. Kennan, to proceed up the Dalla creek on the 2d inst., and shell the enemy from their position. Such was the excellent practice of the artillery and gun boats, under the immediate orders of Capt. Marryat, manned by the officers and crews of H.M.'s ship Larne, and H.C.'s transport Molra, that the enemy were soon forced to abandon their defences, with some considerable loss, and I am happy to say with only one man slightly wounded on our part.

On taking possession of the stockade, Capt. Marryat and Major Evans pushed up the creek, and succeeded in taking twenty-five boats and canoes from the enemy, who, seeing themselves closed with, jumped overboard, and escaped into the jungle.

Major Evans's arrangements for cutting off the retreat of the enemy were excellent; but the swampy state of the country, and thickness of the jungle, prevented their meeting with the success they so well merited. To him, and every officer and soldier employed, my best thanks are due.

I cannot do adequate justice to the sense I entertain of the ability and readiness with which I find myself at all times supported by Capt. Marryat, and the officers and crew of the ship under his command; nor ought I to omit mentioning that the officers and crew of the transport ship Molra are volunteers on every occasion when the enemy is likely to be met with.

I am, &c. A. CAMPBELL, Brig. Gen.

Copy of Letter from same to same, dated Head-Quarters, Rangoon, Sept. 8, 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to forward, for the information of the right hon. the Governor-General in Council, the enclosed report from Capt. Marryat, of H.M.'s ship Larne, of an attack upon a small post established a short distance up the Dalla creek.

The gallantry and good conduct of all engaged in this first rencontre with the enemy's war-boats, affords me much satisfaction; and Capt. Marryat has particularly mentioned to me the steadiness with which Lieut. Wright, and a platoon of the 18th Madras N.I., received the enemy, both by land and water.

All accounts concur in bearing testimony to the resolute gallantry of Mr. Crawford, in defending his vessel, the Kitty, against very superior numbers, although wounded early in the attack; and I beg leave to bring his name to the favourable notice of the right hon. the Governor-General in Council.

I have, &c. A. CAMPBELL, Brig. Gen.

Copy of Letter from Capt. Marryat, commanding H.M.'s ship Larne, to Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, dated off Rangoon, 8th Sept. 1824.

Sir: In compliance with your request for a detail of the circumstances which occurred in the attack on the Dalla stockade, made by the Burmese on the morning of the 8th inst. I have the honour to inform you, that at midnight on the 8th, a straggling fire was heard in that direction, and shortly afterwards a rocket was thrown up, the signal previously arranged with the detachment in case of immediate assistance being required.

With the advantage of a strong flood-tide, the boats of H.M.'s ship Larne proceeded rapidly to the scene of contest, where a heavy fire was exchanged. As our approach could not be perceived from the smoke, we cheered to announce that support was at hand, and had the satisfaction to hear it warmly returned, both by the detachment in the stockade, and the crews in the gun-vessels.

It appeared that the attacks of the enemy had been simultaneous, the gun-brigs lying in the creek having been assailed by a number of war-boats, while the detachment on shore had been opposed to a force estimated at fifteen hundred to two thousand men.

Upon our arrival we found the enemy on shore had not retreated, but still kept up a galling fire; the war boats, which had endeavoured to board the Kitty gun-brig, had been beat off by the exertions and gallantry of Mr. Crawford, commanding that vessel, and were apparently rallying at a short distance up the creek, with a determination to renew the attack; but on perceiving our boats advancing a-head of the gun-brigs, they made a precipitate retreat.

Although from their superior speed there was little probability of success, chase was immediately given, and five of the war-boats which had been most severely handled, and could not keep up with the main body, were successively boarded and captured; many others appeared to be only half manned, but we could not undertake them, and the pursuit was abandoned about four miles above the stockade.

The spears remaining on the sides of the gun-brig, the ladders attached to her rigging, and the boarding netting cut through in many places, proved the severe conflict which had been sustained; and I trust you will be pleased to recommend the very meritorious conduct of Mr. Crawford to the consideration of the right hon. the Governor-General in Council.

Great praise is due to Mr. J. King, of the Narcissa, and Mr. Frances, of the Tiger, for the well directed and destructive fire which they poured into the war-boats, and I trust, as an eye-witness, I may be allowed to express my admiration of the intrepid conduct of the officer commanding the detachment on shore.

The loss of the enemy in this attack cannot be correctly ascertained; but from the number of dead in the boats captured, and the crippled state of many others, it cannot be estimated at less than two or three hundred men.

I have, &c. F. MARRYAT, Capt., H.M.'s ship Larne.

Extract Letter from the Governor-General in Council to the Secy. Committee of Directors of E. I. Company, dated Fort William, 12th Nov. 1824.

Since the date of our last address to your hon. Committee, we have received several important despatches from Brig. Gen. Sir Archibald Campbell, copies of which we hasten to transmit for your information. From these despatches your hon. Committee will learn the particulars of the capture of Tavoy and Mergul, the most valuable possessions of the Burmese on the Tenasserim coast. You will also be apprised of a very brilliant and decisive attack on the 6th and 7th October, by a detachment of troops under the command of Major Evans, on the enemy's stockades near the village of Martaban, in the neighbourhood of Rangoon, where the Prince of Sarawaddy had pushed forward a part of his force, under the immediate command of the two principal ministers of state, named Koo Woongee, and Lykia Woongee.

We also annex copies of despatches containing the latest intelligence from the north-eastern and south-eastern frontier. From the former quarter we learn that the Burmese in Cachar have evacuated the posts of Tiliway and Doodpattee. In that country, and retreated to Manipul. The party in Assam is said to have been prevented by the hill tribes from returning to Ava by the eastern route, and is supposed to have proceeded through the hills in the direction of Cachar, with the view of making its escape into Manipul also. In Arracan the Burmese are said to be strengthening their several posts, in expectation of an attack from our troops assembling in Ceylogong. A successful landing was effected on the island of Ramree, as reported in the letters of Capt. Barnes and Lieut. Col. Hampton, and we have no doubt that, whenever it may be convenient to detach a force to take possession of it, the place will fall without difficulty into our hands.

Extract Letter from Capt. Barnes, commanding the E. L. Company's frigate Hastings, to Gen. Swinton, Esq., dated Cheduba Roads, 21st Sept. 1824.

I have great pleasure in transmitting to you, for the information of the right hon. Lord Amherst, Governor-General in Council, an account of a most daring, well-conducted, and successful attack made by two cutters, belonging to the H.C.'s frigate Hastings, under my command, on four boats, belonging to the enemy, on the coast of Ramree; and trust that my entering somewhat into detail will be excused, as I am anxious to do justice to the officers and men who so gallantly achieved the dispersion of the enemy, whose numbers were so disproportionate to their little force.

On the morning of the 18th inst., at daylight, the look-out at the mast-head announced three large boats to be in sight, close under the shore of Ramree, and about five or six miles distant from the frigate, sailing to the southward. I immediately directed the two 10-oared cutters to be manned and sent six marines in each, placing one boat under the command of Lieut. Harrison, and of the frigate, Mr. Graves, master's-mate, being in charge of one boat, with orders to bring them alongside, if possible. Some time after the cutters had left the ship, I observed a fourth boat, and could plainly perceive they were all full of men; our launch unfortunately being absent water-lug, I manned and armed the two boats belonging to the pilot brig Meriton and Planet, with European seamen and marines, and dispatched them to the assistance of the cutters; but, owing to the start they had of them, and these being very heavy pulling boats, they were not able to assist in the capture, which I cannot better describe to his Lordship than by transmitting the very modest, but mainly successful, Lieut. Harrison, describing the affair. I should have the honour to send a list of the men captured, and understand a considerable quantity was lost in the boat that was bilged, and which was the largest of the four, and had their sidar on board it, who, it is believed, escaped.

15 muskets, 1 bayonet, 130 spears, 93 swords, 1 swivel gun.

A large quantity of gun-powder, the major part damaged by water.

Some musket ammunition that had been taken from our troops at Ramoo.

A quantity of musket balls and flints.

Copy of Report from Lieut. Harrison to Capt. Barnes, dated on board the frigate Hastings, Cheduba Roads, 10th Sept. 1824.

Sir: In pursuance of your orders this morning, I proceeded with the two cutters under my command, in pursuit of four boats belonging to the enemy, as seen from the Hastings pulling along the Ramree coast, to the southward; after a smart pull of about six miles, I had closed with the chase so near as to enable the cutter, under the command of Mr. Graves, to interrupt the two sternmost boats of the enemy, while myself succeeded in turning the two boats in advance; they then seemed inclined to receive us warmly, by giving loud cheers, which were immediately returned by our seamen and marines with their accustomed spirit; a fire of musketry now commenced on both sides, and the enemy, perceiving our intention of laying them on board, immediately beached their boats; we pursued so closely as to enable us to do considerable mischief; three boats were captured and towed into deep water, six of the enemy made prisoners, and the fourth boat, I regret to say, was bilged and rendered useless; so precipitate was their retreat, that they left every thing behind, and amongst various articles a great number of arms, of all descriptions, have been captured.

I feel much pleasure in bringing to your notice the zeal and exertions of Mr. Graves, to whom the highest praise is due, as well as the satisfactory conduct of every body employed, particularly the seamen, whose great exertions in pulling deserves my best thanks, and although the second division of boats were not up at the commencement, I have every reason to suppose they aided in enabling me to effect my purpose without the loss of a man; as the enemy could not be estimated at less than four hundred effective men, their loss in killed and wounded I have no means of ascertaining correctly, but I should imagine it to exceed sixty.

I have, &c. G. B. HARRISON, Lieut.

Extract Letter from Lieut. Col. Hampton, commanding at Cheduba, to Lieut. Col. Nicol, Adj. Gen. of the army, dated 23d Oct. 1824.

Capt. Barnes, of the H.C.'s frigate Hastings, having intimated to me his intention of making another reconnaissance on the enemy's coast with the frigate and gun-boats under his command, and having made a requisition for two hundred men of my regiment, I ordered the frigate company to be completed to that number, with the usual proportion of European commissioned, and native commissioned, and non-commissioned officers, under the command of Capt. Vincent, for the service, furnishing, at the same time, two European artillerymen for each of the gun-boats of the third division Rodia under Capt. Finckes.

The whole embarked on the 19th inst., on board the frigate and two vessels, Planet, and the H.C.'s surveying ship Investigator, proceeded the same afternoon to the point of attack.

I have the honour to transmit, for his Excy's information, a copy of Capt. Vincent's report.

Copy of Letter from Capt. Vincent to Lieut. and Adj. Margrave, dated Cheduba, 18th Oct. 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to report the return of the detachment embarked under my command, for service on the island of Ramree, and to state, for Lieut.

Lieut. Col. Hampton's information, that, having, in conformity to his instructions, placed myself and troops at the disposal of Capt. Barnes, commanding the H.C.'s ships of war and gun-boats on this station, on the morning of the 16th inst., joined by one hundred seamen and marines, and soon after landed in front of a breast-work, which had been occupied by the Burmese during the morning, but evacuated immediately on our advancing to attack it. I then pushed on to the stockade, described by Lieut. Col. Hampton as being in an unfinished state, but found it completely destroyed, a few axles only remaining to mark its exact situation & bearing, however, from the guide, that there was a fortified village a short distance in front, I proceeded on till we came to a stockade, which we found totally abandoned, although capable of defence against any but a British force, without guns. As I had the advantage of your valuable services on this, as well as every other occasion, during the day, I must request that you will do me the favour to afford Lieut. Col. Hampton any information he may be desirous of obtaining as to the strength of this post, its peculiarity of construction, and description of buildings within it, the report itself being too unimportant to intrude any thing further on the Lieut. Colonel's attention; than merely to state the nature of the service on which the detachment was employed.

Conceiving it probable that the Burmese had returned to a stockade, which I understood was no great distance from us, I did not consider it advisable to delay longer than was necessary for the destruction of the buildings in and about that we were in possession of; and after a march of nearly a mile, had the satisfaction to find the guide's information correct; but although inferior to the other only in size, we were allowed to enter this second stockade, as usual, without resistance, the Burmese having fled in all directions on the appearance of the advanced guard.

As the abandonment of this last stockade evinced but little inclination, on the part of the enemy, to afford us an opportunity of doing more in that direction, I thought it advisable, after the whole of the buildings from many of which I had the satisfaction to see large quantities of powder exploded, to return to the beach and bivouac, near the breast-work we had possessed ourselves of on landing. I ought to have mentioned before, that we were joined in the morning by a party of the militia militia, doing duty on board the gun-boats; these men were stationed as a plique in rear of the line, the piquets of the regular native infantry being thrown out in directions whence a night attack was more to be apprehended; it appears, however, that between three and four in the morning, a few of the enemy had the temerity to advance on the sentries, and actually fired amongst them, wounding three privates, and one of them so badly as to render amputation of the right arm necessary; I am happy to add that the plique behaved with the greatest steadiness on this occasion.

Having made a march of about four miles to the northward, where it was reported some large boats were in a creek, and finding only one, which was immediately thrown out, the detachment returned to the beach, and re-embarked on board the boats held in readiness for that purpose.

Although this report has nothing to detail of a brilliant nature, it must nevertheless be gratifying to Lieut. Col. Hampton, that the conduct of every individual belonging to the detachment was such as to ensure, on any future occasion of greater difficulty, every possible advantage which bravery and devotion to its interests can bestow; and though it may be considered presumptuous in me to speak of the merits of any other branch of the service than that to which I immediately belong, I cannot, in the present instance, avoid bringing to the notice of the Lieutenant Colonel, the highly meritorious conduct of the officers, seamen, and marines of the H.C.'s Indra, Indra, and surveying-ship Investigator, who acted in conjunction with the troops, not only as regards their readiness to meet every obstacle which the nature of the service led us to expect, but likewise in their steady and prompt obedience to the rigid rules of discipline, which the peculiar nature of the enterprise rendered so essentially necessary to be observed.

I have, &c.

W. VINGENT, Capt. 25th N.I., late in com. of a detachment.

Extract Letter from Lieut. Col. Innes, C.B., commanding the Sylhet frontier, to Lieut. Col. Nicoll, Adj. Gen. of the army, dated on the river near Bunderpore, the 25th Oct. 1824.

I have the honour, for the information of his Exc. the Commander-in-Chief, to report, that information having been received from some of the hulkards of the intelligence department, that the Burmese army in Cachar were retreating towards Munnipore, I directed a reconnaissance this morning to be made; accordingly, a party under the command of Capt. Hawes, accompanied by Lieut. Fisher, of the quarter-master-general's department, proceeded up the Barrak river at day-break, attended by the flotilla to Jutrapore, where a disembarkation was effected, and the party marched across to Thoyan, which place was found evacuated, and the works partly destroyed; from the intelligence collected from the natives of Cachar, who had been captured with the Burmese, it appears that the main body of the army, which occupied a large station at Doctpalie, left, in progress to Munnipore, early yesterday morning, and the rear guard vacated Thoyan early last night; the same body is said to be now at Bankaldy, on the route to Munnipore, and distant from my present position four days' march in the dry season; but at present, I regret to say, the country remains so much under water, that it would be impossible to march regular troops across, consequently the enemy are now beyond pursuit.

Supplement to London Gazette, April 20, 1825.

India Board, April 20, 1825.

A despatch has been received at the East-India House from the Governor-General in Council at Fort William, in Bengal, with inclosures; of which the following are extracts and copies:

Extract Letter from the Governor-General in Council to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors of the E. I. Company, dated Fort William, 7th Dec. 1824.

We have received despatches from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, announcing the very gratifying intelligence of the capture of the valuable town and port of Martaban, by a detachment of Europeans and natives, under the command of Lieut. Col. Godwin, of H.M.'s 41st regt., and a party of British seamen of H.M.'s ships Arachne and Sophie. Copies of Sir A. Campbell's despatches are transmitted as numbers in the packet, and will, we are assured, be perused by your hon. Committee, with sentiments of great satisfaction.

We have received reports from the north-eastern frontier of various successes gained by our troops in Assam, over the Burmese governor and the small remnant of his army. The enemy in that quarter are obviously in a state of the greatest alarm, and anxiously endeavouring to effect their escape through the passes into Munnipore. The Burmese troops in Munnipore are said to have received orders to retire rapidly upon the capital, and reports from that quarter state that the interior of the Burman empire is in a very agitated and disturbed condition, in consequence of the Burmese having invaded it in great force.

Copy of Letter from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., to Gen. Swinton, Esq., dated Headquarters, Rangoon, 7th Nov. 1824.

Sir: For the last fortnight I remained under a very considerable degree of uneasiness at not hearing of, or from, the expedition I had sent against Martaban on the 11th ult., under the command of Lieut. Col. Godwin, of H.M.'s 41st regt., apprehensive that the strong currents that prevail on this coast on the change of the monsoons, might have driven them either past the port or out to sea, and the consequent deprivation of provisions and water; but the arrival at headquarters last night of my aide-de-camp, who accompanied Lieut. Col. Godwin, as a volunteer, dispelled all my apprehensions, and now enables me to transmit you, for the information of the right hon. the Governor-General in Council, the detail of an achievement, no less honourable than beneficial to the British arms, reflecting the highest credit on the able, judicious, and and gallant officer that led, as well as every individual composing the force under his command. a have, &c.

A. CAMPBELL, Brig-Gen.

Extract further Letter from same to the same, dated Head-Quarters, Rangoon, 7th Nov. 1824.

By this opportunity I have the honour to transmit you Lieut. Col. Godwin's report of the fall of Martaban, which will be read with interest, as evincing another proof of the impression our arms have made on the minds of the enemy. It will scarcely be credited, that upwards of four thousand men, well armed, and well prepared for the attack, from the unforeseen impediments the expedition met with in reaching its destination, and fighting behind defences of a very formidable nature, should be driven out of them by a mere handful of British troops. On this occasion you will be pleased to see the same manner in which Lieut. Col. Godwin speaks of the 3d Madras Nat. Lt. Inf., one of the corps which retired from the stockade at Keyloo.

Copy of Report from Lieut. Col. Godwin to Brig-Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., dated Martaban, 2d Nov. 1824.

Sir: The force you did me the honour to place under my command for the capture of the town of Martaban and its dependencies, cleared the Rangoon river on the morning of the 14th ult.; but owing to the ignorance of the people acting as pilots, with calm and contrary currents, the expedition did not reach Martaban till the morning of the 29th.

It was my intention to have landed on my arrival at Martaban, but the tides which run rapidly here, rendered it almost impracticable, and the ships having it in their power to get nearer the defences in the evening, I deferred landing till the next morning at day-break. I took two opportunities this day to see the whole front of the place, with Capt. Waterman, assistant quarter-master general, and Capt. Kennan, commanding the artillery. Its appearance was uncommonly strong and commanding, and differed from any thing we have seen about here. The place rests at the bottom of a very high hill, washed by a beautiful and extensive sheet of water; on its right a rocky mound, on which was placed two-gun battery with a deep nullah under it. This battery communicates with the usual stockade of timber, and behind this a work of masonry, varying from twelve to twenty feet thick, with small embrasures for either cannon or musketry. The stockade runs along the margin of the water for more than three-quarters of a mile, where it joins a larger pagoda, which projects into the water in the form of a bastion. The defences thence continue a short distance, and end at a nullah, on the other side of which all is thick jungle. The town continues to run in an angle way from the pagoda for at least a mile, and terminates in the house of the Mayoon, close to a stockade up the hill. The whole defence is the waterline with its flanks protected.

The rear of the town and works is composed of thick jungle and large trees, and open to the summit of the hill: as we moved along the place all was silent, not a gun to be perceived, but a slight sapper-work to hide every thing behind the embrasures in the pagoda, and few men to be observed on the works. They never offered to fire on the boat, though rather close in shore. The second time we went to look at it, the same silence prevailed, so that we were induced to think the place abandoned. Shortly, however, after this remark, the ships had approached nearer the works, when a well-directed fire was opened on them from the fort on the height, and down the line a well-pointed gun, from the pagoda, with grape, was at the same time fired at my boat, and wounded a seaman of the Mohra, whose arm was amputated an hour after. I was prepared for a determined resistance by the quantities of boats filled with men crossing; as we went up the river, two chinkeys opened a smart but useless fire on us.—I made it a rule never to fire first.

All the night of the 30th there was a cannonade from both sides, and the excellent practice of Capt. Kennan, of the Madras artillery, commanding, assisted by Lieut. M. Gregor, of the Bengal artillery, in the bomb vessel, must have done great execution among the defenders of the works, whose repeated shouts informed us that their numbers were great.

I had made up my mind to storm the stockade immediately under, and to the left of the rocky battery on the enemy's right; and when in, to storm the battery itself, and then the business could be but easy, as we should take all the works in flank.

At five o'clock in the morning of the 31st, the men composing the first division, were in their boats. Ninety-eight men of H.M.'s 41st regt., exclusive of the 3d Nat. Lt. Inf., eight of the 3d Artillery, and thirty-eight seamen of the Porpoise; about two hundred and twenty men; were fully aware that these men would have been opposed to themselves, as I had no where to wait for the remainder of the force, and every boat was occupied. The advance sounded a little after five, and the boats rowed off, and soon came under a very heavy fire of all arms. On approaching the shore, I perceived there had been a misunderstanding, with respect to the spot at which I wished to land, and we had got on the wrong side of the nullah, as we could not carry the ladders through the mud. I ordered the boats to push off and put in at the place I appointed; at this time a heavy fire of artillery and musketry was on us, and the ladders would not face it. Lieut. Keele, of the Arache, commanding the naval force, with me, pushed on shore, and gallantly went to see if the nullah could be passed; he came back almost directly, and informed me, there was a boat in the nullah, over which the men could go, and the side of the rock to the battery appeared practicable. Trusting to the gallantry of the people with me, I determined to try it, and from the men getting on shore, there was not a halt till we had possession of it. It was stormed under a heavy fire of musketry, and the rock not high, but to appearance impracticable, and in the opinion of the enemy it was so.

The enemy did not leave the fort till we were within a few paces of them, and they even threw stones at us, when we were too much under the fort for the first to reach us. It is due to Capt. Burrows, of H.M.'s 41st regt., and Lieut. Keele, royal navy, to say they were in first. I now felt secure of the place, and after waiting till the men had recovered from the exertion, and to get them together, they marched down along the works, and cleared all before them. The 3d Lt. Inf. flanking us in the wood, I proceeded to the pagoda, near which they appeared disposed to stand; however, they only suffered the more by it. On entering the pagoda, I was surprised not to find it full, but on looking over the wall, they were in hundreds, rushing down, taking the water, and crossing the jungle. There were about one hundred and twenty musketeers on them, and their loss was very severe.

All opposition was now at an end, and on marching through the town it was, as usual, deserted, except by a great many women. The Woonghies had six elephants ready, and had escaped with, as I am told, a good deal of property. The emptiness of the houses showed every preparation had been made, if the place was captured, to prevent our getting any property. I inclose you a return of the guns taken, as also the ordnance stores, and the quantities of the latter immense, kept in stockade about half a mile up the hill, and a regular manufactory to make the powder. I had it blown up yesterday.

Our loss has been comparatively small, seven killed and fourteen wounded. Capt. Booth is not badly wounded. In this immense place, with so many facilities to escape, I cannot guess what the enemy's loss may have been; but from the prisoners, of whom we have a great many, and other sources, it must have been great, as allowing that two-thirds of the numbers reported were within this place at the attack, there must have been between three and four thousand.

Where every one expended honourably, it would be difficult to select for your particular notice. I must ask your best thanks, however, for Capt. Waterman, 13th Lt. Inf., assistant-quarter-master-general, for the advice and assistance I have had, and still have, from him; for Lieut. Cochrane, H.M.'s 41st regt., acting brigade major; for Capt. Kennan, Madras artillery, commanding; Capt. Hepburn, detachment 41st regt.; Capt. Williamson, 3d Nat. Lt. Inf., which regiment died in this attack with British courage; and Lieut. M. Gregor, of the Bengal artillery, who, among his men with muskets, and were distinguished in the attack; Lieut. Keele, of the Arache; Lieut. Bainton, of the Sophie, and their respective crews, behaved with their usual gallantry.

Lieut. Keele's unwearied exertions with this little little force, as also the share he has taken in the fall of the place, together with the good understanding kept up between the services, I leave for you, Sir, properly to appreciate.

Your own, and aide-de-camp, Lieut. Campbell, of H.M.'s 38th regt., will present you this despatch, a volunteer on the expedition, whose gallantry and other qualities make me very sorry to part with him.

I have, &c.

Extract Letter from Lieut. Col. Richards, commanding in Assam, to D. Scott, Esq., Agent to the Governor-General, on the north-east frontier, dated on the river, off Gowahatty, 15th Nov. 1824.

I commenced operations about the 20th ult., by detaching Majors Cooper and Waters, the former to Kullabar, and the latter to Rahachokey, with the intention of repossessing ourselves of the country west of Kullabar, which is as much as I can do, being without the means of marching a corps in the interior, which I consider absolutely necessary.

From the result of several successful enterprises, of which I have the pleasure to send you copies, I am happy to say this object has been accomplished; but as the Boora Rajah and his followers are still on the borders, I have sent orders and instructions to Majors Cooper and Waters to attempt their destruction, and I have every hope they will fall into our hands, or be obliged to try the road to Munnipore, in which case their annihilation is certain, as the Naghas will no doubt cut them up.

Copy of Letter from Major Cooper to Capt. Baylodon, Major of brigade in Assam, dated Kullabar, 31st Oct. 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to report, for the information of Lieut. Col. Richards, commanding the troops in Assam, that having obtained information of a party of sixty Burmahs being at Dickaree, in Chardone, under Cogcutie and Hillee Fookan, belonging to the Moogum Rajah, I detached a party of forty men there, under the command of Lieut. Watson (Chumparun Light Inf.), in three police row-boats, on the evening of the 29th inst., considering my detachment to be within one day's journey of Kullabar.

I have now the satisfaction of reporting, that Lieut. Watson's party succeeding in surprising the enemy yesterday afternoon in some huts at Dickaree, in which little affair Cogcutie Fookan and six Burmahs were killed, Hillee Fookan and four Burmahs, two Doonahs, and thirteen women and children taken prisoners; also a small war-boat and nine inefficient muskets have been taken.

The surprise of the enemy, I am happy to state, has set at liberty two Christians (natives) in the employ of Mr. Bruce, of Juggy-gumai, named Henry Collins, and Frederick Swain, also a native merchant, named Shaik Sahagge, who was permitted, on paying a sum of money, to leave Jeor-haut eight days ago.

Lieut. Watson's party and prisoners joined me again to-day; he reports, that the men of the corps behaved in a steady and spirited style. I must, in a great measure, attribute their success to the judicious arrangements adopted by Lieut. Watson for the attack, and to the military ardour and zeal, for the good of the service, I have on all occasions observed in him to possess, and which I trust will, at some future time, meet with his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's favourable consideration.

I have also to report, that the Chumparun Lt. Inf. and four gall-boats reached Kullabar this evening, and that the post is unoccupied by the enemy, who, I am informed, are principally collected at Nangong.

This detachment has been much longer in reaching Kullabar than I expected, owing to the easterly winds, strong current, and the tracking grounds being covered with strong and high reeds.

I have, &c.

G. COOPER, Major com. Chumparun Lt. Inf. and detachment.

Copy of Letter from Major Waters, commanding the Dhagepore Local Battalion, to Lieut. Col. Richards, commanding in Assam, dated on the river Kullang, 20th Oct. 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to report to you, that I arrived on the evening of the 27th inst., at a point of the river opposite the village of Moree Kullang, about one-third of the distance between Jagges and Haha (Chokey, where I received intelligence from Lieut. Neufville, of the quarter-master-general's department, of a party of the enemy, amounting to about two hundred and fifty men, being stationed at the village of Hautgong, a few miles inland on the north bank.

I determined on surprising them, and with that view proceeded at one o'clock a.m. yesterday morning, with a detachment of one hundred light infantry of the Dhagepore battalion, which I deemed sufficient, having ascertained that their post was open. After a very fatiguing march of seven hours we reached their position, and completely succeeded in effecting our purpose, the enemy having no intimation whatever of our approach; owing, however, to the thickness of the jungle, and the numerous outlets from the village, their loss has been comparatively small; we did not remain to ascertain the exact amount, but those found killed were chiefly Unseel Burmahs. Had a small party of cavalry been with the detachment, not a man could have escaped, as the enemy effected it with great difficulty, and only by abandoning their women and baggage. After continuing the pursuit some distance over very heavy ground and through grass jungle, and finding that I could not gain upon them, I returned to the village of Hautgong, and subsequently to my hosts.

I have every reason to be highly satisfied with the steadiness and cheerful exertion of the men in this fatiguing march of thirty-five miles, exposed to almost incessant rain, and through country mostly inundated; and feel particularly indebted to the officers who accompanied the detachment (all being on foot), Lieut. Neufville, deputy assistant-quarter-master-general, Lieut. Jones, of the 40th regt., temporarily doing duty with my corps, and Mr. Assistant Surgeon C. Stewart, for the relative assistance afforded me by them in every respect; and I beg further to add, that the correct information I received from the intelligence department, paved the way to ultimate success.

I have, &c.

E. F. WATERS, Major, com. Dhagepore Local Bat.

Copy of Letter from same to the same, dated Rahachokey, on the river Kullang, 3d Nov. 1824.

Sir: It is with extreme satisfaction that I have the honour to report to you the successful result attending an attack on this post, on the morning of yesterday.

On approaching Hachachokey, I had every reason to believe, from the information received from Lieut. Neufville, of the quarter-master-general's department, that my attack on Hantung had directed the attention of the enemy to the line of the great river, and that they were quite unaware of my advance up the Kithing, or that our attack had been made from that quarter.

I therefore again retained the expectation of being able to effect another surprise, which was confirmed by repeated intelligence in progress.

On the night of the 1st inst., I arrived at the situation, which was conceived the best distance from the enemy's post, from whence, to push on the detachment destined for the surprise, and having embarked one hundred men on the gun and light boats, I reached the place about two miles below the point of the river, which I reached, by this arrangement, at day-break.

Having rapidly reconnoitred the situation, I divided my men in two columns, placing Lieuts. Neufville and Jones, of the 1st B.C., to conduct the one by the right into the village, and proceeding myself, with Mr. Assistant Surgeon Stewart, with the other by the left through an unfinished stockade, which the enemy were throwing up.

The party under Lieut. Neufville immediately pushed on, and fortunately came first on the enemy's chief guard, all of whom were either bayoneted or shot; and the alarm being given, the body rushed out of their houses for the purpose of escaping on the opposite side, under a heavy fire; this threw them on my party, which had made a detour by the left, where they were received with great loss. The remainder were pursued nearly two miles, and left many killed and wounded in the jungles; their loss cannot be estimated at less than one-third of their number. I am happy to say no casualty occurred on our side, with the exception of one soldier wounded by a musket-ball.

I had previously been informed that a party of sixty Burmahs, from the main body at this post, had been detached the preceding morning in the direction of Hantung (for the purpose of ascertaining from what quarter the attack of the 28th ultimo had been made, and also to arrange themselves in the villages), and on my return from the pursuit I directed my attention towards them, as Lieut. Neufville had received information of their expected return to their head-quarters.

At mid-day their approach was announced, apparently in total ignorance of the defeat of their main body; and, in consequence, I proceeded with the officers and a party of forty men, with a view of lying in ambush. The plan was, I am happy to add, attended with complete success; and the enemy's loss, in killed and wounded, amounts to nearly half their number, the remainder flying in the greatest confusion towards Nangong, after a feeble attempt at returning our fire.

I have the honour to acquaint you, that I have sent down those of the prisoners brought in from the jungles by the villagers, who are Usael Burmahs, to await your orders. The Doannees will be useful here in clearing our ground.

It is with just satisfaction that I again bring to your notice the active and zealous assistance I derived from the officers under my command (Lieuts. Neufville and Jones, and Mr. Assistant Surgeon Stewart); in the second affair Lieut. Jones contributed personally to the loss of the enemy.

The very steady and spirited conduct of the men was also very praiseworthy.

I have, &c.

E. F. WATERS, Major, com.
Dingapore Local Bat.

P.S. I had omitted to notice, that many of the enemy's arms were found in the guard-room and other places, consisting chiefly of old muskets and a great number of swords, of which some belonged to chiefs.

Copy of Letter from same to the same, dated Nangong, 8th Nov. 1824.

Sir: In continuation of my despatch, of the 3d inst., I have the honour to report, that early on the following morning information was given me, that the main body of the enemy, under the Boora, or Moggaum Rajah (the Burmese Governor of Assam), had quit the stockade, in which they had taken post at Nangong, and had moved to another situation, with the intention of retreating across the hills into Mumpipore; I accordingly ordered out a strong reconnaissance, in the hopes of surprising them, or at least of compelling them to retire within their stockade; and having a sufficient party for the protection of the gun and fort, I proceeded with Lieuts. Neufville and Jones, and Mr. Assistant Surgeon Stewart towards Nangong.

After marching a few miles, I received intelligence that the enemy had commenced their flight towards the hills, leaving a Foshan and eighty Burmahs to cover their retreat; in consequence I pushed on, but was not able to cover the distance in the march, and after continuing it for twenty miles, bivouacked for the night. The next morning we advanced, and occupied the stockade, which the enemy quite evacuated by the enemy, who had given too much upon us to render a pursuit practicable by the cavalry. From the village I learnt that immediately on the alarm being given by the fugitives from Hachachokey, of our attack on them, and the loss sustained, together with the appearance of the wounded, the main body of this post were seized with the utmost panic and consternation; and the Boora Rajah and Foshans determined on instant and precipitate flight; this they effected, leaving behind them all their baggage, plunder, military stores, and heavy property, the greater part of the plunder was immediately seized and secreted by the villagers, and we found the stockade already much destroyed.

We have captured twenty iron guns, a number of boxes of powder, a manufactory of which had been established, and for which the materials captured are of superior quality, three war boats (one very large), the state boat of the Boora Chief, and a number of small ones.

From the appearance of the stockade, and the intelligence gained from the villagers, I am of opinion that our account of their numbers must have been correct, and that there were at least thirteen hundred in all, of whom four or five hundred were Usael Burmahs. The stockade is defended principally by stakes and spikes thickly set all round, but could not have held out if fully exposed, being clearly exposed to the fire of the guns, and also commanded from the opposite banks of the river. The enemy appear to have been totally unprepared for our rapid advance, as all their houses and works were in progress, in a very extended scale, as if for permanent residence. They have fled towards the hills, in a south-easterly direction; but I have not yet been able to ascertain whether they will attempt to cross, or whether they propose to skirt them, directing their flight towards their former positions at Mauroo and the eastward.

I am informed by Lieut. Neufville, deputy assistant-quarter-master-general, that a body of Saum and Unjphas is said to be at Jookauth; but as they are now opposed to the Burmahs, the latter must find themselves on every side beset with difficulties.

I have left a subadar's party, with the gun-boats, at Hachachokey. I have taken post for the present at Nangong, pending your further instructions.

London Gazette Extraordinary, April 24, 1825.

India Board, April 23, 1825.

Despatches have been received at the East-India House from the Governor-General in Council at Fort William, in Bengal, with inclosures, of which the following are copies:

Copy of Letter from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., to Geo. Swinton, Esq., dated Head-Quarters, Rangoon, 25th Nov. 1824.

Sir: Since I had the honour of announcing the capture of Martaban by the troops under Lieut. Col. Godwin, I have received intelligence of the submission of Tenasserim, and the town and small province of Yeah; these places of their own accord requested our protection; and the whole Burmah coast, from Rangoon to the eastward, is now subject to the British arms. The enemy's troops, which fled from the captured towns, and assembled at Yeah, embarked there in forty boats, and I understand have since landed in the district of Dalia. The reiterated accounts I have lately received, from all quarters, of a numerous army collecting in the neighbourhood of Prome, for the purpose of expelling us from Rangoon, fully confirm me in the belief that the effort will be made. Maha Boodah is said to have been nominated to the chief command, and I make no doubt we shall, ere long, have the whole strength strength and that of the enemy to contend with in the narrow boat, and that the British, with the assistance of the British gunboats, and the heavy and light boats, had succeeded in capturing the enemy's boats.

His Highness I have the honour of presenting a report to the British Government of the capture of a gallant little boat with the enemy's boats on the 24th inst.

I have, &c.

A. CAMPBELL, Lieut. Gen.

Copy of Letter from Lieut. General commanding the R. I. C. to the British Government, dated 14th Dec. 1884.

Sir: I have the honour to report that on Sunday, the 7th inst., at 11 a.m. I left this ship in a row-boat, with a guard of six sepoy of the Bombay marine battalion, for the purpose of waiting on the senior officer at Rangoon. Aboard of a small creek, a little below Bassem Creek, six war-boats pulled out and stood up close along till abreast of Bassem Creek, where eight more boats, of the same description, joined them; they then came out and endeavoured to cut him off by pulling across the river, ahead of the row-boat; I kept up a constant fire from the 12-pounder and musketry, until two of the boats came alongside; I immediately jumped on board of them with the sepoy, and succeeded in bayoneting every man. In one of the boats there appeared to be a chief, whom I shot in the act of daring a spear at me. The other twelve boats were coming close up, but seeing the fate of the other two, made off towards the shore, upon which I kept a smart fire while within range. I am sorry to state that, during the action, one sepoy and one row-boat man were severely wounded, the former in two places; in each of these boats were from 20 to 40 men. I cannot conclude this report, without recommending strongly to your notice the gallant conduct of the sepoy of the Bombay marine battalion in leaping into the enemy's boats and for the destructive and well directed fire they kept up on the approach of the enemy, whereby great numbers were either killed or wounded before they came alongside. The conduct of the row-boat men deserves every praise.

I have, &c.

Copy of Letter from Brig. Gen. Sir A. Campbell, K.C.B., to Geo. Swinton, Esq., dated Headquarters, Rangoon, 19th Dec. 1884.

Sir: The long threatened, and on my part no less anxiously wished for, event, has at length taken place: Maha Bundoola, said to be accompanied by the Princes of Tongho and Sarawaddy, appeared in front of my position on the morning of the 1st inst. at the head of the whole united force of the Burman empire, amounting, upon the most moderate calculation, to from fifty to sixty thousand men, apparently well armed, with a numerous artillery, and a body of Cassay herae. Their haughty leader had insolently declared his intention of leading us in captive chains to grace the triumph of the Golden Monarch; but it has pleased God to expose the vanity of his idle threats, and crown the heroic efforts of my gallant little army with a most complete and signal victory.

The enemy had assembled his forces in the heavy jungle in our front during the night of the 30th ult., and being well aware of his near approach, I had previously made every necessary arrangement for his reception, in whatever way he might think proper to leave his impervious camp. The absence of Lieut. Col. Godwin, at Marabon, and of a strong detachment, under Lieut. Col. Mallett, which I had sent to display the British flag in the ancient capital of Pegue, had much weakened my lines; but I had been too long familiar with the resolute courage of British troops to have felt any regret that fortune had given me an opportunity of contending with Bundoola and his formidable legions, even under circumstances of temporary disadvantage.

Early in the morning of the 1st inst. the enemy commenced his operations by a smart attack upon our post at Kammeedine, commanded by Major Vane; and followed by the 35th Madras N.I., with a detachment of the Madras Europ. regt., supported on the river by as strong a naval force as could be spared. As the day became light I discovered numerous, and apparently formidable masses of the advancing enemy issuing from the jungle, and moving at some distance upon both our flanks, for the purpose of surrounding us, which I allowed them to do, without however suffering us to be cut off from our base, and the enemy's advance was completely checked.

Bundoola had now fully opened his main plan of operations, and my first object was to prevent the enemy from adopting a plan of allowing, and even encouraging him to bring forth his numbers and resources from the jungle to the more open country on his left, where I knew I could at any time defeat him with advantage.

The right corps of the Burmese army, composed of the Dallah side of the Mangoon river, and in the course of the morning was observed in several divisions crossing the plain towards the shore of the village of Dallah, where it had been their intention to occupy the almost inaccessible ground on the bank of the river, and from which they soon opened a distant fire upon our position. Another division immediately moved on in front of Kammeedine, and for some time they tried in vain every effort that hope could suggest, but all failed, and the Burmese were obliged to retire, and the British troops, while the Burmese were in retreat, and crowds of war boats were every day employed in the equally vain endeavour to drive the shipping from their station off the place.

The enemy's right wing and centre occupied a range of hills immediately in front of the great Dagon pagoda, covered with so thick a forest as to be impenetrable to all but Burman troops, and their left extended nearly two miles further, along a lower and more open ridge to the village of Pusendoon, where their extreme left rested. They were no sooner thus placed in position than muskets and spears were laid aside for the pick-axe and shovel, and in an incredibly short space of time every part of their line out of the jungle was strongly and judiciously entrenched.

In the afternoon of the 1st, I observed an opportunity of attacking the enemy's left to advantage, and ordered Major Sale, with 400 men from the 13th Lt. Inf. and 10th Madras N.I., under Major Dennie, of the former, and Capt. Ross, of the latter corps, to move forward to the point I had selected, and I never witnessed a more flashing charge than was made on this occasion by Lt. M.'s 13th, while the 10th Lt. Inf. followed their example with a spirit that did them honour, carrying all opposition before them. They burst through the intrenchments, carrying dismay and terror into the enemy's ranks, great numbers of whom were slain, and the party returned loaded with arms, standards, and other trophies. Having correctly ascertained every thing I required, I now, as I originally determined, abstained from giving any serious interruption to the indefatigable labour of the opposing army, patiently waiting until I saw the whole of their material fully brought forward and within my reach. About sunset in the evening, a cloud of skirmishers were pushed forward close under the north-east angle of the pagoda, who taking advantage of the many pagodas and strong ground on our front, commenced a harassing and galling fire upon the works. I at once saw we should suffer from their fire if not dislodged, therefore ordered two companies of the 33rd regt., under Capt. Fyler (an officer I have often had occasion to mention), to advance and drive them back. Were it permitted on such an occasion to dwell upon the enthusiastic spirit of my troops, I would feel a pleasure in recounting the burst of rapture that followed every order to advance against their audacious foe; but it is sufficient to remark that the conduct of these two companies was most conspicuous; they quickly gained their point, and fully acted up to the character they have ever sustained. At day-light, on the morning of the 3d, finding the enemy had very much encroached during the night, and had entrenched a height in front of the north gate of the pagoda, which gave them an enfilading fire upon part of our line, I directed Capt. Wilson, of the 20th regt., with two companies of that corps, and one hundred men of the 35th Madras N.I., to drive them from the hill. No order was ever more speedily or handsomely obeyed. The brave sepoy, with their British comrades in forward gallery, showed the appalled Burmese no time to rally, but drove them from one breast-work to another, fighting them in the very holes they had dug, finally to prove their galls.

In the course of this day Col. Mallett's detachment returned from Pegue, having found the old city completely deserted, and gave me the additional critical means of attacking the enemy the moment the time arrived.

During the 2d and 4th the evening carried on his business with his battery in the vicinity, and but for the inevitable practice of our artillery, commanded by Capt. Murray, in the absence, from indisposition, of Lieut. Col. Hopley, we must have been severely annoyed by the incessant fire from his trenches.

The attacks upon Kammandine continued with unabating violence; but the chivalrous spirit of Major Sale and his steady troops, although exhausted with fatigue and want of rest, baffled every attempt on shore; while Capt. Ryves, with H.M.'s sloop Sophie, the H.C.'s cruiser Teignmouth, and some flotilla and row gun-boats, mostly maintained the long-established fame of the British navy, in defending the passage of the river against the most furious assaults of the enemy's war-boats, advancing under cover of the most tremendous fire-raffs, which the unwearied exertions of British sailors could alone have conquered.

Capt. Ryves had no opportunity of coming in contact with the much vaunted boats of Ava, and in one morning five out of six, each mounting a heavy piece of ordnance, were boarded and captured by our men of war's boats, commanded by Lieut. Kellett, of H.M.'s ship Arctine, and Lieut. Goldfinch, of the Sophie, whose intrepid conduct merits the highest praise.

The enemy having apparently completed his left wing with its full complement of artillery and warlike stores, I determined to attack that part of his line early on the morning of the 5th. I requested Capt. Chadds, the senior naval officer here, to move up to the Puamdoon creek during the night, with the gun-flotilla, bomb-ketch, &c., and commence a cannonade on the enemy's rear at daylight. This service was most judiciously and successfully performed by that officer, who has never yet disappointed me in my most sanguine expectations. At the same time two columns of attack were formed, agreeably to orders I had issued on the preceding evening, composed of details from the different regiments of the army: the first, consisting of 1,100 men, I placed under the orders of that gallant officer, Major Sale, and directed him to attack and penetrate the centre of the enemy's line; the other, consisting of 600 men, I entrusted to Major Walker, of the 3d Madras native light infantry, with orders to attack the left, which had approached to within a few hundred yards of Rangoon. At seven o'clock both columns moved forward to the point of attack. Both were led to my perfect satisfaction, and both succeeded with a degree of ease their intrepid and undaunted conduct undoubtedly ensured; and I directed Lieut. Archbold, with a troop of the Governor-General's body-guard, which had been landed the preceding evening, to follow the column under Major Sale, and take advantage of any opportunity which might offer, to charge.

The enemy were defeated and dispersed in every direction, and the body-guard gallantly charging over the broken and swampy ground, completed their terror and dismay. The Cassy horse fled, mixed with the retreating infantry; and all their artillery, stores, and reserve depôts, which had cost them so much toil and labour to get up, with a great quantity of small arms, gilt chattrais, standards, and other trophies fell into our hands. Never was victory more complete, or more decided; and never was the triumph of discipline and valour over the disjointed efforts of irregular courage, and infinitely superior numbers, more conspicuous. Majors Dennie and Thornhill, of the 15th L. Inf., and Major Gore, of the 88th, were distinguished by the steadiness with which they led their men; but it is with deep regret I have to state the loss we have sustained in the death of Major Walker, one of India's best and bravest soldiers, who fell while leading his column into the enemy's entrenchments; when the command devolved upon Major Wahab, who gallantly conducted the column during the rest of the action; and I observed the 34th Madras Nat. L. Inf. on this occasion conspicuously forward.

The Burmese left wing thus disposed of, I instantly retired to effect upon the right, posted in so thick a growth as to render any attack in that quarter in a great measure impracticable.

On the 6th I had the pleasure of observing, that the Burmese had brought up the scattered remnant of their defeated left to strengthen his right and centre, and upon the 7th and 8th, night employed in carrying on his approaches in front of the great pagoda. I ordered the artillery on shore to fire, and the battery to keep wholly out of sight, allowing him to carry on his fruitless labour with little interruption or molestation. As I expected, he took system and regularity; and on the morning of the 7th, I had the pleasure to observe that the Burmese had by this time stretched so close that the soldiers in their trenches could distinctly hear the incessant thrusts, thrusts, and reproaches of the Burman braves.

The 11th day now arrived to undertake them in their sanguine but ill-founded hopes. I instantly made my arrangements, and at half-past eleven o'clock every thing was in readiness to assault the trenches in four columns of attack, under the superintendence of Lieut. Col. Miles, my second in command, and commanded by Lieut. Cole, Kellett, Pasley, Brodie, and Capt. Wilson, of the 38th regt. At a quarter before 12 I ordered every gun that would bear upon the trenches to open, and their fire was kept up with an effect that never was surpassed; Major Sale at the same time, as directed, making a diversion on the enemy's left and rear.

At 12 o'clock the cannonade ceased, and the columns moved forward to their respective points of attack. Every thing was done under my own immediate eye, but where all behaved so nobly, I cannot particularize; but I must, in justice, state, that Capt. Wilson's and Lieut. Col. Parib's divisions first made an impression, from which the enemy never recovered. They were driven from all their works without a check, abandoning all their guns, with a great quantity of arms of every description, and certainly not the least amusing part of their formidable preparations was a great number of ladders, for ascending the Great Pagoda, found in rear of their position. The total defeat of Bundoola's army was now most fully accomplished; his loss, in killed and wounded, from the nature of the ground, it is impossible to calculate, but I am confident I do not exceed the fairest result when I state it at 5,000 taken. In every other respect the mighty host, which so lately threatened to overwhelm us, now scarcely exists; it commenced its glorious flight during last night; humbled, dispersing, and deprived of their arms, they cannot, for a length of time, again meet us in the field, and the lesson they have now received will, I am confident, prove a salutary antidote to the native arrogance and vanity of the Burmese nation. Thus vanished the hopes of Ava, and those means which the Burmese Government were seven months in organizing for our annihilation have been completely destroyed by us in the course of seven days. Of 300 pieces of ordnance that accompanied the grand army, 240 are now in our camp, and in muskets their loss is to them irreparable.

Our loss, in killed and wounded, although severe, will not, I am sure, be considered great for the important services we have had the honour to perform.

Of my troops I cannot say enough; their valour was only equalled by the cheerful patience with which they bore long and painful privations. My Europeans fought like Britons, and proved themselves worthy of the country that gave them birth; and I trust I do the gallant sepoys justice when I say, that never did troops more equally share the palm of honour, than they to rival their European comrades in every thing that marks the steady, true, and daring soldier.

My obligations to Capt. Chadds and Ryves, and the officers and seamen of H.M.'s navy, are great and numerous; in Capt. Chadds, himself, I have always found that ready alacrity to share our toils and dangers, that has ever characterized the profession he belongs to, and the most cordial in assisting and co-operating with me on every occasion. I have also to notice the good conduct of the H.C.'s cruisers, the gun flotilla, and row-boats; nor ought I to omit mentioning the handsome conduct of Capt. Binny, acting agent for the Bengal transports, in volunteering both his European crew and ship for any service; on the present occasion she was anchored off Daul; and sustained some loss from the enemy's fire. I may also add, that every transport in the river was equally anxious to contribute every possible assistance to the public service.

To Lieut. Col. Miles, and Major Evans, commanding the 1st and 3d divisions, my most particular thanks are due, for the alacrity and promptitude with which my orders were carried into effect by their respective divisions; and Major Frish, of H.M.'s

Copy of Letter from the same to the same, dated Head-Quarters, Rangoon, Dec. 16, 1824.

Sir: When I had the honour to address you on the 10th inst., I did not expect I should so soon have the pleasure of communicating to you that it has again pleased God to favour us with a great victory over the army of Bundeola, re-collected after his late defeat, and considerably reinforced on his retreat; which latter circumstance induced him and his chiefs to determine upon one more great effort to retrieve their disgrace. For this purpose they succeeded in rallying and forming, with the reinforcements mentioned, a force amounting to between 20,000 and 25,000 men; and returned to the village of Corkain, about three miles from the great pagoda; and immediately commenced entrenching and stockading, with a judgment in point of position, such as would do credit to the best instructed engineers of the most civilized and warlike nations.

On the evening of the 12th, a deserter from the enemy (amongst much other information) declared it to be their intention to attack our lines on the morning of the 14th (pronounced a fortunate day by their soothsayers), determined to sacrifice themselves at the dearest rate, as they had nothing else to expect than to do so, ignominiously, by returning to the presence of their king, disgraced and defeated as they had been. This information was too circumstantially given to be disregarded, and I prepared accordingly. On the 13th, the enemy's movements left little doubt on my mind of the truth of the deserter's information.

About half past two on the morning of the 14th, a formidable fire-raft was launched from a little above Kemmudine (which, however, effected nothing); and at the same time their emissaries succeeded in setting fire to Rangoon in several places at once; by which, about one-fourth of the town has been destroyed, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the garrison, and well-disposed part of the inhabitants, to get the fire under.

The 14th passed without any other attempt on the part of the enemy; during the day, however, he was seen, above Kemmudine, to transport large bodies of troops from the Dallah to the Rangoon side of the river. For many urgent reasons I determined to attack Bundeola on the following day, rather than wait his pleasure as to time and place of meeting.

The position he had taken up (though formidable) was still more favourable than any he had yet presented me with. I also derived much advantage from a knowledge of the ground the enemy were in possession of, having been over it with a part of my force upon a former occasion.

On the morning of the 15th, my columns of attack were formed as follows: the right, consisting of 200 of H.M.'s 12th Lt. Inf., and 300 of the 18th and 34th Madras N.L., under the direction of Brig. Gen. Cotton, with one field-piece, and a detachment from the Governor-General's body-guard, under the command of Lieut. Archibald. This column I directed to make a detour round the enemy's left, and, if possible, to gain the rear of his position, and there wait the preconcerted signal of attack from me.

I marched myself with the left column, which consisted of 500 Europeans from the 30th, 41st, 80th, and Madras European regts.; and 200 natives from the 9th, 12th, 28th, and 50th regts. of Madras N.L.; five field-pieces, and a detachment of the body-guard, under the command of Lieut. Dyke, intending to attack the enemy in front. On arriving before the enemy's position, it appeared truly formidable, and such as I would have felt myself warranted in attacking with a less force than 10,000 men, had I not from experience known and appreciated the valour of the troops I had the honour to command. Of this column two divisions were formed, giving the command of one to Lieut. Col. Miles, of the 89th, and the other to Major Evans, of the 28th regiment.

My dispositions being complete, the preconcerted signal-guns were fired, and I had the pleasure to hear Brig. Gen. Cotton's reply, which assured me that all was ready on his side; the artillery now opened, and the three columns rushed on to the assault, with the most determined and enthusiastic bravery, and in less than fifteen minutes were in full possession of this most stupendous work, making the enemy suffer most severely, and obliging him to leave his camp standing, with all the baggage, and a great proportion of his arms and ammunition. On entering we were disappointed to find that Bundeola did not command in person, having retired to a distance, leaving his orders with a chief in the immediate command of the post, whom we found had been mortally wounded in the assault; whilst this was going on within, the Governor-General's body-guard made some gallant charges amongst retreating infantry and cavalry, killing horse, and destroying property all around. When it is known that 1,300 British infantry stormed and carried by assault the most formidable entrenched and stockaded works I ever saw, defeated by upwards of 20,000 men, I trust it is unnecessary for me to say more in praise of men performing such a prodigy; future ages will scarcely believe it. The prisoners declare that our appearance before their work was treated by them all (from their generals downwards) with the utmost derision and contempt, so confident were they in their immense superiority in numbers, and the fancied security of the works they had constructed.

Our gallant friends afloat were determined not to let this auspicious day pass without their share of its operations. Capt. Chads directed that intrepid and enterprising officer, Lieut. Kellett, of H.M.'s ship Arachne, to proceed in command of an expedition up the river, and avail himself of any opportunity which might offer of attacking the enemy's war-boats. He soon came up with a fleet of 32, and after some little manoeuvring to encourage the enemy to a confidence that they would, by their own superiority in rowing, keep their own distance, suddenly put the full power on the Diana steam-boat, and immediately cut through the midst of their fleet, throwing their commanders and crews into the utmost consternation; some making for the shore and others leaping overboard in the middle of the river; all abandoning their boats, and leaving Lieut. Kellett at leisure to take possession of and bring away 30 out of the 32 originally discovered, and to destroy, on his return, several fire-rafts, as well as materials and combustibles for their future construction.

Every day's experience of the zeal and cordiality with which Capt. Chads and every individual composing the naval part of the expedition co-operate with me in carrying on the combined service, increases my sincere obligations, and merits my warmest thanks.

Although I have already endeavoured to describe to the Right Hon. the Governor-General in Council the enthusiastic bravery of the corps engaged yesterday, still I cannot omit to mention the able and judicious aid I received from my second in command, Brig. Gen. Cotton. The movement by which his column was brought to the point of attack, through an intricate country, was well executed, and the attack itself afterwards was conducted with the most beneficial effects to the general success of the day. To Lieut. Col. Miles and Major Evans, who led the other columns of attack, every praise is due: the exertion of Capt. Montgomerie, commanding the artillery in the field, together with those of Capt. Cheape and Lieut. Underwood, of the engineers, were most conspicuous; Lieut. Col. Tidy, Dep. Adj. Gen., and Major Major Jackson, Depy. Quart. Mast. Gen., afforded me on this day, as well as on former occasions, their able and zealous aid.

In the list of wounded will be seen with regret the name of Major Sale, of H.M.'s 13th light infantry; an officer whose gallantry has been most conspicuous on every occasion since our arrival in Hongkong. I am happy to say his wound, though severe, is not dangerous; and I trust his valuable services will not long remain unavailable.

I have, &c.

NATIVE COURTS-MARTIAL.

MUTINEERS AT BARRACKPORE.

At several native general courts-martial, held at Barrackpore, the 4th, 5th, and 8th November 1824, for trial of the sepoys of the 26th, 47th, and 62d regts. N.I., the following are the numbers of those found guilty, and the punishments awarded:

26th Regt; 3 sentenced to death, of whom 1 was executed; the sentence of the other two was commuted to hard labour for 14 years.

17th Regt. : 33 sentenced to death, of whom 1 was executed; the sentence on the remainder being commuted to hard labour for different periods.

62d Regt. : 33 sentenced to death, of whom 4 were executed; the sentence on the remainder being commuted to hard labour for 14 years.

LAW.

Supreme Court, Oct. 28.—Ebenezer Picken and William Muirhead were indicted for shooting a native at the cantonments of the subsidiary force at Nagpore. The jury, after twice retiring, and a long deliberation, found the prisoners guilty, on the belief that what they confessed to their comrades—"we have killed a black fellow"—was fact; besides which, the defence they put forth was in itself sufficient to raise doubts of their innocence; for they asserted, that the natives of the Nagpore country were in the habit of firing random shots to frighten away wild animals.

Mr. Turtin, however, has moved for an arrest of judgment, on the ground that it is no murder here, if the life of a man was taken in the territories of a foreign prince. He has applied for time to consider the case, previously to his ultimate address to the bench on this subject.—[Beng. Hunk.]

Police Office, Aug. 12.—The following advertisement appeared in the Calcutta John Bull of Aug. 10 :

"Notice.—The undersigned will be ready to treat for the sale of three sailors, late belonging to the Sir Godfrey Webster, now adrift in the Bow-bazar: terms, ready money.

"JOHN RENNOLDSON."

"Bow Bazar, Aug. 10, 1824."

The magistrates having required the immediate attendance of Captain Rennoldson, to explain this extraordinary advertisement, the latter appeared, and stated that his object was to get rid of such ungrateful men, whom he had, in a manner, nursed and supported for a series of years, and who ultimately repaid him for his kindness by strolling about the streets in a disgraceful condition. He expressed contrition, if any colour or complexion of offence could be put upon the "notice," and would feel no hesitation in making an apology in such case.

The magistrate remarked on the impropriety of sending such advertisements to a public newspaper, and stated, that if Captain Rennoldson applied to him in the event of his sailors deserting him, he would afford him every redress possible; but the mode of conduct which he had pursued was totally unjustifiable, and would, without doubt, subject him to a severe fine, if noticed by the Government.

The only alternative left, he thought, was for C.apt. R. to make a public apology.

[The report of this case has been the occasion of a dispute between the editors of two Calcutta papers.]

DIOCESAN SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

On Monday last, a quarterly general meeting of the Committee of the Diocesan Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge took place at the house of the Rev. Secretary, in Fort William. The routine business of the day having been concluded, the following gentlemen were elected subscribing members, viz. J. W. Templer, Esq.; R. Howard, Esq.; and the Rev. — Proby. We are happy to say, that no meeting takes place without similar accessions of members to this truly venerable and inestimable society. We are satisfied, that the more it becomes known in India, the more rapidly will it be extended, and consequently the more extended will its useful and benevolent exertions become. Acting in strict conformity with the principles of the church of England, and the origin of all those numerous similar societies which have since sprung up in the Christian world, this Society has particular claims on every true and conscientious member of the church; and it is perhaps to be regretted, that while other societies are constantly and actively engaged in seeking support, by every possible exertion in bringing forward their claims on public notice, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge is restrained by principles of conscious dignity from pursuing similar measures to render itself more generally known.—[*Cal. LATE BENGAL MILITARY WIDOWS' FUND.

At a special general meeting of the members and subscribers of the late Bengal Military Widows' Fund, held at the house of Lieut. Col. H. Faithfull, in Park-street, Chowringhee, 8th Nov., it was resolved, that the pensions of widows who came on the Bengal Military Widows' Fund subsequent to the 1st of January 1809, be increased from the 1st inst., to the scale originally fixed for them by the regulations of that year, viz.

FURLONGHS TO NEW SOUTH WALES.

The Court of Directors have sanctioned the grant of furloughs to New South Wales, to officers who may desire to proceed ceed thither in preference to making a voyage to Europe. Any individual availing himself of this indulgence, and failing to return to Bengal within the period of three years (computed from the date of the pilot's quitting the vessel on which he may proceed) is to be considered as having relinquished the service. Our friends will of course perceive that it will be necessary for officers accepting this alternative to request that the presidency paymaster may be authorized to pay their forough allowances to their agents in Calcutta. This intelligence must, we think, needs please all who now, for the first time, receive it, and who are concerned in the new and liberal arrangement which it makes known.—[Beng. Weekly Messenger.

SUFFERERS.

The Calcutta papers contain accounts of several of these sufferers. In August a dreadful instance occurred at Cuttack. The widow of a Brahmin, aged about 24, burned herself in spite of argument and intreaty, as well as the offer of a pension of four rupees a month for life. Another took place at Pooree, on the 2d July. The victim was also a Brahmin's widow, about the same age; and her son, aged 16, set fire to the pile. Arguments and offers of money were in this case equally unsuccessful. A third instance was one of Unnairtia, where the widow does not burn with the body of her deceased husband, but with the wooden shoes and stick belonging to him. The husband had been attached to the court of Jeypore. The public officers endeavoured to prevent the act, but the deluded woman petitioned the court, and was at length suffered to burn. She was about 17. A fourth instance occurred in October, at Santipore, where a Brahmin's three wives, one of the age of 27, another 21, and the third 15, were suffered to burn before the permission of the magistrate arrived. A fifth took place near Chittapore. the widow was 69. A sixth occurred at Serampore, on the 28th October: the widow was 70, and possessed property. Her son appeared in high spirits at the pile!

LUST'S NATURE.

The Samachar Chundrika, a native paper, states, that a woman, aged 25, of the Poda

* Those annuities are exclusive of the contingent claims of widows to the benefit of Lord Clive's Fund. The annuities inserted in the draft of regulations formerly circulated, were transcribed from the regulations of the Madras and Bombay Funds; but it had not been adverted to that, in every rank, the amount of Lord Clive's Pension was, in every instance, deducted from the annuities payable by those funds.

Pole caste, residing at Pootkhalce, near Bujbuj, was delivered, after seven months' pregnancy, of a son, a daughter, and an object resembling an animal of an extraordinary shape. All three are alive.

RUTH JATRA—CAR OF JUGGURNATH'S.

The car is kept at Chandernagore, which belongs to the French. A rare circumstance has occurred this year in reference to the Ruth. This huge car, which is not much smaller than the one at Aknamukies, near Serampore, used to be dragged along the main road leading to Taldanga, where it used to stand for the space of one week, and was then brought back to its stand near Ialldighee. This road had lately undergone a thorough repair; and the French authorities sent word to the proprietors of the Ruth, that as the wheels of the car would tear up the road, they could not suffer it to be dragged over it, unless they consented to pay 500 rupees for its repair. The owners of the Ruth offered a sum considerably less than what was demanded; in consequence of which the Ruth was not allowed to be drawn, in spite of the earnest intreaties of the Hindoos. To some this circumstance may appear of a trivial nature; but, let it be remembered, that the conduct of the French has not caused the people to revolt. One of their most ancient customs has been forcibly laid aside by the peremptory orders of the rulers of Chandernagore, without creating any spirit of rebellion among the Hindoos. A tax has been laid upon Juggurnath; and as he could not pay the mulet, and his votaries had not respect sufficient to pass it for him, there he remains, a monument of his impotency and subserviency to the orders of an earthly being! O that the rulers would exercise their authority in abolishing the burning of widows! And that they might do it without causing any stir among the people, the prohibition of the removal of Juggurnath's car fully testifies. A circumstance like the above has, perhaps, never been known before.

THE MARINE.

We have been favoured with the perusal of a private letter from an excellent authority in England, relating to the new maritime arrangements contemplated, or indeed fixed upon, for India; and the following are a few of the most interesting particulars:—The marine to be made the Royal, and to be called the "India Main Body, or the India Navy," and ships of the same size to be added to it immediately. All the captains are to be paid; the first of three years' standing to have 740 guineas per annum; under three years, 690 guineas; commanders 450 rupees, and all lieutenants 110 rupees each; but those who act as first-lieutenants of ships, to have 130, 140, and 150 rupees, according to the size of the ship to which they may be attached. Pursers are also to be appointed, and to have 110 rupees per month; but the victualling account is to be placed in an Off-Reckoning Fund, and the slops alone to be the perquisite of the pursers. The above are a part of the arrangements now in contemplation, and which will, we have reason to think, be eventually carried into effect. In the letter we have seen, the pilot-service is not alluded to.—[Bengal Hurk.

DEATH OF THE PESHWA AT BENARES.

It is with extreme regret we announce the death of his Highness Maharajah-Mritu-Row-Peshwa, who, after delivering his dominions to the Company, retired to Benares, where he resided for several years past. The melancholy event took place on the 6th of September, at Benares, after a short illness. His Highness was 65 years old: minute-guns, corresponding to his age, were fired on the occasion. His Highness was a most charitable man, and maintained numerous mendicants, pilgrims, and learned brahmins.—[Native Paper.

BURMESE BARBARITY.

The following interesting communication gives a remarkable instance of the savage violence of the Burmese character.

"One of the cutters belonging to the Madras Government, happened to arrive at Rangoon the day before the expedition, and was detained on suspicion by the Burmese guard-boats. The serang and a lascar were taken on shore. When the fleet hove in sight the serang was put in confinement, and kept bound hand and foot for six days. He was then carried into the interior by a Burmese officer of rank, who, after a long examination, ordered him back to the Chokey islands from whence he had been brought. Ten days afterwards he was sent for by the Raywoon of Rangoon, whose encampment was distant five days' journey. The Raywoon examined him strictly respecting the number of the English ships, troops, &c. often threatening him with a drawn sword held across his neck. The serang was again sent back to the same Chokey. In three days he was, though ill of a fever, and with swelled limbs, put on board a boat, to which he was bound by a rope, and taken up a creek to an officer of apparently much higher rank than the former one. The encampment was extensive, formed of bamboo huts; and many sirdars were present. He was nine days in the boat working up with the tides, as long as they lasted, and then pulling against the stream. Having left the boat, the party was three days travelling through jungle in a northerly northerly direction, before they reached the encampment of the general, who asked the serang the same questions as the others had done. He was then sent to another general in a westerly direction, five days' journey. After a repetition of the same questions, the serang was ordered back to the Chokey, from whence he had been originally taken. In a short time, however, an order came from the second general to whom he had been conveyed, addressed to the sirdar of the Chokey, who had first seized and carried him into the interior, to bring the prisoner again before him. On the serang's arrival the general summoned the inferior sirdar, under whose charge the prisoner had been brought, and with great indignation asked him by what authority he had dared to march him about the country, thus enabling him to communicate every thing he had seen to the English; saying this, he instantly ordered the sirdar to be crucified, which was done by stretching his arms and legs asunder, on an erect bamboo frame. The executioner bared the man's stomach, and, with a long sharp knife, cut open the fore part of his belly; then seizing the entrails with both hands, he tore them out, and cast them on either side of him. The victim uttered not a cry. This tremendous scene took place in presence of the serang, who was, three days afterwards, sent back to the Chokey where he was first confined. Those who accompanied him took charge of the gilt sword, and the clothes belonging to the murdered sirdar, to deliver them to his wife. In about a fortnight afterwards, an opportunity offered, on a dark rainy night; and the serang succeeded in effecting his escape into a jungle, and subsequently with great hazard to the British lines.

It appears, that, on the capture of Rangoon, the inhabitants of the town and adjacent villages were driven into the interior by the officers of government, like flocks of sheep. In the first instance they took shelter in the vicinity of the great pagoda, but they were soon driven off the Burmese armies have no medical establishment whatever. If a man is wounded he has to shift for himself, as it is the business of no one to afford him assistance. Those who cannot move off are left to die in the jungles.—[Cal. Gov. Gaz.]

THE WEATHER.

Extract of a letter from Dinapore, Oct. 26.—There was a very heavy fall of rain, about a week since, in the neighbourhood of Benares, Ghazepore, Buxar, and Arrah; it has been of great service to the rice crops, which are remarkably fine, and also to the lands that are prepared for sowing grain.

VOL. XIX. Asiatic Journal. No. 113.

MAHOMMEDAN MIRACLE.

An extraordinary circumstance was represented to the King of Delhi. In consequence of the want of rain, the inhabitants of the city were in such consternation, that they waited upon a dervise, lately arrived at Lal Purda, and requested him to offer up prayers to Providence. The dervise replied, "that their purpose would soon be effected if Shoja, at Sha, his former priest, transmigrated in the shape of a prince, was pleased to pray on the occasion." The people immediately went to Shoja, at Sha, and prevailed on him to pray for them, which was done according to the forms of the Mahommedans. Immediately on this, to the wonder of all, it began to rain. The dervise then disappeared.—[Shams ul Ukhbar, Oct. 1.]

EUROPEAN SEAMEN.

A meeting of the commanders of vessels in this port took place yesterday at the Exchange, when it was agreed upon to present a Memorial to the Governor-General-in-Council, respecting the means now adopted by the Bankshall for procuring European seamen, to the inconvenience and distress which many ships have in consequence been put to by the loss of their crews; and praying thereupon that relief may be afforded, by remunerating the commanders for the extra expense incurred in procuring a British crew; or, if obliged to take lascars, an order for them to be received by the East-India Company on their arrival in London. It was also resolved upon to send a copy of the Memorial, when ready, to the Committee at Lloyd's, and also to the Committee of Ship-Owners, pointing out to them the inutility of the Act of Parliament lately passed to prevent desertion, and begging their best exertions to procure an Act more effectual in its operation.

We do not question the propriety of petitioning in this case; quite the reverse. But after perusing the Act referred to—4th Geo. IV., Chap. XXV., 12th May 1823—we are compelled to state, as our opinion, that the Petition cannot be based upon it. The act is applicable only to ships loading to the West-Indies.—[Dungul Hurk, October 9.]

EXCHANGE PRICE CURRENT.

BIBLE SOCIETY OF BENGAL.

From the thirteenth report of the Calcutta Auxiliary Bible Society, we give the following extracts:

In regard to the direct labours of the Committee, in the important work of preparing and publishing translations of the sacred Scriptures, they have little to add to what has been said in the last report. Not one new work has actually issued from the press during the last year. The works formerly announced have been unusually slow in their progress through the press, from a variety of causes; but still they have considerably advanced.

The Hindostanee New Testament, in the revision of which the Committee have received the able assistance of the Rev. Principal Mill, as before mentioned, has advanced in the press to the end of the Acts. Mr. Bowley's important Hinduee Testament (altered from Martyn's) has been completed. Several thousand single Gospels of this work have been already forwarded to the upper Societies, and your Committee continue to receive assurances of their acceptableness and utility.

In the course of the year a new edition of the book of Genesis in Hindostanee, has been ordered, with a view to the more liberal distribution of that acceptable work: it will be published separately in octavo. The impression consists of 4,000 copies; and some considerable progress has been made in the work.

It has been resolved, also, instead of reprinting the whole New Testament in Bengalee, as before mentioned, to proceed only to the Epistles, and then strike off a large new impression of the Gospels and Acts in that language. The demand for these separate Gospels is large, on account of the great increase of Native Bengalee schools; and it was judged most advisable to keep up a good stock of these books, in order to meet the demand, than to proceed with the Epistles, which, for the present, are comparatively less wanted.

Considering the importance of the book of Psalms, as the best manual of devotion which can be presented to the natives, and an invaluable portion of those Scriptures which testify of Christ, your Committee have thought it expedient to prepare that book for publication in a separate form. A revised manuscript copy having been presented to them, at their last meeting ready for the press, an order was given that 4,000 copies should be printed in octavo, the execution of which will of necessity fall in the ensuing year.

Among the additional supporters which the present year has furnished to the cause of the Bible Society in India, your Committee are happy to mention the name of Dr. Reginald Heber, the Bishop of Calcutta, who in Europe had been, from its earliest commencement, the friend and advocate of the Parent Institution, and who has now permitted your Committee to insert his name in the list of Vice-Presidents. That his Lordship does not occupy a yet more conspicuous place in our deliberations, is in consequence of his own wish, expressed to the members of your Committee, arising from those considerations which make it generally desirable that, in societies of this sort, a layman should preside. His Lordship's name accordingly, now appears amongst the Patrons of the Society. This accession to the cause is in every respect most valuable. With the aid of his Lordship's counsels and influence, the objects of the Society must be essentially promoted. Its character also will be better appreciated, and will commend itself more and more to the community. Your Committee fervently hope and pray, that the proceedings of this Society may always be of such a character as shall render the connection thus happily formed, honourable to all parties, and eminently conducive to the advancement of God's glory, by the diffusion of his holy word throughout the world. May this truly christian labour prosper abundantly; until the "name of God shall be known upon earth, and his saving health unto all nations!"—[Benzal Hark.]

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

BRIEF NAME.

Fort St. George, S.p. 3, 1824.—In obedience to the instructions from the hon. the Court of Directors, the hon. the Governor in Council notifies in general orders, that the rank of Brevet Captain will not in future be granted to any officer until he shall have completed a period of fifteen years service, reckoned from the date of his first commission as second Lieutenant, Cornet, or Ensign.

SERVICE OF INVALIDS.

Fort St. George, Oct. 12, 1824.—The Governor in Council is pleased to publish the following notification:

2. Officers who have been removed to the Invalids on account of age, wounds, or infirmities, rendering them unequal to the active duties of the line, will generally be stationed at invalid garrisons or posts, occupied chiefly, or wholly, by invalided soldiers, and where their duties will interfere either not at all, or but little, with those of officers of the effective part of the army; but, should they chance to be at a station for effective regular troops, it is not required or desirable, that they should be put upon a rota for general duty, or interfere with the command of such troops; and their duties should be confined to their own corps, which is entitled to indulgences by the public regulations of all services: but an officer of the Invalids, or of the effective part of the Army, may at any time be specially appointed to the general superintendence of troops of either or of both branches, at a garrison station, should the Commander in Chief, or the Governor in Council think fit so to direct.

SIR ALFRED CAMPBELL.

We have to announce the death of this officer (Commander-in-chief at this Presidency) on the 14th December. The cause of his death was apoplexy; he had a fit a short time previous, from the effects of which, it was hoped, he was gradually recovering.

THE WEATHER.

Since our report in the Gazette of Thursday last, a fall of rain has taken place, which has brought the whole supply from the beginning of October to about 20½ inches, being a fair average for the time; and an abundant supply, where circumstances permit of its being properly secured and distributed—being equal also to the whole monsoon fall of some former years.

—[Mad. Gov. Gaz. Nov. 15.]

The weather has been mild and pleasant for the season, and showers have fallen since our last report, which have brought the supply to nearly 25 inches: the salubrity of the atmosphere, and other circumstances, indicate an additional supply.—[Ibid. Dec. 2.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

BOMBAY AUXILIARY BIBLE SOCIETY.

On Saturday last was held the annual general meeting of the Bombay Auxiliary Bible Society, when a statement of the proceedings of the Society was read; from which it appeared, that the first edition of the New Testament, translated and printed by by the Missionaries at Surat, in Goujuratee, has been nearly all distributed. The Society hope that the Missionaries will be able to commence a second edition early in the next year. The Old Testament in Goujuratee has been translated and printed at Surat, and some copies dispersed among the people who speak that language. The expense of printing the different books of the Old Testament, in such proportion as to be equivalent to an edition of 500 copies, is something less than Rs. 6000.

The Society has advanced the sum of Rupees 4000, towards an edition of Genesis, and the Gospel of St. Luke, and the books of the New Testament, from the Acts of the Apostles to the Book of Revelations, in the Mahratta language. This is now in the press of the American Mission, and will be printed on paper forwarded from the parent society in England.

During the last year, a supply of Scriptures in the Mahratta language, has been forwarded to the Missionaries of the Scotch Missionary Society, who use them in their schools, and have been enabled to distribute many copies among the natives of the district; it is understood to be the uniform practice of the Missionaries to give the Scriptures only to those who can read, and express a desire to possess them.

A letter was read from the Rev Jos. Woolf, dated at Bussorah, expressing a desire to be supplied with a large stock of the Scriptures, in the Arabic, Persian, Hebrew, &c. &c. languages, for the purpose of distributing them among Christians and others in Persia, and especially among the Jews who reside in that kingdom. The Rev Jos. Woolf is more immediately engaged as a Missionary to the Jews; he has travelled from Aleppo to Bussorah in the prosecution of this important object, and has generally met with a friendly reception among the Jews of Persia and Syria. They have expressed a desire to possess the Scriptures in the Hebrew language, and have received many copies of the New Testament.

The number of Bibles, or portion of the Old Testament, issued from the Bombay Bible Society during the year, is four hundred and eighty-six, and the number of the New Testament, or portions of the New Testament, is one thousand six hundred and sixty-nine.

The Society possesses copies of the Scriptures in most of the languages in which they have been printed, copies of which may be procured on application to the Secretaries or to the Depository at St. Thomas's Church. — [Hom. Cour. Oct. 2.]

SCHOOLS AT BUSSORAH.

The London British and Foreign School Society, having requested the Rev. Joseph

Woolf, now employed in a Christian Mission to the East, to endeavour to establish schools for teaching the English language in all places where it may be practicable, on the improved system of Bell and Lancaster, he has succeeded in forming the first establishment at Aleppo. Mr. Woolf having some months since arrived in Bussorah, and having proposed a similar plan to the few gentlemen of our establishment residing there, has carried these views into effect with every prospect of success, and with their ready and liberal assistance has formed an institution, of which the following are some of the particulars.

A school is in the first instance formed for teaching the English language, reading and arithmetic, to be supported by general contributions, and the plan to be extended as future events may enable the Society to effect. A school room is at present provided through the kindness of Captain Robert Taylor, political agent at Bussorah. The general superintendence of the institution is placed under the gentlemen residing there. In the present infant state a competent Armenian is appointed to teach the English language. The school to be open to children of all persuasions, and the Bible to be read only by such as do not object to its use.

Subscriptions will be received from individuals of all persuasions, and as many poor will be taught gratis as the progressive success of the institution may permit, while those of competent circumstances will be required to pay a proportionate monthly sum, to be determined by the directors.

There are now in all, thirty-four children taught, only four of which are taught gratis. They consist of children of both sexes, and are by birth Armenian, Arab, Persian, or Turk. — [Hom. Cour. Oct. 16.]

SIR RALPH RICE.

The Hon. Sir Ralph Rice, Senior Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court, arrived overland from Madras, and took his seat on the Bench on Wednesday. — [Hom. Cour. Oct. 30.]

COTTON CROP.

It has been apprehended that our cotton produce to the northward, must have suffered severely from the drought; but notwithstanding the scarcity of rain, we learn that the crops of this year are very rich, and, by last accounts, only required a few showers of rain to bring them to perfection, in which case they are expected to yield 25 per cent. above last year's produce. But should no rain fall, our informant (a respectable native, whose testimony may be relied on) confidently assumes that sufficient cotton will be produced to supply the wants of the market on this side of India, though at a rate of 25 per cent. less than that of last year. From the same source we learn, that Bownaghur, Dholera, Broach, Junbossee, Porebunder, Mandavee, and Kattywar, have not less than 70,000 bales in the markets of last year's crop, 50,000 of which have been purchased by the merchants of Bombay and on account of the honourable Company, and which may be expected to arrive at the Presidency in all next month.—[Bom. Gaz. Oct. 13.]

THE WEATHER.

During the last week, we are happy to state that Bombay has shared moderately in the providential supply of rain that has fallen in the interior. The register of the pluviometer, for the few days of this month, exhibits an addition of 139-100th inches to the previous quantity; thereby making the total fall of rain at Bombay, during the season, 3,335-100th inches.—[Bom. Com. Oct. 9.]

Official reports from Broach and Kairah announce the gratifying intelligence that there was a heavy fall of rain at both these stations, on the 7th and 8th instant, and private letters give an equally pleasing account from Surat and Kattywar. At Kairah, it is stated that the price of Bajjee, the chief food of the lower orders, fell on the 7th to one-half the price at which it was sold a fortnight before; and we may now indulge the hope that nothing like a serious scarcity of food will be felt in any of the districts, during the ensuing dry season.—[Ibid. Oct. 16.]

CAPTURE OF KITTOOR.

The Fort of Kittoor was invested on the 36th Nov. by the force under Colonel Walker of the Madras army. Terms were offered, and an armistice of twenty-four hours, which expired without any arrangements being made on the part of the enemy. The place was accordingly attacked, and the following letter in the Bombay Gazette of Dec. 15, gives the result.

"The Fort of Kittoor has been taken, with the loss of only six Europeans killed and a few wounded, but that of the enemy is much more considerable; exceeding, I am told, a thousand men. Messrs. Stevenson and Elliott were not given up until our guns had opened upon the fort for some considerable time, but, it is said, they were very kindly treated, and sent into camp with presents. The booty captured is said to amount to sixteen lacs of rupees in cash, four lacs in jewels, besides many horses, one thousand camels, and several elephants. Another report states, that four lacs of rupees, in addition to the above, have been discovered in the fort. The force will be here in three or four days, when I shall endeavour to send you more correct details. A subaltern's share is expected to be about five thousand rupees, and we hope that the property will be early distributed."

We are afraid that the expectation of our gallant friends, of an early distribution of the property captured, are not likely to be realized, as, we believe, no property taken can be considered prize, unless declared to be such by the Authorities in England, whose orders on the subject must be awaited.

CEYLON.

REGULATION RESPECTING BANKRUPTS.

A regulation, bearing date the 30th Aug. 1824, has been promulgated by the government of Ceylon, for defining the proceedings under a cessio bonorum; by which a debtor.

debtor, not owing money to the crown, or incurring his debts by fraud or misconduct, may, by petition to the government, have his case investigated by the Supreme Court, if the petitioner be a European, or by a Provincial Court if he be a native, with the view of being protected from arrest and imprisonment.

REVOLT.

A revolt in the interior at Ceylon, occasioned by the absence of the usual number of troops, on account of sickness, has been quelled without difficulty. Reinforcements were despatched with the utmost expedition; and in addition to putting a stop to the rebellion—the individual who stiles himself King of Candy—and who has for the last three or four years eluded the vigilance of our troops—has been taken. Every thing was restored to the usual state of quiet.

. The deaths of Lieut. Hough and Mr. Wallbeoff, copied by us from the Madras Gov. Gazette of 30th September, have been contradicted in the same paper of Nov. 8th.

PENANG.

THE NEW GOVERNOR.

The Hon. Robert Fullerton took the oaths as Governor, and his seat as President in Council, 28th August.

ADDRESS TO THE LATE GOVERNOR.

From among the native addresses to the Hon. W. E. Phillips, the late Governor of this Island, on his departure, we select the following from the King of Quedah, and the reply.

Translation of an Address from the King of Quedah, on behalf of himself and his Dependants, to the Hon. W. E. Phillips.

This friendly and respectful letter, emanating from a pure heart and sincere attachment, which can never be broken while the heavenly bodies continue to revolve, is from the King of Quedah, and may the Lord of the universe cause it to reach the hands of my respected friend, the Hon. Wm. Edward Phillips, who is wise and prudent, whose fame is extolled every where, and who is skilled in securing the affections of all people far and near. With respect to the intention of my friend now to return to Europe, I cannot refrain from expressing the regret which I in common with all my relatives feel, for we have long been acquainted, and a lasting friendship has been produced, particularly since by the treachery of the Siamese, I was forced to fly to Pulo Penang. I have received, during my residence here, every assistance and protection, and my friend has used his endeavours to effect my return to Quedah to be reinstated in my former authority; but as he is now determined to proceed to Europe, we can only offer up our prayers to the Almighty for the welfare of my friend, his wife and children, that he and they may all reach Europe in safety. The kindness which my friend has at all times shewn me, can never be forgotten so long as life remains. Written on Saturday the 28th day of the month Dul-ha-jah, in the year 1239.

Signed and sealed by the King of Quedah, for himself and dependants.

(A true Translation.)

J. ANDERSON,

Malay Translator to Govt.

P. W. Island, 25th Aug. 1824.

Answer to the Above.

The Hon. W. E. Phillips, Esq. late Governor of Penang to the King of Quedah.

Mr. Phillips returns his thanks to the King of Quedah for his very friendly letter, which has been rendered into English by the Malay Translator to Government, and begs to assure the King that his feelings are highly gratified at knowing, that the endeavours he has used to render his friend as comfortable as possible, since Providence first brought him to these shores, have not been unsuccessful.

Mr. Phillips begs his friend to remember that the fate of kings and princes as well as that of the poorest individuals, is in the hands of a God whose dispensations are just, and that it is the duty of all to bear the afflictions with which he visits them, with proper fortitude and resignation.

Mr. Phillips offers his friend, and those who have joined in expressing their kind feelings in the very friendly letter he has received, his best wishes for their comfort and happiness, which he is convinced the conduct of his friend the King, and his dependants, will go far to insure.

APPOINTMENT.

Lieut. Charles Deane, H.M.'s 67th regt., to be military secretary and aid-de-camp to the Hon. the Governor.

SINGAPORE.

METALS IN BORNEO.

It was reported some time ago, that ore of antimony had been discovered on the island of Borneo. Two tons of it have been imported into Singapore by some native boats, and sold at the rate of 3½ dollars per pecul. Sulphuret of antimony is said to be found in abundance in two different districts. Gold is also found in the same districts.

SLAVE TRADE.

The commanders of the prahus, which have arrived from Bali within the last few days, report, that about two months ago, a couple of French brigs, from the island of Bourbon, had visited the ports of Badong and Baliling, in the island of Bali, for the purpose of purchasing slaves, and had bought a considerable number of young boys and girls at the rate of from 30 to 40 dollars a-piece. The island of Bali is a notorious native slave mart, with a crowded population; and we have no doubt a very lucrative traffic may be driven with it. We are in hopes, however, that the marauders who have thus commenced it may be encountered by some of the French, Netherland, or British cruisers, and that what has now become the law of nations will be strictly enforced against them.

CESSION OF THE ISLAND.

We have been very kindly favoured with letters from Singapore. We were not before aware that there were any serious claims maintained by the neighbouring chiefs to the possession of Singapore, but it is clear there were: and though doubtless all such claims could have been easily repelled by us by force, we still think it is much better to see them adjusted by treaty, especially where we are so much the most powerful party. We have recently struck a grand political stroke here; no less a thing than the arrangement of a treaty with the Sultan and Tomongong, ceding the island of Singapore, and ten miles around its shores, in full sovereignty and property to the British East-India Company. The Tomongong not being so needy a man as his principal, was the first to come into the Resident's views, and got a few thousand dollars added to what he was to have received. The Sultan being more refractory, wanted to go away from the settlement rather than sign this deed.

TRADE OF SINGAPORE IN THE YEAR 1823.

We have been long anxious to lay before our commercial readers some document that might afford a distinct view of the actual trade of this port; and have at last succeeded in framing a statement of as much authenticity as the circumstances of the settlement can be supposed to admit.

In a port of mere depot, such as Singapore, the amount of exports alone affords the only just criterion of the extent of the commercial operations conducted; and we have selected these, therefore, for our present purpose. As large stocks have not yet been accumulated in this infant settlement, as it produces as yet little or nothing of its own, and as the consumption of its population is comparatively inconsiderable, the imports and exports would prove little more than a mere repetition of each other. In framing the statement which is now produced, no articles are included except such as have been bona fide landed, or actually transhipped in the roads, under the agency of some of the mercantile houses of the place; and the convenience which the port affords as a place of security and refreshment, and the advantages thus conferred upon the general interests of Indian commerce by its occupation, are not considered.

By the statement now furnished, the aggregate exports of Singapore, from January to December 1823, appear to be five millions five hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and sixty Spanish dollars.

The trade of Singapore consists of five distinct branches, viz. that with Great Britain; that with Bengal, and other parts of western India; that with China, native and European; that with Siam and Cochin China; that with the distant commercial tribes of the Archipelago itself; and that with our immediate neighbourhood. Upon each of these a few cursory remarks may be useful.

In 1822 there cleared out for London four ships only; in 1823, nine. In this year the exports amounted to 7,013,382 Spanish dollars, according to the manifests sworn to before the local authority. In 1822 the value of British piece-goods imported was 265,054 Spanish dollars; in 1822 the imports were 1,064,380 Spanish dollars, and the exportations in proportion.

The quantity of Bengal opium exported from Singapore in the year 1822 amounted to 339 chests; in 1823 it amounted to 462 chests. In 1822 the quantity of India piece-goods exported from Singapore was reckoned at 7,000 corges, and the value 365,323 Spanish dollars. In 1823 the quantity and value had considerably decreased, owing to the extraordinary increase of the trade in British cotton goods; and this enhancement of the one, and depreciation of the other, is likely to be progressive. The exportation of gold and silver bullion to Bengal in 1822 amounted to 424,025 Spanish dollars; in 1823 it amounted to 559,861 Spanish dollars.

The native trade with China in 1822 consisted of five junks; in 1823, of eight junks, importing, and seven exporting. The value of the commodities exported in this latter year, according to the detailed statements furnished to us by the most respectable of the Chinese merchants of the place, was 928,700 Spanish dollars; opium, with European piece-goods and woollens, constituting 290,000 dollars' worth of this sum.

Singapore is likely to become a place of deposit for Chinese goods intended for the European European market to a large extent. A comparison of the exports in this department in 1822 and 1823 exhibits a striking increase. In the former year there were exported, raw-silk, 413 chests; nankeens, none; camphor, none: in the latter, raw-silk, 609 chests; nankeens, 2,257 boxes; camphor, 1,250 piculs.

A similar increase has taken place in the intercourse with Siam and Cochin China. In 1822, the number of junks importing from and exporting to those countries amounted to 42, in 1823 it was 61. In this latter year the value of the imports has been estimated at 300,000 dollars. The sugar in 1822 amounted to 14,500 piculs, the sticklac to 288; and there was no sapan wood. In 1823 the sugar was 23,000 piculs, the sticklac 2,431, and the sapan wood 7,315 piculs. The exports in opium were reckoned at 120 chests for Siam and 49 for Cochin China; and the value of exports for both, in cottons and woollens, at about 90,000 dollars.

The trade of the distant tribes of the Archipelago consists principally of that of the Bugis. Last year there was scarcely less than 90 prahus belonging to these people at once in the harbour. They imported in 1822, cotton goods, of the manufacture of Celebes or Bali, to the extent of about 1,000 corges, and in 1823 about three times that quantity. This description of goods withstands the competition of British manufactures infinitely better than the piece-goods of continental India. This branch of trade brings us the valuable article of tortoise shell, which had increased last year to the amount of 16,533 pounds from 2,866, which it was in 1822.

The native trade of our immediate neighbourhood has kept pace with the other branches of our commerce. The pepper of 1822 amounted to 17,431 piculs, and the tin to 13,526. In 1823 the first reached the extent of 35,500, and the second 18,515 piculs.—[Sing. Chron., Sept. 16.

SUMATRA.

Insurrection.—By accounts from Palembang, we are informed that an insurrection has broken out in the interior of that country, and that the people of Rawas and Bingi had taken up arms, headed by Seved Haniza, the adopted son of the Tumongong of the first-named place, who had been killed in the last action with the Dutch troops. The insurgents have been joined by some of the people of Menacabao. The Dutch were preparing an expedition to suppress the insurrection, and for this purpose had brought cannon and ammunition from Banca.—[Sing. Chron., Sept. 16.

PANATICS.

The fanatics, commonly called the Pandrees, and usually by the Malays, Rencheh, beaten by the Dutch troops on the south-west coast of Sumatra, have begun to extend their conquests and depredations to the north coast, and have actually invaded the principality of Siac, opposite to Malacca. In their incursions, these insensate and useless enthusiasts have committed the greatest excesses, putting the inoffensive peasantry of the country to death, plundering their property, and laying waste their fields, for no better reason than we have been able to learn, than because they refuse to wear a white dress, and to forego the use of bettle and tobacco. Numbers of the Siac people have been compelled to take to their boats on their rivers; we are further informed, that several overtures have been made to the local authority at this place, by the chiefs of the interior of that country, for permission to settle and colonize permanently at Singapore, which we have little doubt will be gladly granted them.—[Ibid., Aug. 19.

CELEBES.

Four Bugis prahus have arrived from Macassar in fifteen days. When they left, the Dutch Governor-General was still at Macassar. An expedition had proceeded to Supah, consisting of four square-rigged vessels, and conveying about 800 troops. Several petty actions have been fought with the people of Supah, in which the Dutch troops are said to have sustained heavy losses. Upon two different occasions they are described as having forced the defences of the little town of Supah, and on both to have been driven out with great slaughter, at the point of the kris, by the resolute inhabitants. It is considered that, after the conquest of Supah, should the European authority succeed in this enterprize, the war will be carried into Boni, Luhu, and Waju.

The conquest of Ternete has been already effected by the Dutch, and the sovereign has fled to his relation, the Queen of Boni. Five or six Bugis prahus have also arrived from Badong in Bali, and Cuti and Passir in Borneo, and from various parts of Java. These vessels have brought considerable quantities of tortoise-shell, cloth, and rice; from reports there has been an abundant harvest of rice this year in Java, Bali, or Celebes, which promises a cheap and abundant supply for this settlement.—[Sing. Chron., Sept. 16.

More recent accounts state, that a general rising of the Bugis tribes against the Dutch had taken place, which comprehended nine-tenths of the civilized portion of Celebes. The places taken by the Dutch are said, by the native accounts, to have been recaptured, and that the Bugis had got possession of Bonthain, Bolicomba, and other places, extending their incursions to the suburbs of Macassar, where the Dutch had fortified themselves.

EARTHQUAKE AT CANTON.

An account from Canton mentions that on the 14th of August last a shock of an earthquake was experienced there, which lasted for several seconds, but no damage had been done by it. Great distress had been felt in the country about Canton, on account of a death which extended over greater part of the province; but, at the time the account left, the inhabitants were recovering from its effect.—[*Hon. DESTRUCTION OF SHIRAZ.

A letter from an Armenian clergyman at Shiraz to a friend at Calcutta, gives a distressing detail of this event. He says: The present condition of this once beautiful city is very lamentable. The evaporations from the putrid bodies, have caused infection in the air; gangs of robbers inhumanly pillage the deserted houses, and commit unheard-of ravages; no hinderance can be put to their depredations: but they dare not approach the neighbourhood of the Armenians, for our countrymen are well armed, and guard their dwellings; and at night, they discharge their fire-arms to ensure safety. While we were in the fields, the robbers entered the house of the good old Mr. Johannes, and robbed him of all his property. The roof of our church is rent, and the walls are considerably damaged. We intend to break it down, and build a new one by subscription. The magnificent bazar of Kerim Khan is still standing; but very much shaken, and partly damaged. Report states, that Kazerooni, Konartaghta, Ferozabad, and the surrounding villages, have suffered the same calamity. The number of persons destroyed, only in Shiraz, is reckoned to be about 2,000. The Shahzadah of Shiraz intends to send his son, Reza Cooli Mizra and the Peshnemas, Haddgee Mirza Haddi, to the court of Teheran, to request Futtehe Alli Shah to relinquish the tribute paid by the inhabitants of this place, for some years to come, that the city may be thereby restored to its former condition; but, I fear, it will be a difficult matter to obtain his assent: if the imports of five years be given up by the EXPEDITION AGAINST THE PIRATES.

The Manila packet arrived on the 25th from Manilla by the eastern passage, and through the Straits of Macassar. In making this passage, she passed through the group of the Philippine islands, in the track of the Galloons, and touched at the island of Ticao. Here she met the small Spanish squadron, which we described some months ago as having proceeded with a considerable land force for the purpose of chastising the pirates of Sooloo. The squadron had been successful in scouring and laying waste the coasts of Sooloo and Basilan, with portions of that of Mindanao. They were returning loaded with booty, chiefly consisting of the small brass cannon taken at the different stockades and batteries which they captured on the enemy's coast.

The sugar and indigo of the Philippines have both considerably increased during the course of the last year, but the coffee has fallen off to a mere pittance of 300 or 400 piculs. The annual produce of indigo is reckoned at 2000 quintals of 112lbs. avoirdupois each, and the sugar to 90,000 piculs of 138 lbs. each.—[Sing. Chron. Sept. 30.

ASTRAKHAN.

Cholera Morbus.—It is known that the disorder appeared in Astrakhan on Sept. 1823. M. Moreau de Jonnés, in a paper communicated to the Royal Academy of Sciences in Paris, 25th January last, has investigated its character and effects. It was extinguished in the month of November; and, during the interval, out of 216 individuals attacked, 144 died. The writer is of opinion, that it was introduced either by caravans from Syria, or by marine communication; and he infers from the facts contained in the paper:—1st. that the Cholera Morbus of India and Syria may be introduced into Europe by commercial intercourse, either by sea or land; 2dly. that as far as the 56th of latitude there is no point in Europe where the disease may not be propagated in the hot season; 3dly. that its progress would probably be slower in Europe than in the Levant, either through the climate, or more likely through the effect of the social organization, which insures a greater degree of success to the measures necessary for circumscribing its ravages; but, that the example of Astrakhan leaves no hope, that, in penetrating into Europe, it would become less destructive, or lose that fatal power which enables it to kill two persons out of every three it attacks, and to produce death within only a few hours.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

On the 17th May the formal promulgation of the New Charter of Justice took place at the government-house, Sydney; and the state and judicial oaths were administered to the chief-justice, Francis Forbes, Esq. The Supreme Court of Justice was opened the same day, by his honour the chief-justice, who took his seat on the Bench, accompanied by the members, William Wemyss and Edward Riley, Esqrs. The oaths of office were then administered to Saxe Bannister, Esq., attorney-general, and to the other officers of the court.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

Too. A public meeting was held at the Court-house, Hobart Town, the 20th April, the provost-marshal in the chair, when it was resolved to petition his Majesty to elevate Van Diemen's Land into a separate independent colony.

Papers and letters from Van Diemen's Land have been received to the 28th Oct.; the latter afford considerable information relative to the improvement of the colony. Surveys of the island had been ordered, and new settlements established; it was proposed that the seat of government should be removed to Brighton. At Bagdall, seventeen miles from Hobart Town, the increase and improvement of the quality of wool appears to attract attention; and the wool transmitted to England had been returned in cloth, with the most favourable reports of the quality by the Yorkshire manufacturers. Specimens of the timber of the colony had also been sent off—other merchants advertising that they may be seen at different stores. The reports are favourable as to their quality and value. An agricultural society was about being established.

Another expedition had sailed for Moreton Bay, in order to form a new settlement in its vicinity.

In a few years we shall have colonies all along the eastern and north-west sides of Van Diemen's Land.

The male convicts that arrived in the transport ship Phoenix, were landed in September. Two hundred and four men were shipped, but two died on their voyage; during which some of them conducted themselves in a mutinous manner; in consequence of which the offenders were selected for Macquarie Harbour, and the remainder of them were landed in a healthy and orderly state.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Copy of a letter dated Wha-hoo', Sept. 8, 1824.

"Tamoree, late King of Atooi, died 26th of last May; and the island having been formerly ceded to Rbio Rbio,* was taken possession of by Krymakoo as Regent. The Atooi chiefs were exceedingly dissatisfied with the cession of the Island in the first instance, and were held in subjection only by their king, being kept here as a hostage. This dissatisfaction was increased by an unpopular governor being set over them, and by other acts; and on Sunday the 8th of August, some of the Atooi people, with George Tomaree† at their head, made an attack on the fort, with the intention of seizing the arms and ammunition.

"The attack was ill-planned, and was, consequently, unsuccessful. They were repulsed

* Rbio Rbio was King of Owyhee and other Windward Islands, and died in England last summer.

† George Tomaree was from the "Cornwall School," and sent out by the Missionary Society.

repulsed, and about twenty men and one or two chiefs left dead. Krymakoo and Tamahama, the new governor, shut themselves up in the fort, and despatched their vessels for assistance. Since this time the islands have been in a perfect turmoil. All business is at an end, except the war; the vessels have been all kept in requisition to carry troops, and the natives are all the time training and firing off their guns. When Krymakoo had about 1,000 or 1,500 natives, and many chiefs, from the Windward Islands, he marched out of his fort, and attacked the Atooi people in their entrenchments; the latter were beaten, and retreated, leaving many dead. George retired to the mountains with only a few followers, and the troops of the governor set out to scour the island. Since then the war has become almost one of extermination, and has been prosecuted with savage barbarity.

"The hills are covered with dead bodies, the lands laid waste, and the houses burned. George is in the mountains, and is said to have about six hundred natives with him; but they must suffer for want of provisions, as the island is ruined, and will probably be obliged to submit in the course of a month."

SOUTHERN AFRICA.

SETTLEMENT IN THE INTERIOR.

Extract of a letter, dated Graaff Reynet, Oct. 22, 1824.

"I left this place the day after the date of my last, on a visit to the settlement, in order to meet the commissioner for adjusting the claims of the settlers; and did not return home till the 14th instant, after an interesting tour through the settlement. On my arrival in Graham's-town, I was surprised at the great improvement and increase since I last left it, about sixteen months back; and still more when I remembered, that, where now above six hundred houses stand, on our arrival, four years and a half ago, not more than six or ten miserable dwellings existed. The new Trunk, or District Prison, is a fine building, sufficiently extensive to contain all the settlers; and much obloquy has been cast upon government for erecting such an immense and expensive edifice. The Droutdy-House, a very extensive and handsome building, is nearly finished; a church is shortly to be commenced; besides a third range of barracks, which are intended for the accommodation of the Hottentot troops. In short, the place is completely overgrown, when we reflect that almost its entire revenue arises from the expenditure of the military, and wages paid to labourers for the new public buildings. The situation of the settlers in the vicinity of this town is rapidly improving, and the traces of success are obvious to any one who had observed their former condition. The demand for green forage for the cavalry, vegetables, timber, butter, &c., form the chief articles which they supply; and, to such as have more extensive farms, grass meets with a ready market. One individual alone is said to make more than 90 rix dollars per diem by this article. The population of Graham's town is stated at 3,000 whites, exclusive of the military, and the slaves and Hottentots are very numerous. Bathurst remains in the same state as when it was reduced from the capital of the settlement to its present situation; nor do I think it is likely to rise from its ruins, as the new village at Port Kowie renders it of little avail: its population is on the decrease. The house built for the Landdrost is now finished, and converting into a free-school, under the direction of a clergyman of the Church of England. A flour and blanket-mill is here erecting by two industrious men from one of our manufacturing districts; but I understand the latter speculation will not be permitted. In the garden belonging to Mr. S. Bidulph here, are lemon trees, planted from the seeds in September 1820, which are now in bearing—a more rapid growth than usual in the colony. The vines also, planted in 1820 bore some little fruit in 1824, but in the last year were entirely blighted—a misfortune which occurred to most of the vines in the settlement. In six or seven situations the experiment of this cultivation will now be tried; but I am of opinion that it can never succeed as a wine district. Port Kowie, a village consisting of about twenty good houses, and on the increase, has risen within the last fifteen months, and promises to become a thriving place. The government have certainly done a considerable service in establishing this port. Many vessels have visited it with large and valuable cargoes, and some trifling amount of exports returned. While I was here, there was a large sale of goods for three successive days, and the amount sold was 6,000 rix dollars' worth at three months' credit. The purchasers were entirely settlers, and chiefly of the lower class—a certain proof that they could not be distressed; the Vendue Master told me he found them the best pay. The chief merchant here has an extensive salting establishment, which I understand answers very well, which, if it be the case, will prove of immense advantage to the settlement, as being chiefly adapted for grazing. Two or three persons are now engaged in this business: the market is the Isle of France and some of the Indian islands. The fine woods of timber on the banks of this river render it available as a place for ship-building; and government have, in consequence, ordered the keel of a vessel for the port to be laid down forthwith.

with. To the settlers in the neighbourhood of this port, a full market is afforded for butter, hides, fat, cattle, timber for the buildings, lime, &c. The demand for artisans for the public and other buildings has raised the price of this labour to three and four rix dollars per diem. Agricultural servants demand, and easily procure, two and two and a half; and as most of these persons are small proprietors, they are doing well, and might do much better, if they would addict themselves less to idleness. To the more respectable settlers the prospect is not yet so cheering, having lost their means, and without the opportunity of retrieving them, which is enjoyed by the labouring class; but the distribution in way of loan (for they have decided one and all to take it in no other way) of the subscriptions raised in India and England expressly for them, will, there is little doubt, put them all to rights again; and a fresh and extensive emigration of labourers from home (for the want is dreadful among the settlers) will be attended with the most beneficial effects. The fact is, the whole colony would be benefited by the introduction of more free labour, and I think would absorb from two to three thousand per year for some long period. the advantage to the mother country, and to the persons so emigrating, would be very great. The Caffres, since the establishment of the fair, have been remarkably quiet, and are, I think, likely to continue so; their attention is employed, their industry excited, and their civilization likely to be promoted by this means. The best proof of this expectation is in the fact, that one tribe finding sale for their millet, have declared their intention of returning to a place more adapted for cultivation than the one at present which they occupy. In less than two months from the establishment of the fair, 15,500 rix dollars' worth of ivory has been purchased by the settlers chiefly, which, among other advantages, has this—of preventing the great drain of cash from the district for imported articles. The chief articles required by the Caffres, in barter, are opake, blue, white, and black beads, about the size of a millet grain. The profits of the exchange are very large. The whole population of the settlement I could not procure, but that of the district or division of Bathurst I can inform you, which is by far the best peopled: up to June 21, 1824, there were in all 1273. Average of births over deaths, for the whole period from our arrival, three to one; the last half year the births had greatly preponderated—forty-seven to eight. Proportion of men to women (whites), three to two; but the births have begun to remedy this, as they are stated as eight girls to seven boys. The black population, five men to three women, and three girls to two boys. Our numbers, consequently, are more likely to increase in the next generation. I am told, in one party, consisting of 100 families, the births have been, in the five years, 92! Such are the more important particulars relative to the present state of the settlement, and it gives me great pleasure to have altered my mind so much in its favour; for, from what I have seen, I am decidedly of opinion that it will eventually succeed, and much beyond what, for some time past, we have had reason to anticipate. The commissioner for adjusting the claims of the settlers seems generally to have given satisfaction; he has been dividing the lapse land among those remaining on their locations, or who fulfilled their contract with the Home Government, by staying upon them for three years. I expect my share, in consequence of this division of our location, will be full 800 acres; and I believe I am to have my 1,500 acres grant extended to 4000; at least, I am recommended for it. By the bye, I have lately had indentured to me, for seven years, one of these invading tribes, generally known as Maitatees, but whose proper national name is Ghoos; it is a woman. I am to feed, clothe, and instruct her, and pay her for her services two skillings (about 4d sterling) per week. She is beginning already to be useful. I hope to get some more as soon as more prisoners come in: it is a fine and intelligent race."

Postscript.

We have received Calcutta papers to the end of December. They contain few particulars respecting the operations of the war, besides those furnished in the despatches, which have created a great sensation at Calcutta. Amongst the property captured at the last grand attack upon the Burmese before Rangoon, was the horse, superbly caparioned, of the Commander-in-chief (who is stated to have been a son of the Maha Bundoola), several muskets bearing the Company's mark, and a paper which belonged to Capt. Trueman, who was killed in the unfortunate affair at Rangoon.

Rangoon. The troops at Rangoon are much improved in health since the favourable change in the weather, and the further operations of the army are anxiously looked for.

On the Chittagong and Sylhet frontier, preparations are making to co-operate with the army at Rangoon. The force at Chittagong is to advance via Aracan, where the Burmese are said to be in detached bodies to the amount of about 20,000. Great progress has been made, under the direction of Dep. Assist. Qr. mast. gen. Drummond, with the road across the Chittagong district, from the Sudder station to the Naaf river. Letters from Chittagong of the 8th December state, that Brig. gen. Morrison's force was expected to be ready for advance on the 24th. The various divisions would then converge towards the capital of Ava.

These papers afford no authentic confirmation of the revolution at Ava and death of the King, which was however known and credited at Chittagong. It rests at present upon the deposition of a native at Rangoon, who overheard a conversation between a Burmese chief and two persons from court. The substance of the statement is, that the King, who had been kept in ignorance of the events at Rangoon, became irritated on hearing them, and estranged himself from his queen, who had hitherto ruled him. Subsequently he made his son, a youth, nominal king, and Moun-shoe-za, formerly Raywoon of Rangoon, regent. The queen's party, however, recovered their influence; and soon afterwards the king, by their contrivance, was murdered. The regent marched to the palace, and, after a terrible conflict, massacred the queen, her brother, and their accomplices, and placed the young king upon the throne. These events, it is added, have caused great confusion.

On the other side of Bengal there has been some disturbance among the Rajpoot States. The Rane of Jeypore had assembled, it is stated, a Pagan force of 50,000 men, which obliged Sir D. Ochterlony to move from Delhi to watch it. She has since listened to terms of accommodation with her Zemindars, and desired the Resident, who had left her court, to return. A marauding system has been pursued in the pergunnahs south of the Nerbuddah, by some freebooters, particularly by a chief named Sheikh Dulla, whose party has been surprised and cut up on two occasions, by Capt. Sayer, on the 12th October, near Jalgaon; and by Lieut. and Adj. Lemont at Rajpurgurh, on the 21st. Late Bombay papers announce the re-appearance of the Sheikh at Ellichpore, whence he was driven into the Taptee. A gallant exploit was performed on the 3d October by Capt. Young, of the Strmoor local battalion, against a band of freebooters at Koonjwah, a gurhee and village, under three chiefs, two of whom were killed. The fort was burst open by a catapulta or battering ram, made of the trunk of a tree, as the detachment had neither guns nor ladders, under the direction of Lieut. De Bode, of the engineers. Every officer and soldier was engaged hand to hand. The Hon. Mr. Shore is said to have killed seven in single combat. Our loss was five killed and 32 wounded; the enemy's 153 killed and 30 taken.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, March 21.

Colonial System.—In a committee of the whole house, on the American and West-India trade, Mr. Huskisson explained the alterations proposed to be made in our colonial relations. They are founded upon the principle that monopoly and exclusion impede the prosperity of the colonies, and consequently injure the parent state: he announced the intention of government to bring forward bills (one has since been introduced) to alter and amend the system agreeably thereto.

In the course of the debate, it was stated by Sir Robert Farquhar, that the Mauritius, relieved from the unequal duty under which its produce now labours, would be able to defray the expense of its civil and military government, which has hitherto cost the country £100,000 per annum, levied, as he stated, for the exclusive protection of the West-Indies.

Mr. Huskisson declared that Mauritius sugar would be placed on the same footing as that from the West-Indies.

March 24.

Indian Army.—Mr. Hume moved for "a copy of the military despatch of Lord Hastings in 1819 to the secret department of the Court of Directors, on the organization and allowances of the Bengal army; and a copy of the despatch of the Court to the Indian government in 1823 on that subject." The hon. member introduced this motion by a long speech, in which he severely censured the present Indian government. He did not blame Lord Amherst (he said), but those who placed him in a situation he was incompetent to fill. Lord Amherst was doubtless an amiable man in private life, and might be able to conduct the government of India in a time of peace, and under favourable circumstances, with the assistance of his council. But no man who knew any thing about the present state of India, and looked to the difficult situation of affairs in that quarter, could lay his hand on his heart and say Lord Amherst was capable of sustaining the government of the country. He then condemned the mode of conducting the present war; and characterized the transport of troops from Barrackpore to Rangoon in the rainy season, as a measure which deserved the severest reprobation. The hon. member then adverted to the mutiny among the native troops; and considered that the government was entirely answerable for that occurrence; and that the treatment of the native officers of the 47th reg. was unjust and tyrannous. He again represented Lord Amherst as incompetent to the office of governor-general of India, which required an individual of the highest abilities, and who possessed the confidence of all.

Mr. Wynn defended the character of Lord Amherst, and stated that the cause of the outcry which was raised against that nobleman was, that at a ball he had led down the lady of the commodore, instead of conferring the honour on any of the ladies of the senior merchants.

Mr. Astell declared that every exertion had been made to ameliorate the condition of the sepoy officers. He did not see why the papers should be given.

Mr. F. Palmer believed that Mr. Astell had been misinformed as to the treatment of the sepoy officers. He (Mr. P.) knew that they had been obliged to purchase and pay dearly for many of their comforts. He knew also that the army of India was not in an effective state, and that raw cadets were sent to join them who were totally unfit for service. He knew that the whole Indian empire was in a state of jeopardy.

Mr. Harve observed, that every man who knew any thing of the Hindoo character, must be aware that when sepoys were in a state of mutiny, and when British troops had returned from battle, beaten, and but the skeleton of what they were, there must be a natural fear of losing that gigantic empire.

On a division, the motion was negatived. Ayes 15, noes 58.

March 29.

Burmese War.—Mr. Hume moved for additional papers, giving more information respecting the war in India. He wished to know the revenue of the Island of Shapuree, and the number of troops maintained there. He complained of the scantiness of the information supplied by Ministers.

Mr. Robertson thought there existed no just ground for the war. The reasons alleged by us were frivolous. Our pretensions to Shapuree were at best doubtful.

Mr. Wynn did not object to the production of the papers asked for. As to the revenue of Shapuree, it was immaterial to the point, and it would be utterly impossible to afford any information respecting the revenue of the Burman empire, unless the House were in a situation to empower the Sergeant at Arms to bring the Emperor of Ava to their bar and examine him, touching the nature and amount of his resources.

The papers were ordered; being returns respecting the Island of Shapuree, and the encroachments of the Burmese on the Chit tagong frontier.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Lord Palmerston, as Secretary at War, has ordered £580 to be distributed to Captain Cook, of the Cumbria, his officers and crew, for their humane services to the ship Krut. The Royal Humane Society have awarded Captain Cook an honorary medal.

A fine regular rigged ship, sloop of war, we are told, is now sitting out at Black-wall. Her destiny is to cruise against the pirates who infest the coast of Batavia. This extraordinary ship, the first of the kind made in Europe, unites the powers of sailing or steaming, separate or connected, at pleasure. The paddles fold up like a lady's fan, and with great facility.

His Majesty has conferred the honour of knighthood on John Frauks, Esq. one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, Bengal.

Major Gen. R. Darling is appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land.

SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, BART.

This distinguished officer's death has been too recently known in England to admit of our inserting a memoir of him in the proper place. We reserve it till next month, in order to make it complete.

Sir Alexander was twice married: his first wife was Miss Morshead, sister of Sir John Morshead, Bart. of Trenant Park, Cornwall, by whom he had two sons and three daughters. Both sons were killed in action. The eldest daughter married the late Alexander Cockburn, Esq. of Madras, and perished at sea. The second married Major-General Sir John Malcolm, G. C. B. The youngest married Lieut.-Colonel Macdonald Kinneir. Sir Alexander was united by a second marriage to Miss Pemberton, daughter of the late Rev. W. Pemberton, of Cambridgeshire, by whom he has issue, a daughter, and who survives him. The Baronetcy descends, by special provision, to the male issue of his daughters successively, and devolves upon Mr. (now Sir Alexander) Cockburn.

Set April, 1825.

resign the office of surveyor to the Company. Mr. Wilkins had been appointed by the court, on account of his merits and eminence in his profession, and on those accounts alone. (Hear!) His duties were very extensive; and the question was, whether such an able, useful, and intelligent officer of the Company should not have permanent efficient assistance? The expense to the Company, as he had already observed, would not be increased by such appointment, as the salary and allowances of the clerk of the works at present were equal to the stipend which it was proposed to affix to the situation of first-assistant. (Hear!)

Mr. Hume said, he did not object to the salary, but he wished to know whether the person appointed to the situation was capable of carrying on the details of the office? He should be glad to learn, whether his education and knowledge were such as would enable him to afford to his principal that assistance which the report of the Court of Directors declared to be necessary? To such a person only should this situation be awarded.

The Chairman observed, that the Court of Directors were quite convinced of Mr. Cogden's fitness for this office; and if they had entertained any doubts on the subject, those doubts would have been removed by the certificate of Mr. Wilkins himself. (Hear!)

A Proprietor inquired, what was the salary of the surveyor of buildings?

The Chairman answered, that it was £500 a year.

The same Proprietor inquired, what duties the surveyor of buildings had to perform?

The Chairman said, the duties of the surveyor were very considerable, and had increased. If the hon. proprietor would walk round that house, he would see the great change which had recently been made under the supervision of the surveyor. He then moved that "the court approve of the resolution of the Court of Directors of the 26th of January last, subject to the confirmation of another general court;" which was agreed to unanimously.

GRANT TO SIR J. MALCOLM.

The Chairman stated that this court was further made special for the purpose of laying before the proprietors, for their approbation, a resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th of January last, granting to Major-General Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., a pension of £1,000 per annum, on the grounds therein stated. The report required by the by-law, chap. 6, sec. 19, together with the documents upon which the said resolution had been formed, had for some time past been open for the inspection of the proprietors at this house; the resolution and the report would now be read. As many gentlemen, he had no doubt, had already perused those documents, it would, he conceived, be useless for him to do more than merely direct their attention to the statements contained in them.

The clerk then read the resolution and report of the Court of Directors, as follow:—

"At a Court of Directors, held on Wednesday, the 5th January 1825,

"Resolved by the ballot: That in consideration of the distinguished merits and services of Major-General Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., during a very lengthened period, in high military and civil stations, in which he has displayed great skill and gallantry as a soldier, and evinced no less talent in difficult and distant diplomatic missions, by which the interests of the East-India Company have been greatly promoted, and the character of the Company's service upheld, he be granted a pension of (£1,000) one thousand pounds per annum, to commence from Christmas last; subject to the approbation of the General Court of Proprietors, and the confirmation of the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India."

The Chairman.—"I beg leave to move, that this court approve of the resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th of January last, granting to Sir J. Malcolm a pension of £1,000 per annum, subject to the confirmation of another general court." (Hear.)

General Thornton said, there could be no doubt of the eminent services which had been achieved by Sir J. Malcolm for the Company, and therefore he for one would most cheerfully vote for the proposed grant. He was only sorry, as Sir J. Malcolm was in possession of full health and vigour, that he was no longer actively employed. It was of very great importance that men of such distinguished ability should be constantly retained in their service. (Hear!) He was sure that no opposition would be offered to this motion, which he supported with the utmost pleasure.

Mr. Pattison stated, that at an earlier period, if particular circumstances had not occurred, hopes were entertained that this excellent officer would have been publicly employed as ambassador to the Persian Court, where differences had arisen requiring the interference of a person so highly accredited. When, however, that matter was brought forward, some objections were made in the foreign secretary's department, and the intention was abandoned. He (Mr. Pattison) had, at the time, the honour of being in the chair; and he thought it right to state that Sir John Malcolm, though then in a bad state of health, expressed his readiness and willingness to proceed on the mission to Persia. Credentials from his Majesty, however, which he deemed essential to the success of his mission, it was not deemed expedient to grant to him; and another course was adopted, and a gentleman was sent from Bengal to carry on the negotiation. Some time after this he ceased to occupy the situation of Chairman; but he left the chair, under a pledge to Sir J. Malcolm, that if his successor did not think fit to bring forward the question of remuneration, he should consider it his duty to do so. Another business then arose, which occupied the court very much, and occasioned considerable delay in the introduction of this subject: he alluded to the long discussions to which the Hyderabad papers had given rise. Pending those discussions, it was not thought proper to bring the question forward, and it was in consequence postponed for some months. Beside this, very great hopes were entertained during the whole of last year, that the Court of Directors would have succeeded in appointing this distinguished officer to one of the Indian governments, in which situation there would have been suitable employment for his high talents: such an appointment would have rendered the present application to the court unnecessary; and Sir J. Malcolm expressed his most perfect readiness and willingness to undertake the arduous duties connected with it. These hopes had, however, been disappointed; and this gallant officer, it appeared, had been put upon the shelf, for reasons which, though not exactly obvious to common understandings, were, he supposed, good in themselves, if it were possible to trace them. As the Company were not able to take advantage of Sir J. Malcolm's great abilities during his remaining years of strength and health, it was deemed just and proper not to suffer him to sink into the vale of life, without receiving some mark of respect and attention, from those whom he had so faithfully and honourably served. (Hear!)

Mr. Hume wished to say one or two words on the subject now before the court. He felt that he would be wasting the time of the court, that he would be unnecessarily troubling them, were he, for any lengthened period, to delay them by stating the grounds on which he was disposed to agree to the present motion; but, in acceding to this proposition, they owed a little more to the immediate object of their approbation than to suffer the question to pass without notice. The East-India Company were fortunate, on many occasions, in having their interests supported by able and intelligent officers; but it did not often happen to any man to distinguish himself in such various ways as Sir J. Malcolm had done. On a former occasion, when it was proposed to grant a sum of money to Sir J. Malcolm, as a recompense for certain expenses which he had incurred in the Company's service, he (Mr. Hume) took up some of the time of the court in stating his view of that gallant officer's merits. It happened that he was in India at the very period when Sir J. Malcolm might fairly be said to be coming into service, and he could only state the conviction impressed on his mind by the conduct which that meritorious individual pursued. His conviction was, that of all the public servants the Company ever had in India (and numbers of them were most serviceable men), there was not one that could take the lead of Sir J. Malcolm. (Hear!) There never was a public servant who had gone on so well with the natives of India, or whose conduct was so generally approved of, as that of Sir J. Malcolm, in all his transactions. (Hear!) He mentioned this part of Sir J. Malcolm's character the more particularly, because, if any branch of their service ought to be better paid than another, it was that which brought individuals into constant contact with the natives. They ought to look with a most favourable eye on those men who, when in office, whether civil or military, combined in themselves the disposition, as well as the talent, to conciliate the natives of India. (Hear!) He wished the people of India to look up to the Company as friends, protectors, and fathers, instead of viewing them as harsh masters and overbearing tyrants. (Hear!) He thought, if ever there was a time when the attention of the court, both within and without the bar, ought to be directed to this subject, the present was that time; and he would not let this opportunity pass without drawing a melancholy contrast between the situation of affairs when Sir J. Malcolm was in India, and the lamentable scenes which were now unfortunately acting in that extended empire. (Hear!) He was extremely sorry that such a view had not been taken of the state of India by gentlemen within the bar, as would induce them, by a change of measures, to put an end to the evils which now prevailed there. He could wish, when an individual like Sir J. Malcolm was selected, and most properly selected, as a fit object for their bounty, that the recommendation should have received the unanimous concurrence of the Court of Directors; but he saw that a very considerable number of the Directors had not signed the proposition now before the proprietors. He, therefore, thought it a more imperative duty on his part to vote for the motion, and to express his opinion of Sir J. Malcolm's talents and services. However numerous and however able were the officers who had served with Sir J. Mal-calm, not one of them had outstripped him in his brilliant career; and he was convinced there was not one of them but must agree with him in thinking that he had deserved, in a peculiar manner, the favour of the court. They must regret with him, that this proposition had not been unanimously agreed to by the gentlemen within the bar; that it would be carried by the consentient voice of the proprietors without the bar, he did not entertain the slightest doubt. It was his intention, as soon as the forms of the court would permit him, to call the attention of the proprietors to the present state of India. (Hear!) He should reserve himself for that purpose until the present motion was disposed of; and he should then feel it his duty to state the view which he had adopted, with respect to certain transactions, which had recently occurred in India. Every hon. proprietor who gave his vote on this occasion, ought to be perfectly satisfied of the great services performed by Sir J. Malcolm. His good fortune, his health, and his talents had enabled him to act a most conspicuous part in Indian politics. He wished especially to allude to the manner in which Sir J. Malcolm was taken out of his regular line, that of a military officer, and called upon to exert his talents in a diplomatic character. In that character he had greatly distinguished himself. Indeed, he believed that, except with respect to the last action at Maludpore, where Sir J. Malcolm took a very decided part, the officers of the army were much more disposed to give him credit for his civil than for his military talents. He, however, did not wish to undervalue the military abilities of Sir J. Malcolm; but, in giving this vote, he must say, that he considered the merits of Sir J. Malcolm much more in a civil than in a military point of view. (Hear!)

Mr. Buckingham said he did not rise for the purpose of dissuading the unanimity which prevailed in the court on this occasion; he, however, did not feel at right to give a silent vote on this question. The services of Sir J. Malcolm, though they had been alluded to by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, deserved a more particular notice. In the very early part of his career, he had the honour first to draw the attention of the Marquess Wellesley and the Indian government to the situation of the half-castes—a class of persons who deserved more than had yet been done for them—whose numbers were hourly increasing, and who would ultimately force themselves on the notice of the court. His civil duties he had performed with the greatest ability and the utmost attention. His report on Malwa, and the directions to the officers under him, which were attached to that work, proved, beyond any thing else, that he possessed the most excellent mind and heart. (Hear!) His close acquaintance with the feelings and habits of the people of India rendered his measures successful. He always recommended a system of conciliation rather than the interposition of force. (Hear, hear!) His services in India were, he believed, better known to the proprietors than those which he had performed in other places; but, when Sir J. Malcolm was in Persia in 1816, it gave great pleasure to him (Mr. Buckingham), and to other Englishmen who happened to be there at the time, to find the name of Sir J. Malcolm received every where with respect and honour. (Hear!) It was more owing to the personal conduct of Sir J. Malcolm, than to any other cause, that a good understanding was kept up at the Court of Persia towards India and the English interest there. (Hear!) The principles which Sir J. Malcolm had recently promulgated relative to the Indian press, having drawn him (Mr. Buckingham) into a public altercation with that gentleman, he deemed it especially necessary that he should bear this testimony to the excellence of his character and the splendour of his services. (Hear!) No man in that court could vote with a more ready heart and mind than he should do for the proposition now before them.

The motion was then carried unanimously.

STATE OF INDIA.

The Chairman was about to put the question of adjournment, when—

Mr. Hume rose for the purpose of addressing the court, in pursuance of the notice which he had just given. He could assure the proprietors, that he would not have troubled them for a moment on the subject which he was about to bring forward, if he did not sincerely feel that it was one of the deepest importance, and most intimately connected with the interests of the Company. There was no person, however retired he might live, that could be ignorant of the events which were now passing in India—events so different from those which he had formerly an opportunity of witnessing in that country, that he found very great difficulty in being able to account to himself for so extraordinary a change. He had, some years ago, an opportunity of observing the conduct of their native troops at a time of almost general hostility, when nearly every state in India had their arms raised against the Company—when dangers pressed on every side, and our Eastern dominions were in a perilous situation. But, on that occasion, he was not aware of seeing any thing in the conduct of the troops, except cheerful obedience to their officers, and the most ready attention to the orders of their superiors. This perfect confidence in the government on the part, not only of every native, but of every Englishman who was resident in India, produced the most glorious effects. He need scarcely say, that the consequence of this unanimity was, the achievement of those brilliant results which tended, in a great measure, to consolidate the strength and power of their Indian empire. Again and again had those individuals, to whose exertions this promising state of affairs was mainly attributable, been brought before that court. They had received the thanks of the directors, the thanks of the proprietors, nay, the thanks of the whole country; therefore the court was now called on, in an especial manner, to examine the state in which India was at present, and to account, if possible, for the melancholy alteration which was now observable. His sentiments with regard to the press were so well known, that it was almost unnecessary for him to repeat them; and he would only do so for the purpose of bringing under the notice of the proprietors what he had formerly stated on that subject, and of shewing that what he then said was perfectly correct. In a time of difficulty and danger, an interference with the press would inevitably, as he had foretold, be attended with unfortunate circumstances. That was the position he had formerly laid down, and that position turned out to be a most just one. Where an interference with the press existed, where government sought to control it, every unfortunate occurrence was, by the ready tongue of rumour, made to appear ten times worse than it was in reality. Where correct statements were suppressed, for the purpose of preventing unpleasant truths from going abroad, the place of just intelligence was uniformly supplied by report, and great mischief was the unavoidable consequence. It was impossible for any government to suppress facts entirely; and, as he had before observed, an injudicious attempt to put down discussion, and the expression of public opinion, by endeavouring to prevent public statements from going forth, must not only be attended with circumstances of an extremely unpleasant nature, but must ultimately defeat the object of those who adopted such a crooked line of policy. The consequences which he had foreseen had not only taken place, but, in fact, they still continued.

Mr. S. Drom rose to order. He wished to know whether the hon. proprietor meant to follow up, this day, the observations he was now making with any specific motion? He did not rise to interrupt the hon. proprietor unnecessarily; but he thought, when a subject of such importance was brought forward, it would be better if it were introduced to the court by a regular notice.

Mr. Hume.—“It is unnecessary, as this is a Quarterly General Court, that I should give any such notice. If I am out of order, let the hon. proprietor point out in what respect.”

The Chairman.—“If the hon. proprietor had been out of order, I certainly should have interrupted him.”

Mr. Hume continued.—His course was a very plain and fair one. He thought he had a right to shew that what he had previously foretold was perfectly true. If he were prevented from proceeding in that manner, he knew not to what extent the principle might be carried. The hon. proprietor wished to know whether he (Mr. Hume) intended to submit any motion to the court on this occasion? He would at once set the mind of the hon. proprietor to rest on that head; he should have the benefit, not of one, but of two or three motions. (A laugh.) He was about to state to the court, that the apprehension which he, on former occasions, stated that he entertained with respect to the proceedings in India, and the effects which they were likely to produce, had, so far as he could learn, been fully borne out by subsequent events; for, at the present moment, the proprietors here in England, who might be considered the government of India, were entirely ignorant of what was passing in their Eastern territories; at all events, the information they received was exceedingly unsatisfactory. (Hear!) Every thing they heard on the subject of Indian affairs came from individuals who made their communications under the fear and alarm of being subjected to banishment if they boldly promulgated their opinions. The great evil of this was, that they, the Court of Proprietors, were ignorant of what was going on in India; they were unacquainted with the consequences which this interference with the press had produced there, and they could not judge of the circumstances to which it might give birth in future. He had stated before, that when he had the honour of serving the Company in India, an idea of such proceedings was never thought of; such a course of policy was utterly unknown; they were, therefore, in the situation in which they were now placed, called upon to consider, and to point out, if they possibly could, in what cause such a state of things originated. They were bound, in respect to their own interests, and to the interests of millions of their Indian subjects, to inquire whether it was in their power to put an end to such lamentable proceedings; and to lessen, as far as they were able, the danger which threatened the Company's establishments. It was with this view that he would, before he sat down, submit to the court two motions; one, requesting that there should be laid before the proprietors the the proceedings that took place with respect to the unfortunate transaction at Barrackpore; the causes, as far as the government knew those causes, which led to that melancholy transaction; and the orders subsequently given by the government for the purpose of removing them. He also meant to move for a copy of a military despatch, sent by the Marquess of Hastings in 1819, to the Secret Department of the Court of Directors, with respect to the allowances and organization of the Indian army; also a copy of the instructions or orders sent out in consequence, by the Court of Directors, in 1823; and a statement of the extent to which the orders so sent out had been complied with. Having all this information before them, he thought they might coolly and calmly come to a decision as to the parties with whom so much evil had originated, and with whom the fault remained. They might also endeavour to trace the cause, if indeed it could be ascertained, to which the present state of India was to be attributed. If any gentleman in that court, who happened to have communications with India, heard him (Mr. Hume) say any thing which appeared to be contrary to fact, that gentleman, he hoped, would be good enough to correct him. He would lay it down as a fact, that in every communication from India—not from any particular place, but from Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay—complaints were made, in very strong terms, of the present Government of India. (Hear!) The subject and purport of every letter he had seen went to this—that the white as well as the black population, at the time of writing those letters, had lost all confidence in the Governor-General. (Hear, hear!) They viewed with the deepest regret what had taken place, and they felt the utmost anxiety as to what might take place hereafter, if circumstances such as had recently occurred were suffered to continue. But they went farther, and declared that such a state of things could not continue. They said, “we do expect, before these accounts reach you, that the Government at home, having more direct information on the subject, and having the interest of India at heart, will have devised some measures for the removal of this most unfortunate state of circumstances, and will send out individuals to India with talents that may enable them so to conduct themselves as to insure the confidence of the people in this important empire.” This he positively stated, and if he were wrong he was open to contradiction. Such was the opinion of the civil and military classes; such was the opinion of the private merchants; such was the opinion of the natives; such, in short, was the opinion of every soul who reflected on the present state of affairs in India, and who felt the mighty importance of securing a system of good government in that widely-extended empire. (Hear!) Now, if this were true, could they, the Court of Proprietors, continue silent and listless spectators on such an occasion? He could not suppose that the Court of Directors would remain with their arms across, doing nothing, when the Company was placed in such a situation. The public press of India was unfortunately prevented from giving any information on this most important subject. When any remarkable political transaction took place, the government, fearing lest any disclosure should be made other than what was authorized by itself, took the precaution to forbid any mention of the circumstance; and notices to that effect were occasionally sent out. The effect of this system was, that the real and true character of every occurrence was disguised. This must be a most mischievous plan, if they judged from the manner in which transactions were recorded in this country. Here, every occurrence was told in a different way by the spectators; so that, by comparing the different accounts together, and calculating on their greater or less degree of probability, men arrived at the truth. This was one immense advantage which flowed from the unfettered press of Great Britain: but no such advantage was to be found in India. After the unfortunate transaction at Barrackpore, a circular letter was sent round to each newspaper, couched in these terms: “I am directed by the Rt. Hon. the Governor-General in Council to acquaint you, that you are to take no notice in your paper of the mutiny of the 47th native regiment at Barrackpore, and the punishment which followed it, until the official statement is drawn up.” Now, it would be said, that this only restricted persons from publishing until the official account of the transaction made its appearance; but an editor might be transported, or have his press shut up, if he published any thing contrary to that official statement, however unjust or unfair he might know the government document to be. (Hear!) The conclusion he drew was this, that such being the practice, not in one case only, but in many, it was impossible to arrive at an accurate knowledge of important events. To prove that such was the system adopted in other cases, he need only mention, that the other day a letter was sent to the editor of an Indian paper, The Scotsman, declaring, that if in any paragraph he mentioned the name of Mr. Buckingham, his press should be put down. Was such a tyranny as this to be endured? Yet such was the system adopted, in order to prevent the publication of every occurrence of moment—of every transaction that ought to be publicly known:

known. The press in this country afforded the most powerful means of doing good, by pointing out, and thereby checking, bad and oppressive acts: but in India they might look in vain for that most efficient check, that great corrective of misgovernment. Here, the press exerted its influence on every occasion, however trifling. This could not affect men who conducted themselves correctly; but, when individuals were conscious of acting an improper part, and of disgracing their country, what was so likely to expose, to detect, and, if possible, to reform them, as the animadversions of a free press? Therefore he wished to see the freedom of the press established in India. It could not be offensive to any persons, except to a man like Lord Amherst, who was afraid that the public should know his acts; or Mr. Bayley and some other officers, who had forgotten what was due to the name of Englishmen; who had endeavoured, as far as lay in their power, to degrade their countrymen to the rank of the oppressed Portuguese or Spaniards, who, never having enjoyed freedom, did not know the proud feeling with which freemen asserted and defended their opinions. The natural consequence of such a deplorable system was, that loss of confidence in the government, which was felt throughout India; and he was perfectly convinced, that there was not one individual within the bar, who had any communication with that country, who would not admit that what he (Mr. Hume) had foretold had actually happened. The disastrous events, which had been hastened and hurried on by a blind adherence to this mischievous system, however they might be glossed over, and however the conduct of those by whom they had been occasioned might be approved and sanctioned by that court, were viewed by the public with feelings of distrust and dissatisfaction. The more those circumstances were considered, the greater would appear the necessity of adopting new measures for the prudent government of India. He mentioned this merely in passing; and he would again repeat, that if they lived to meet together at the end of one, two, or three years, they would find all the dangers which now threatened India extended and aggravated, unless a different course of policy were adopted. This being the case, he would appeal to the Court of Directors as to the course they meant to pursue. He would ask of them whether any measures had been taken for the purpose of checking those evils? He demanded of them whether any steps had been taken for the recal of Lord Amherst? whether means had been devised for sending out to India men who were capable of efficiently governing that great empire? (Hear!) It was for the Court of Directors to do this. If they had (and he hoped they had) proposed measures of this nature, and if the Government had refused to allow an individual, possessing that knowledge and talent which was likely to win the confidence of the people of India, to proceed to that country, it was most material that the Court of Proprietors should know the fact. If they had made such an application, and if they sat down silently under a refusal, instead of acting with promptitude and vigour, then they did not do that which, as servants of the Company, they were, by their oaths, bound to do. (Hear!) He, therefore, wished to know this, before he decided whether the executive body had or had not done their duty. In all the communications which he had seen from different parts of India, he uniformly found the writers of private letters sending their accounts of what was passing in that country with this significant request, "For God's sake, don't let my name be mentioned; if it is mentioned, ruin will be the consequence!" It was not wonderful that this request was made, when, day after day, they found the Indian Government transporting those who were obnoxious to them. Mr. Fair had been suddenly sent from Bombay; and two gentlemen, indigo-planters, had been as suddenly shipped off from Bengal. In fact, a more complete reign of terror, an authority more purely arbitrary and despotic, could not be imagined than that which now prevailed in India. (Hear!) They would have before them, in a few days, the particulars of the cases to which he had alluded; and he trusted that they would be thoroughly sifted and examined. Meantime he would appeal to the court whether, under such a system, they could expect permanence in their Eastern empire, or confidence amongst their subjects. The confidence of Englishmen, in the present government of India, was already gone; and if they lost the confidence of the natives, who had hitherto defended their empire, let them not be surprised at the lamentable consequences which must inevitably follow. If he wished to convey an adequate idea of the danger to which the Company's interest in India was now exposed, he would compare the present situation of that country to that of an individual seated on a barrel of gunpowder, to which a train, ready for explosion, was affixed. Such, he was satisfied, was the situation of the Company at this moment. What, he asked, had led to this state of things? It was, in the first instance, occasioned by an interference with the press; then came individual acts of oppression; and these were followed up by a proceeding, the weakness of which was altogether unaccountable. The Government of India had commenced hostilities against a state which could not possibly interfere with the safety of our territories. They had done this, too, at a time when the resources of the country could not be called into efficient action; and the consequence was, that an excellent army had been reduced to its present lamentable condition. The war was begun in imbecility, and carried on in ignorance. Instead of selecting a proper period for sending out the troops, they had been conveyed to their destination at the commencement of the rainy season; they had been subjected to numerous deprivations; they were, in short, exposed to every inconvenience that could harass their bodies and depress their spirits. The consequence was, that out of a body of 8,000 or 9,000 troops, 1,100 fell victims to disease. (Hear!) He had himself been connected with an army which was visited by disease; and he would appeal to an hon. director within the bar, as to the effect which that illness had produced on the feelings of the whole community whilst it lasted, coupled as it was with the conduct of a commanding officer in whom the troops reposed no confidence. It was not the mere loss of men that was to be deplored, but it was the effect which was produced on the minds of the survivors. He really believed, if the whole number of men to whom he had alluded, had been killed in the first action with the enemy, it would not have destroyed the spirit of the troops half so much as the languor and lassitude produced by disease. (Hear!) Was not this a subject that deserved the serious attention of that court, and of all those who felt an interest in the affairs of India? It was an insult to suppose that they could look with indifference on the fate of thousands of human beings like themselves, who loudly called for their support and protection. It was their duty to examine what had already taken place, and to consider seriously what might take place hereafter, if they suffered their councils to be guided by such gross imbecility. He trusted the Court of Directors had not been so supine as to allow recent events to pass without due investigation. He hoped they took care not only to examine them, but that they had devised some means for the removal of existing abuses. He would now briefly touch upon the expedition to Rangoon. They found, amongst their native troops, a great unwillingness to come down from Bengal to proceed on that service: but did they find a corresponding attention on the part of the government to afford them every facility and every comfort which could reconcile them to their situation? No; they found nothing of the kind. The danger thickened; and, instead of pursuing the common dictates of prudence, instead of consulting the feelings of the troops, care was taken to add to their difficulties and inconveniences, until the business was wound up by the lamentable catastrophe at Barrackpore. He would satisfy the court, in the clearest manner, that the government were perfectly aware of the situation in which, at that moment, the army was placed, although they did not adopt those means which were in their power, for the purpose of preventing the explosion which ultimately took place. He found, when the battalions were ordered down from the upper provinces, that desertions became very frequent; they increased to a degree which, he would venture to assert, was unknown to the oldest officer. When this was observed, the cause should have been inquired into; and, had that course been taken, the melancholy event would have been avoided. He blamed the government, not so much for having plunged into this war (although it was not likely to add to their honour, their character, or their interest), as for the imbecility and folly which marked their conduct with respect to the troops. When they received such ominous warnings, was it too much to expect, even from persons of the most ordinary capacity, that they would endeavour to guard against the threatened danger—that they would meet the feelings of the troops in a manner becoming a great government, instead of adding to their difficulties and increasing their discontent? He spoke from private letters, which, he believed, were perfectly correct; and from these he learned, that, on the 18th of October, 254 men deserted in the course of 48 hours, from a battalion consisting of 1,000. Was not this a warning to government? If it were a single event, it might, perhaps, have passed without notice; but scarcely a corps moved down in which the spirit of desertion did not appear, in a greater or smaller degree. And what was the reason of this? It arose from the difficulties of the service, coupled with a reduction of the allowances, and a narrowing of all the privileges which the troops had previously been in the habit of enjoying. The Burmese were exceedingly active in cutting off all supplies from Bengal; and our army was not able, as on former occasions, to procure provisions on the line of march. The price of provisions was, in consequence of these difficulties, raised to such a degree, that the sepoys found it almost impossible to subsist on their ordinary allowance. The Bengal government caused all the cattle to be bought up, in order to supply the British army stationed in the Burmese territory. This, no doubt, was a very proper act; but when it was known that the sepoys could not have the usual supply of cattle to carry their baggage, &c., it produced very great discontent. And here it must be observed, that the attendants on an Indian army were more more numerous, in the ratio of ten to one, than those of an European army. It was not fair, therefore, to reason with respect to an army in Bengal, on such data as would be proper if speaking of an European army. This being the state of the fact, he argued that the Bengal Government had much to answer for, when these discontents were known, and when increased allowances were called for by the sepoys, in not attending to their complaints. The allowances of the sepoys were, in fact, lowered, while the pay of fellows who were comparatively useless was raised 25, 50, nay, he believed 100 per cent. Every ragamuffin that went with the gun-boat expedition from Calcutta received a liberal allowance; but the sepoys were not treated in that manner. Was it then wonderful that discontent should be generated? When government found that discontent was spreading rapidly, what course did they pursue? They ordered money to be paid to the sepoys; two thousand rupees, he believed, were given to each battalion. But this did not remove the inconvenience, because the government had previously picked up all the cattle: this was one source of discontent. Another was, a belief which existed amongst the sepoys, that there was some magic power, some unfortunate influence in the Burmese territory, against which their efforts would be unavailing. Such superstitious fears ought to have been removed; and that they were not, proved that those who were at the head of the government were unfit to undertake the affairs of a great empire. He would pass over the melancholy event which took place at Barrackpore. He was ready to admit that, the mutiny having broken out, it was necessary that it should be speedily suppressed; if it were not, the Company's power would be at an end, and the army would become a nuisance. But he understood, from military men, that the mutiny might have been put down in a different way; it might have been suppressed without bringing fields of artillery in the rear of those unfortunate soldiers, many of whom had, no doubt, fought and bled in their service. Instead of opening masked batteries against them, would it not have been better by mild means to bring them back to a sense of their duty? He was ready to weep over the fate of those brave old soldiers, and he sincerely wished that a more moderate course had been pursued. It was, after all, but the act of a moment; but what followed? It appeared that the native officers had, on the field, separated from the mutineers: they said, "We will not rebel against those who have fed us so long; let us, therefore, retire." The disobedient men were destroyed; but what was the conduct of government towards the officers who had so well conducted themselves? Instead of rewarding those who withdrew from the mutinous band, the government absolutely punished them. (Hear!) They made no distinction between the innocent and the guilty. (Hear!) They dismissed, with disgrace, every man who had remained true to his colours. (Hear!) He blushed to hear of such a proceeding; in fact, he could not believe it possible, until he saw The Gazette of the 4th of Nov. 1824, four days after the occurrence of this unfortunate transaction; which Gazette, by the way, gave, he understood, any thing but a correct account of what really took place. The article ran on thus:—"That a transaction so unusual in, and disgraceful to, this army, could have been planned and carried into execution without the knowledge, not to say participation, of the native commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the corps, is not for a moment to be credited." The Governor-General in Council consequently considers the 47th regiment of Native Infantry, including its native commissioned and non-commissioned officers, to be disgraced," &c. Here was wisdom! here was justice! Here were men, who stood honourably and firmly to their allegiance, classed with the mutineers, and punished with them! (Hear!) Was it possible, when such imbecility and injustice were manifested by the government, that the least confidence could be placed in it? Confidence, he maintained, was destroyed in the minds both of Englishmen and natives; and he wished that the wisest man in that court could foretell how that act alone would work hereafter on the destiny of their Indian empire. Far different was the conduct of the Duke of Wellington some years ago, when a regiment mutinied on parade, and refused to obey the orders that were issued. If the commander-in-chief had acted on that occasion as the Indian Government had done, what would have been the result? No man could, at that day, have foretold what the consequences might have been. He, therefore, called the attention of the court to this comparison, in order to shew, under circumstances of equal danger, how different was the conduct pursued by the Duke of Wellington from that adopted by the government of India. Was it just, or fair, or prudent, when men had retired from the mutineers, to mix them up in the same punishment with those who had misconducted themselves? Was it fit that they should be treated as if they had been equally implicated in the mutiny? He would answer that part of the paragraph which set forth that the native officers knew what was going on. They knew that discontent existed; but that fact was well known at Calcutta for some days before the mutiny broke out; and he would pledge his honour, from the knowledge he had of the native officers, that they were not not aware that the discontent of the troops would proceed to such an extent. When, during the late Queen's trial, a regiment mutinied at Charing-Cross, what was the conduct of the Duke of Wellington? He rode into the Mews, and put an end to the ferment without the aid of force; the regiment was marched off to Kingston next day, and nothing more was heard of the mutiny. On that occasion the conduct of the commander-in-chief did him the highest honour. But could they expect confidence to be placed in the Indian Government after what had occurred? It was impossible; and the danger was rendered still greater, when it was known that the English officers were also very much dissatisfied. If they could better their situation, he had not the least doubt but that they would do so. The time was now come when the proprietors should no longer remain idle; when they should be fully informed whether any steps had been taken for the better government of India. He believed the general cry throughout that country was, "Let the Marquess of Hastings be sent back to us; he is the man in whom we can place confidence." But, while all India were thus calling for this resumption of power, how lamentable it was to see that illustrious man, to whom all eyes were turned, and towards whom all hands were outstretched, disgraced, as far as he possibly could be disgraced, by that very body who ought to honour and reward him! (Hear!) If the proprietors did their duty, they would cause to be laid before them an account of the proceedings with regard to the army, which had taken place under the administration of the Marquess of Hastings, and those which had been carried into effect since. If they had these documents, they would at once see how the noble Marquess had acted. They would, he doubted not, perceive that he had taken upon himself the responsibility of a soldier; he would not suffer himself to be guided by the instructions of those who were incapable of forming a correct judgment on military matters. It was impossible that the military affairs of India could be regulated by a Board of Control, or a Civil Committee, who knew nothing of the matter. (A laugh.) He repeated, that it was impossible for a body of merchants and bankers, and such, for the most part, were the gentlemen behind the bar, to understand the management of a great military force. There were amongst them, he knew, sea-officers, who were very able men in their own department; and bankers, who kept their accounts very correctly: but what, he asked, did they know about the regulation of an army of 150,000 men? Was it any reflection on them to say, that they were not so skilful in those matters as the Marquess of Hastings? Upon the despatches of 1814, or 1815, relative to the army, arrived in India, what did the Marquess of Hastings do? He ordered a commission of the ablest men, civil and military, to inquire into the allowances of the army, and into the grievances of those parties who alleged that they were oppressed. The opinions thus obtained were sent home to this country; and what was the result? Why, orders were sent out at variance with those opinions and representations. Had the Marquess of Hastings been in India at the time, he would, on his own responsibility, as the preserver of that country, have refused to obey those orders. But Lord Amherst, it appeared, went out with a determination to obey any orders which he might chance to receive, whether wise or unwise. This court had, however, a right to know in what manner those matters had been arranged by the Marquess of Hastings, what orders had been sent out by the Court of Directors, how far they had been carried into effect, and whether those proceedings had tended to estrange the good feelings of the Native and European officers from the service? They had a great duty imposed on them, and that duty they would not discharge, unless all the facts connected with the recent events to which he had called their attention, were fairly unravelled, and the truth elicited by calm and dispassionate investigation. He did not mean to cast indiscriminate blame on any set of persons: but blame there certainly was, and it was right that they should know to whom it ought to attach. If, when the facts were before them, it should be found that he was in error, that he had improperly censured the government of Lord Amherst, he would be the first man to atone for his conduct. But it certainly was necessary that an investigation should take place, and that an end should be put to a system which had produced such calamitous effects in India. The hon. proprietor concluded by moving, "That there be laid before this court, a copy of the military despatch of the Marquess of Hastings, in 1819, to the Secret Department of the Court of Directors, on the organization and allowances of the Bengal army; and a copy of the despatch of the Court of Directors, to the Government in India, in 1823, on that subject; together with a copy of the despatches from India, stating how far their orders had been carried into execution." He should afterwards move for "an account of the extent and cause of the mutiny at Barrackpore, as far as the same can be ascertained."

Mr. S. Dixon said, that, in his opinion, any question of such great moment as that which had been introduced by the hon. proprietor, ought not to be brought forward unless due notice were given to the general court. He thought the hon. proprietor, on further consideration, would feel that, by giving notice, the subject was likely to be more seriously attended to. If this question were pressed to a division by the hon. proprietor, the court would, he conceived, have a right to complain that it was taken by surprise.

Mr. Buckingham begged leave, before the question was put, to offer a few words in illustration of one part of the hon. proprietor's speech, on which, he conceived, he had not laid sufficient stress. To that point he should simply confine himself. The hon. proprietor had stated (but, from the indifference with which that statement was received, it appeared to have very little weight), that the connexion between the suppression of public opinion in India, and the proceedings which he had described, and which now excited the attention of the world, was extremely close. This fact it was not difficult to illustrate. Gentlemen might remember that, during the existence of the censorship of the press, a disturbance broke out in Cuttack, which it took Lord Hastings four months to settle and put down. Now he was prepared to say, that persons holding high situations in India, members of the government themselves, owing to the want of information at that time, were, on the eve of the day when the occurrences at Cuttack were first known, as ignorant of the matter as the child unborn. Here, in addition to the theory, they had a practical proof of the danger of withholding information. The insurrection at Cuttack was the last of a series of disasters which happened in the early part of the administration of Lord Hastings. When his Lordship placed the press on a new footing, and information was allowed to flow in from all quarters, from that moment up to the period of his quitting India, the country presented one scene of public tranquillity and perfect harmony. It was easy to shew how the suppression of public information had given rise to the overt act of mutiny. It appeared that, on this late occasion, great dissatisfaction prevailed amongst the troops: partly from their horror of the climate of Rangoon, and partly from their associating, in their superstitious minds, the idea that the Burmese territory was a land of demons. This dissatisfaction prevailed for more than three weeks before the mutiny broke out. The sepoys, during that time, had meetings, assemblies, debates, and discussions amongst themselves. The reason why these proceedings were not communicated to government might be this: (and he thought persons who had been in India would bear him out in the conjecture)—that subalterns, and even junior civil servants, when they gave information, were considered as officious meddlers, and were rebuked for their pains. These same individuals, who would not put themselves in the front of the battle, as it were, to sustain the odium which would be thrown upon them for giving information to the government, had no objection, but, on the contrary, were extremely desirous, to communicate anonymously to the editors of papers facts of importance; and in this manner, he had no doubt, it would have been publicly made known that dissatisfaction existed amongst the troops. It would be in the recollection of the court, that one of the bad practices which prevailed in the state of Hyderabad was the payment of the troops in deteriorated coin, which created much dissatisfaction on their part. What was the consequence? The information was not communicated to the government through official channels, but through the public papers; and Lord Hastings directed an inquiry to be instituted on the subject. The result was, the correction of the evil, and the restoration of tranquillity. (Hear, hear!) It was not at all forced reasoning to infer, that if no such inquiry had taken place at Hyderabad, and the troops had continued to be paid in depreciated coin, acts of mutiny would have occurred similar to those which have taken place at Barrackpore. It was stated by the hon. chairman, that warnings are essential to be given, and that prevention is better than punishment. If this wisdom had been observed by government on a late occasion, such unfortunate results would not have ensued. Nothing could have been more easy than to institute an inquiry on the subject. If the demands of the sepoys were unreasonable, the court well knew the disposition of the people of India to submit to the will of government. (Hear!) There are no men who can be more easily persuaded to yield obedience to any measure which appeared to have the sanction of the government; but he (Mr. Buckingham) thought that their demands were not only reasonable, but that on the compliance with them depended their efficiency. Nothing could be more false than the economy which applies itself to the saving of a few rupees, which would turn soldiers into porters, and bring them into the field (instead of being in a state fit to meet the enemy) borne down with the weight of their own baggage. (Hear!) The time was not yet arrived for inquiring into the mode of suppressing the mutiny at Barrackpore; but when that time should come, he would be prepared to show that it was a most improper one. He would state another instance of the injury which has resulted from the suppression of public opinion, through the means of the press. All persons who had been resident at Calcutta must know, that trade has long been carried on between that place and Rangoon. It might easily be supposed that ship-masters, pilots, and other persons engaged in this trade, must possess better information concerning the climate, the winds, and the weather at Rangoon, than the servants of the Company. If the press of India had been open, he had no hesitation in saying that a hundred letters would have been written, communicating that information, which the result of the expedition had shewn that the government wanted. But if any man had dared, before the expedition to Rangoon, in the present state of the press, to call in question the wisdom of government with respect to that expedition, he had a living instance of what would have been the fate of him who did so question the wisdom of government. The result of the expedition had shewn, that the ignorance of the government, with respect to the climate, the seasons, and the winds, in the Burmese empire, and to the proper mode of conveying sustenance to troops, had not only led to the sacrifice of hundreds of brave lives, but had thrown a tarnish on the British name, which will not easily be effaced. If the native troops alone had suffered in the expedition, he was greatly afraid that but little sympathy would have been excited on the occasion; but it happens that our own troops have suffered dreadfully. Two British regiments, the 13th and 88th, if he was not mistaken, proceeded to Rangoon in battalions 800 strong; but in consequence of the want of proper sustenance, being compelled to feed upon salt provisions, wading up to their middles in water, and living almost like amphibious animals, whilst the head-quarters were comfortably situated, they had returned to Bengal, one with sixty, and the other with something more than eighty men; and they were in a state of such extreme debility and exhaustion, that it was the opinion of those who saw them that another day's march would have killed them. He hoped that out of this question would arise the consideration, whether it was not better that some arrangement should be come to—even the restoration of the odious censorship—instead of the present abominable system regarding the press, in order that government might obtain information, and public opinion be expressed. If some change should not be resolved on for the sake of the public, let it at least be done for the sake of the government. Under these circumstances, he was most happy to support the motion of the hon. proprietor for the production of papers. It was a case which he conceived required time for deliberation; and he hoped that the court will not be sparing of money in this instance, when they had expended ten or fifteen thousand pounds in printing the Hyderabad papers. The hon. gentleman then sat down, after calling upon the court to support the motion.

Mr. Trant said, it was not his intention to discuss the question of the liberty of the press; but he thought it necessary to make a few observations, in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. proprietor who spoke last. In alluding to the disturbance of Cuttack, the hon. proprietor had stated that the government possessed no previous information on the subject. That happened not to be the fact. He (Mr. Trant) had been ordered to proceed to Cuttack a month before the disturbance took place, because the government was dissatisfied with several things, and particularly with the situation of the revenue department. He merely mentioned that circumstance, in order that the court might not be induced to suppose that the government in India was totally ignorant of what was passing, except through the medium of the press. The hon. proprietor likewise stated, that the inferior officers of the Company, both civil and military, were very much discouraged from making representations to the government on any matters which they might observe arising. He had been very much about the departments of government in India, and he knew that, when he was there, what the hon. proprietor had stated was not the case. Every body who was acquainted with the constitution of the government in India, knew that it was open to all kinds of representations from its officers. (Hear!) He did not, however, mean to deny, that there might be some use in obtaining information in the way which the hon. proprietor had mentioned, namely, through the means of the public press. With respect to the motion before the court, he could not agree that the production of papers was necessary. He thought that the hon. mover had chosen rather an unfortunate moment for bringing forward the subject. He believed that the government was yet hardly furnished with official information relative to the unfortunate transaction which has been alluded to; he would rather at present have left the matter in the hands of those appointed to manage those affairs. He thought the carrying of the motion would be attended with great inconvenience, because some of the papers called for are in the secret department, and could not be produced without the sanction of the government. With respect to the mutiny at Barrackpore, and the mode in which it had been treated, he could not agree in the observations which the hon. mover had made on those points. Those who were versed in the history of India, knew that mutinies of this kind have occurred before. He would go back to an early period, that of Lord Clive's administration, when a mutiny, very similar to that of Barrackpore, occurred; and, he believed, it was treated very much in the same manner. Though not a soldier, he had seen a good deal of the sepoys; and he found it difficult to suppose that a plan of the kind lately exhibited, could have been arranged without the full knowledge of the native officers! (Hear, hear!) He did not think it was sufficient for those officers to have withdrawn from the soldiers after the mutiny

mutiny broke out. It was not correct, however, to state that the officers and the men had been punished both in the same way; the only punishment which the officers had received was their dismissal. There was, he thought, a little difference between being dismissed and shot. (A laugh.) There was one point on which he agreed with the hon. mover, and he was very sorry that he did. (Laughter.) He agreed in the opinion which he had expressed, of the utter want of confidence which is felt in India by all classes, both Europeans and natives, with respect to the present head of the Indian government. It was not often, certainly, that he agreed with the hon. proprietor; but he felt it his duty, standing there as a proprietor, and a person deeply interested in the welfare of India, to declare, that all his information went to confirm every particular which he had stated. (Hear!) He (Mr. Trant) thought the Company stood, at this moment, in a most dangerous situation. He was one of those who, on the appointment of Lord Amherst, rather wondered at the proceeding. He considered that the government of India, far from having become more easy—far from admitting of the superintendence of an individual, who, he thought he might say, was not of great renown for talents or experience, required a man of at least as high talents as the individual who had then just left, or was about to leave, India. (Hear!) He looked upon the appointment of Lord Amherst as one proof, amongst others, that the value and importance of India were but little appreciated in this country. (Hear!) Lord Amherst was, he believed, a very amiable and respectable nobleman; but he has had too little experience of public affairs to enable him to superintend the government of India. It seemed to be generally allowed, that his lordship was not a person fit to conduct a war. The operations commenced and carried on under the present government, proved that the head of it was quite incapable of conducting public affairs. He would utter these sentiments in another place, and wherever he had a voice, until he found that some other person was appointed to administer the affairs of the Company in India. (Hear!) He would still continue the same opinions, even if the Company should get out of the scrape in which they at present were. He knew enough of the Indian government, having had the honour to commence his career under Lord Wellesley, to be aware that an impression had been made in India, which, he feared, no subsequent efforts on the part of any person at the head of the government could remove. He feared that, in consequence of what had passed, their neighbours might be induced to take liberties, which otherwise they would not have done. He thought it became the authorities at home to take into consideration the present state of India; and if they found that mistakes had been committed, and that a person had been placed at the head of affairs who was unfit to remain there, to lose no time in taking those measures which, he believed, the constitution of the government of India places in their hands, to relieve the Company from a state of things, which had already operated in this country and India in a way not to be mistaken. (Hear!) He repeated, that a man of the greatest worth and talents ought to be sent to India to administer affairs there, and that the government of that country required the application of the highest energies, both at home and abroad.

Sir C. Forbes entirely concurred with all that had been stated regarding Lord Amherst; and he rose to express his disappointment, that the motion before the court did not go to the recal of that nobleman. (Hear!) These sentiments were not new on his part. Very early after the meeting of Parliament, he took an opportunity of stating in the House of Commons, that he had hoped the recal of Lord Amherst would have been one of the first measures proposed by Government. He disapproved of the ground on which the Burmese war was undertaken, the time at which it was commenced, and indeed, of every circumstance of Lord Amherst's conduct in India, so far as he had arrived at a knowledge of it. He had nothing to urge against his lordship's private character; he was, by all accounts, a most amiable man. But it was not an amiable, but an able governor-general, that the Company wanted. (Hear, hear!) It seemed to him, that Lord Amherst having got himself into some little discredit by refusing to knock his head on the ground in China, thought it necessary to knock his head against the wall in India, to shew that he was a man of spirit. (A laugh.) It had been said in another place, that one might as readily suppose Lord Amherst to be transformed into a tiger, as a tyrant. He must say that, if Lord Amherst be not a tyrant himself, he has suffered himself to be led by tyrants. As to his being a tiger, he confessed he could not give credit to that: he thought he more resembled another animal which he could mention. (A laugh.) His lordship has entirely lost the confidence of every public man in India, both European and native; and the case is the same in this country, at least with all those who speak out their sentiments. There were many persons in that court, who were deterred from expressing their sentiments in a few plain words, by an unwillingness to present themselves to the notice of the proprietors. He wished that, on the present occasion, the motion had gone to the recal of Lord Amherst; and, indeed, he hoped that measures would still be proposed, proposed, if not here, in another place. All the letters which he had received from Bengal and Bombay (he had received none from Madras), from all ranks and descriptions of persons, civil and military, described his Lordship as totally inefficient. Even ladies wrote to the same effect! (Laughter.) He had in his pocket a letter from a lady, the wife of an officer, now at Rangoon, which he had intended to read to the court, but he would not now take up its time by doing so; he would, however, give it to the public from another place. The letter carried conviction to his mind, as to the correctness of the opinion given by the writer of Lord Amherst's incapacity. He would conclude as he began, by expressing his disappointment that the motion did not go to the recall of the present Governor-General, which he thought offered the only chance of saving the empire of the Company in India. (Hear!)

The Chairman said he would not trouble the court with any observations upon the motion which the hon. baronet wished should have been proposed, but would confine himself to that which was now under discussion; and, in briefly stating the reasons which induced him to oppose it, he hoped he should receive the support of the court. The question which had been brought before them was not new. The Court of Directors, on the 30th of March 1824, came to a resolution that the paper now called for should not be produced. On the 3d of March 1824, the Court of Proprietors called for a great number of papers relative to the Marquess of Hastings' administration (in which was included the despatch in question); the Court of Directors, however, on considering the order, were convinced that it would be highly improper to give publicity to documents in the military department which affected the private feelings and interests of so many individuals, and this opinion was subsequently reported to the Court of Proprietors. He was sure the court would not deem it expedient to do, on this day, what it had been deemed unadvisable to do on a former occasion. If the production of the despatch were considered inconvenient before, it was quite as much so now. The hon. proprietor (Mr. Hume) had gone into details from private sources respecting some recent transactions. He would make no observation upon the hon. proprietor's having brought forward the motion without notice, because that was a quarterly court, at which any question might be discussed without previous notice. (Hear!) It would not, however, be expected that he should follow the hon. proprietor through all the details into which he had entered, but he would confine himself to one or two remarks. The hon. proprietor stated, that the whole of the late unfavourable occurrences in India arose from the state of the press in that country. The hon. proprietor behind him (Mr. Buckingham) contended that the government had no opportunity of getting information but through the press. It was too much, at this time of day, to say that the press being placed under restrictions was the cause of all the misfortune of India, and that the freedom of the press was the only panacea which could be applied. (Hear!) He could enter into no such view of the case. He for one regretted, as every man must, the situation in which India was placed, but he could by no means agree in the view which the hon. proprietor had taken of the case. The hon. proprietor, in bringing forward the motion, had had his opportunity of making a lengthened and argumentative speech, and he (the Chairman) trusted, that he would now consider his object attained and be satisfied. It might be necessary to observe, that the hon. mover had yesterday given notice of a motion in the House of Commons for the production of the same paper; he would then again have an opportunity of speaking fully on the subject, and of giving his advice through the medium of the press to the public. (A laugh.) The hon. proprietor had thought proper to say that the gentlemen behind the bar, being many of them bankers and merchants, were unfit for their situations. It might be so, but he would wish to know what there was in the station of the hon. proprietor, which made him the only judge of what was fit to be done. (Hear, hear!) It was, he thought, but fair, that the hon. proprietor, before he ventured so unhesitatingly to incapacitate others, should state how it happened that he, and he alone, knew what ought to be done. The name of a noble lord had been introduced into the discussion; he would make no comparison between that noble lord and his predecessor: the question which the court had to consider was, whether it were expedient that Lord Hastings' despatch relative to the reorganization of the army should be produced; the present, at all events, was not the proper moment for laying the despatch before the court. It was, however, too much to say that the Court of Directors had crippled the efficiency of the army! It was doubly inexpedient to say so at the present time, when they wanted the cordial assistance of the army. And when, in fact, they had so greatly ameliorated the condition of their officers. (Hear, hear!) An hon. proprietor (Mr. Buckingham) had given a very melancholy account of the state of two regiments which had returned to Bengal. He could only say that no information had reached the Court of Directors, through official channels or private sources, which could bear out the hon. proprietor's allegation.

allegation. Under these circumstances he thought he was justified in questioning the accuracy of the statement until it should receive confirmation. (Hear!) He believed that the disasters which our troops had sustained were to be attributed more to the climate than to the efforts of the enemy. So far as the enemy was concerned, the success of our troops had been brilliant; and he hoped that a future campaign would be still more fortunate. The present was not a proper time to enter into details concerning the conduct of the government; and therefore he should abstain from doing so, and conclude by calling on the court to negative the motion. (Hear, hear, hear!)

Mr. Edmonstone felt himself called on to address a few words to the court, in consequence of some observations which had been made in the course of the debate respecting the press. The hon. chairman had alluded to the subject in a manner which he had no doubt must have been satisfactory to the court at large. The statements which had been made with regard to the press by two hon. proprietors were altogether without foundation. He thought it would be quite sufficient to disprove the allegation of those gentlemen (that the late unfortunate events in India were to be ascribed to the want of a free press), to advert to what was perhaps the most brilliant period of Indian history: he would ask whether Lord Wellesley's administration, distinguished as it was for admirable military achievements as well as political arrangements, was not the only period during which the censorship of the press had existed? (Hear!) He was wrong in saying that Lord Wellesley's administration was the only period in which the censorship of the press had prevailed; for it also existed during that part of Lord Hastings' administration which embraced the triumphant events of the Pindarry war. The most brilliant and fortunate period of Indian history was precisely that in which the censorship of the press had existed. If any effect was to be attributed to the freedom of the press while it did exist, he would say that it had a tendency to encourage insubordination. He did not say that the late melancholy occurrence of the mutiny in India was the consequence of that temporary freedom of the press; but he did assert that the licentiousness of the press had a tendency to produce insubordination in India, and actually had produced it. It had been justly observed by an hon. proprietor, that the government in India possessed the means of obtaining all the information requisite to enable them to conduct the public affairs, of a much superior nature to that which they could procure through the medium of a newspaper. He was satisfied that the establishment of the unlimited freedom of the press in India would be the first step towards the ruin of our empire there. (Hear!)

Mr. Wasborough said, that he would not long occupy the time of the court; but as the hon. mover had made some statements, which, if allowed to go forth to the public without contradiction, might be supposed to be facts, he begged to be allowed to offer a few observations. It might be known, from what had passed on a former occasion, that he was connected with the public press. The subject of the press had been introduced on the present occasion; if the present were a proper time for discussing that question, he should be prepared to meet the advocates of a free press, and to endeavour to satisfy the court that view of the subject was incorrect. He had read in several public papers a statement that the late mutiny at Barrackpore extended to 6,000 men. That was not correct: the whole body of troops amounted to 6,000, and out of these only 600 mutinied. It had been said that masked batteries were suddenly opened upon the mutineers. That likewise was incorrect: the fact was, that during two days the officers had been occupied in endeavouring to bring the refractory troops back to their duty, and they were not fired upon in an inhuman manner. The hon. mover had stated that 250 men had deserted out of a body of 100. (A laugh.) That was not an extraordinary instance of desertion. He knew that, during the late war, when some regiments were marching from Ireland, 150 had deserted out of 1,000. The hon. mover had contrasted the Duke of Wellington's conduct to some refractory troops in London, with that which had been pursued towards the troops at Barrackpore. He (Mr. Wasborough) was present on the occasion when the Duke of Wellington proceeded to the King's Mews, and ordered the regiment to march for Ireland. The Duke did not stop five minutes with the troops; they marched off immediately; they felt and knew that they were disgraced. Now, with respect to the press, it might not be known that the press in this country was subject to the most strict laws and regulations. No man in this country could possess a press without sending notice to a magistrate; no man could print a newspaper without entering his name at the stamp-office, and giving two securities that he would not be guilty of certain offences; if a man here should be a second time found guilty of publishing a libel, he might be, not transported, but banished. If the regulations which prevailed in India with respect to the press were to be compared with the laws which existed in this country on the same subject, there would be found a remarkable coincidence between them.

Mr. Buckingham.—“On a man's licence cense he taken away from him in this country without trial?"

Mr. Washborough said, he must admit that in this country an individual must be tried and convicted before he could be punished; but when the question of the press should come properly before the court, he would meet the hon. proprietor upon it in a fair and manly manner, as a man of his character ought to be met. He had often heard of the hon. proprietor as a man of talent. He might differ from him in opinion, but he would meet him tranquilly and fairly, face to face. The hon. proprietor had spoken of anonymous communications being sent to the newspapers. Such communications were made in great numbers. When they merely expressed opinions, they were entitled to the weight, more or less, which they might deserve; but if he received a communication stating a fact, he would throw it into the fire, unless it were accompanied with the name of the writer. (Hear!) He held in his hand an extract from a French paper, which it might not be improper to read to the court. [The hon. proprietor here read the extract, which spoke of our empire in India as a despotism.] Persons should be extremely careful of what they stated, when they saw that there were channels through which every thing which was stated was conveyed to every part of the world. He regretted to have seen it stated, that troops to the amount of 6,000 had mutined at Barrackpore.

Mr. Hume.—"That is your own statement."

Mr. Washborough. He begged the hon. proprietor's pardon, he had read it in a morning paper. He concluded with expressing his intention to vote against the motion.

Mr. Hume observed, that the hon. proprietor who had just sat down appeared altogether to have forgot what he was about. He rose to correct some errors into which he said he (Mr. Hume) had fallen, and then he proceeded to correct the blunders of the newspapers. He (Mr. Hume) had said nothing about 6,000 men having mutinied. The hon. proprietor next said, that he (Mr. Hume) had declared that 250 men had deserted out of 100. He was not quite so much of an Irishman as to have done that. (Laugh.) He hoped that when the hon. proprietor had longer experience of him, he would not find him tripping in the way he had imagined. With respect to the question of the press, he had no objection to meet the hon. proprietor. All that he wanted for India was that privilege which the hon. proprietor admitted existed here—that of not being liable to transportation without trial. An hon. director had attributed the happy state of Indian affairs at a particular period to the existence of the censorship of the press. He had never heard a more monstrous proposition put forth; that was, indeed, jumping to a conclusion. But the hon. director went further; he said that the licentiousness of the press had produced mutiny among the troops. If it had done so, he (Mr. Hume) knew nothing of the history of India. It had likewise been stated by the hon. director, that he (Mr. Hume) desired the unlimited freedom of the press. On that point he was also in error. He wished the press in India to be placed on the same footing that it was in England. In England, it was true, a man was obliged to register his types and presses; but he could not be deprived of his property and banished without undergoing trial. These were all the observations which he thought it necessary to make respecting what had fallen from the hon. director. From what the hon. Chairman had said, it might be supposed that they were talking in March 1824, instead of 1825. The hon. Chairman said, that he would not enter upon the consideration of the details which he (Mr. Hume) had brought forward. He thought that if the hon. Chairman had it in his power to contradict them he would. It was moved on the 3d of March 1824, that the despatch which he now wished to have produced should be laid before the court; and what was the objection? That it was in no way connected with the Hyderabad papers; on that ground it was withheld. Circumstances had altered since 1824. At that time it was not known whether the army was well or ill-used; the effect of the treatment of the army on the minds of the natives was not known. The change of circumstances rendered it necessary to call for the document, in order that it might be seen whether any regulations had been carried into effect in opposition to what the Marquess of Hastings had recommended. The hon. Chairman said that he (Mr. Hume) had spoken of himself as the only person capable of governing India. He had done no such thing; all that he said was, that after Lord Hastings, acting upon the advice of a committee of able men, had proposed certain regulations for the benefit of the army, the Court of Directors repealed them. It was very unfair to attribute to him the arrogating to himself the right to be considered the only person capable of governing India. The hon. Chairman also stated, that he (Mr. Hume) had asserted that all the evils of India were occasioned by the suppression of the freedom of the press. He had only said that the suppression of the press was attended with evil consequences, of which one was depriving Government of necessary information. He thought that the immediate cause of the present unfortunate posture of affairs in India was the imbecility of the

the government. His hon. friend (Sir C. Forbes) had expressed a desire that he should move for the recall of the Governor-General. The reason that he did not do so was, that he thought others were implicated besides his lordship. He thought that the council were to blame, whom the court, by its last vote, had applauded as able and intelligent men. He was glad that he had dissented from that vote; for it was partly the imbecility of the council which had led to the present state of circumstances in India. He was of opinion that the time must very speedily come when it would be found necessary to propose the recall of the Governor-General; but he would not wish to propose a motion to that effect until he had information before him in an official manner. On those grounds, he thought that he was doing right in calling for the despatch, in order to enable hon. proprietors to form a correct judgment on the subject. He regretted the indifference which appeared to prevail on so important a subject, and that he had received no satisfactory answer from the Chair. He appealed to the court whether it was proper to sit silent whilst such unfortunate transactions were going on in India. Warnings had been given, and warnings were considered of great importance. Let the consequences be on those whose duty it was to attend to Indian affairs: no person had been assigned for not granting the information. For these reasons he felt himself called upon to take the cause of the court upon the question.

Mr. Trant begged to say one word in explanation. He had supposed that the papers were moved for in reference to the late mutiny. The hon. proprietor had said, that the council ought to be censured for their conduct with regard to recent transactions. The hon. proprietor, he supposed, had Mr. John Adams in his eye; but he could inform him that that respectable individual had no share in those transactions; he was, with respect to them,

Mr. Edmonstone desired permission to explain. He said, that he had been misunderstood on one or two points by the hon. mover. The hon. gentleman seemed to think, that he (Mr. Edmonstone) had attributed the success of the administration in India, at the period to which he had alluded, to the control which was then exercised over the press. He certainly expressed no such opinion. All that he meant to say was, that the most brilliant period of Indian administration, both civil and military, was precisely that during which the censorship of the press prevailed. He drew no inference from the fact, such as the hon. gentleman had attributed to him. The hon. gentleman had also asserted, that he (Mr. Edmonstone) had stated, that the licentiousness of the press had produced the mutiny which had been alluded to. It was in the recollection of the court, that he set out with saying, that he did not mean to attribute that unfortunate occurrence to such a cause. (Hear!) He merely said, that the licentiousness of the press had a tendency to produce insubordination, and that it actually had produced it.

Mr. Washborough observed, that in this country the types and presses of any person, who had not registered himself as a printer, might be seized.

Mr. Mills said, that he had waited till that period of the discussion; in the hope that some older member of the court would rise to protect the character of an absent individual. He thought substantial justice would not be done to Lord Amherst, if his character were not defended from the attacks which had been made upon it, and the court owed it to his lordship themselves to do so. (Hear!) No official details respecting the late transactions was yet before the court. He believed he might say, that the court-martial which had been alluded to, was not yet finished at the date of the last advices; at all events, the result of the court of inquiry was not known. That court, he understood, continued to sit subsequent to the date of the proclamation, which had been read. Gentlemen were desirous that efficient governor-general should proceed to India; but, in his opinion, the remarks which had been made in that court, in the present as well as in a very recent discussion, were calculated to prevent, rather than encourage, men of great talent from undertaking the office of governor-general. (Hear!) He was sure that English gentlemen could have but one wish, and that was, to do substantial justice. He was willing that Lord Amherst should stand or fall by his own acts; but let him not be condemned in ignorance of what his conduct had been.

Mr. Gahagan rose to protest against the doctrine laid down by the hon. director who spoke last—that the conduct of the Indian government was not to be commented on, because the court was not possessed of full information respecting it. It was in the nature of things that intelligence from India should come before the public currente die; and it was natural that it should call forth observation as it appeared. It was said, too, that Lord Amherst was absent; was it meant to be contended that his conduct was not to be made the subject of comment, because he did not happen to be in London? Such an argument was positively absurd. Whilst he was on his legs, he might be allowed to say that he intended to vote against the motion. His reason for doing so, was this. The hon. proprietor (Mr. Hume) had stated that he intended to move for the same papers which the motion called for in the House of Commons. He would abide by what parliament in its wisdom might do. (Hear!) He would wait till to-morrow night, and submit to the wisdom of parliament, because he must do so. (A laugh.)

General Thornton could not remain silent after what had fallen from an hon. director (Mr. Mills). The hon. director said, that the observations which had been made upon Lord Amherst were calculated to prevent men of great talents from going to India. He (Gen. T.) thought that they were rather calculated to prevent men who did not possess great talents from going there. (A laugh.) He believed Lord Amherst to be a perfect gentleman, and a most amiable character; but he had never heard that he was reckoned a man of great ability; he never met with any one who knew Lord Amherst that said he was a person of eminent talents. If remarks made in that court should prevent men of moderate talent from proceeding to India, he thought they would be productive of great good. (Hear!) The time was come, when it was necessary that proprietors should speak out. India was in a state of great danger, in consequence of the mismanagement which had prevailed since Lord Hastings retired from the government. There appeared to be a want of confidence in Lord Amherst all over the world. The Court of Directors ought to know, and they did know, how matters stood, but they had not courage to speak out; he had hoped that they would. With respect to the question of the press, he believed it would be impossible for the government of India to obtain good information on certain points, without the liberty of the press. Evidence of the soundness of this argument might be found in the Hyderabad papers. It there appeared, that the Rajah Chundoo Loll requested the Resident at Hyderabad, to forward a complaint to the Supreme Government. The complaint was not forwarded as requested; and the Supreme Government remained in ignorance of the transaction. This could not have happened if the press had been open. How then could it be said that the government could obtain full information, when such tricks as that which he had alluded to were practised? It did not appear that either the government at Calcutta, or the authorities at home, were aware of the conduct of the resident, until some time after. He had in his pocket a motion relative to the conduct of residents which he had intended to have submitted to the court, had not the present discussion occupied so much time. He had doubts respecting the propriety of granting the liberty of the press; but if residents were allowed to keep back communications from the government, in order that they might continue their oppressions, he would then think the freedom of the press most necessary.

Mr. Mills had thought that, in what he had said, he could not have been misunderstood; he wished not to state his opinion of Lord Amherst's merits, but to deprecate the agitation of the question at all at that moment. He had particularly alluded to the cavillings against a distinguished character on a recent occasion.

Mr. Hume said, that if the hon. director considered Lord Amherst to be a man of ability, he was bound to defend him. He could only say that he thought he was quite the contrary. But the hon. director had said that the court-martial was not concluded—

Mr. Mills.—“I meant the court of inquiry.”

Mr. Hume—He was informed that it had not only closed, but that, by their recommendation, a great number of sepoys of the rank of brahmins had been compelled to work on the roads; a circumstance which had produced a greater sensation in Bengal than any thing which had occurred for a long period. (Hear!) He considered that a very ill-judged proceeding. It would have been better to shoot them,—that would have been a military death. The fact of setting men of the rank of brahmins to work on the roads, had produced a most unfavourable impression against the British government, throughout the native population. His hon. friend (Mr. Galagan) did not seem to perceive the difference between the members of that court, as part of the public, and as proprietors. It was true that they might obtain the information from another quarter, but it was their duty to demand its production in that court.

Mr. Dixon wished to ask a question of the Chairman. Had the Governor-general unlimited power to act in matters of importance, or was he bound to act by the advice of his council?

The Chairman. As the hon. proprietor had done him the honour to propose a question to him, he would endeavour to answer it. The government of Bengal was that of a Governor-General in Council; the members of the council had each equally a vote with the Governor-General; by an act of parliament, the Governor-General might perform certain acts on his own responsibility.

Mr. Dixon said he was never to be deterred from asking for information. His reason for asking the question was this—that, if the Governor-General had not absolute power, it would be wrong to blame him for acts which he had not the power to prevent.

The Chairman, before he put the question, begged to state, for the information of the court, that if parliament should think fit to grant the papers on the hon. proprietor's motion, they would, as a matter of course, be laid before the proprietors. That formed, in his opinion, a further and conclusive argument against the present motion.

Mr. Hume begged to observe, that if parliament should not consent to his motion, the court would be without the information which it ought to possess. (Hear!)

The Chairman observed, that was very true; he hoped that parliament would not accede to the motion; he should himself vote against it. But he would ask why, if parliament would not grant the papers, that court should be expected to do so? (Hear, hear!)

The motion was then put and negatived.

Mr. Hume then moved for "copies of all communications from India to the Court of Directors respecting the late mutiny, and the proceedings of the Government thereon."

The motion having been seconded—

Mr. Trant rose to say a word or two with respect to Lord Amherst's conduct. He had been induced to speak out respecting the conduct of his lordship, only by the overwhelming opinion which prevailed amongst persons of every description, of the utter inefficiency of his lordship's government. Every letter from India concurred in this opinion. He had no wish to do injustice to any person; but he felt it his duty as an honest man to declare, that people in India had not that confidence in the head of the government which it was desirous they should have.

Sir C. Forbes said, that, from further consideration, he would take the liberty of reading a part of a letter from the lady of an officer, to which he had before alluded. The hon. baronet then read an extract. It stated that disaffection had spread widely amongst the native troops, and that the ridiculous system of economy so much in vogue in this country would not do for India. (Much laughter.) It added, that one would have thought that the government had had experience enough of the folly of interfering with the prejudices of the natives, as it had done in the case of the expedition to Rangoon. When he before addressed the court (the hon. baronet proceeded), he had stated that he had received letters from Bombay and Bengal, but none from Madras, which enabled him to declare what was the state of feeling in that presidency with regard to Lord Amherst. Since that time he had been informed by an hon. proprietor, who he was sorry to perceive had left the court, that he had received letters from Madras fully confirming all that was stated in the letters from Bengal. But it was not on the authority of private letters alone that he would condemn Lord Amherst; he founded his opinion on the orders issued by the Governor-General after the mutiny. He condemned his lordship's conduct on his own statement. He hoped that measures would speedily be taken for his lordship's recall; and he wished that some expression had fallen from persons in authority, which would leave it to be supposed that such a proceeding was in contemplation. He wished to give the authorities at home credit for having such an intention, though he believed they would be puzzled to know whom to send to succeed Lord Amherst. The situation of Governor-General was a most arduous and difficult one. A man ought to be selected to fill the situation who was best qualified for it; and such a man, he thanked God, the country possessed. A man's political opinions should be matter of no consideration; the man most competent to fill the situation should be selected; be he of what party he might. He had no doubt such a man might be found; and he hoped that this disagreeable subject would be soon put an end to by the recall of Lord Amherst.

Captain Maxfield rose to oppose the motion, because he did not think it proper that the information should be sent forth to every part of Great Britain.

Mr. Hume said, that it would appear that the gallant officer did not deny the fact of the existence of an evil, but refused to grant the information by which the evil could be prevented in future. If such a principle were adopted, there would be an end of all correction of abuse. With respect to the conduct of Lord Amherst, the letter which had been read by the hon. Baronet (Sir C. Forbes) was much to the point. It showed that there was a line beyond which the reduction of the expenses of a service could not be carried with comfort to individuals or security to the government. The object of his motion was to bring before the court the petty huckstering reductions carried into effect by Lord Amherst, which the noble spirit of Lord Hastings would have scorned. He (Mr. Hume) thought that every useless expense should be curtailed, but would not deprive the labourer of his hire.

The Chairman said he would not trouble the court with any observations, but merely put the question.

The question was then put, and carried in the negative.

CONDUCT OF RESIDENTS.

Gen. Thornton gave notice that, at the next quarterly court, he would submit a motion relative to the suppression of communications intended for the Supreme Government Government by Residents at the Court of Native Princes.

The Chairman wished to mention, before he put the question of adjournment, that the Vizier which had been agreed to that day for granting a pension to Sir John Malcolm, and for the appointment of a first-assistant to the Surveyor, must be confirmed by a subsequent court. He could not then fix the day for calling the court, because there were one or two bills before parliament which he wished should be laid before the court on the same occasion, and the time of this being in a fit stage for the purpose was uncertain.

Mr. Hume gave notice that, at the next court, he would submit a motion respecting the conduct of Lord Amherst and his council.

The Chairman observed, that the court could not be made special upon the proprietor's motion, in its present form.

Mr. Trant said that the notice of the gallant general being for a quarterly court was sufficient, and would, as a matter of course, lie on the table.

THE OUDE PAPERS.

Sir C. Forbes asked when it might be expected that the papers ordered to be printed for the use of the proprietors, respecting Lord Hastings' administration, more particularly as regarded certain transactions in the kingdom of Oude, would be laid before the court.

The Chairman said, he could not give a precise answer to the question. The discussion which had recently taken place respecting Lord Hastings, had interrupted the course of the publication of the papers. For his own part, he thought that the proprietors had already had papers enough on the subject; but that was a matter for the court to decide upon. He merely threw it out as a hint, that the production of the papers was unnecessary, and that the expense of putting them forth might be spared.

Sir G. A. Robinson, who had just entered the court, asked Sir C. Forbes to repeat his question, which the hon. bart. did.

Sir G. A. Robinson then said, that concerning the papers in question, he was not sufficiently informed to be able to satisfy the hon. bart as to the state of forwardness in which they were. He understood that they were under the hand of the printer; but he must confess that, after the very lengthened discussion which had taken place upon the subject of the Hyderabad papers, the disposition of his mind would rather be to obtain the sanction of the court to the putting a stop to the printing of any more documents: he thought that there had already been sufficient expense and discussion on the subject of Lord Hastings' administration. With respect to that administration, laying aside the Hyderabad transaction, he was as ready as any one to give his lordship full credit for its great efficiency and the singular advantages which resulted from it. (Hear!) It was only on account of the Hyderabad transactions that he refused to concur in the proposition which was made for voting to Lord Hastings a further pecuniary allowance; but when his lordship published an exposé of his administration, in which he stated broadly that the assistance which he obtained from the Vizier of Oude was gratuitous, that statement formed a further objection to the proposition to which he had alluded; for he knew that it had been distinctly stated in a committee of the House of Commons by a highly-respectable gentleman (Col. Baillie), that the assistance rendered by the Vizier was not gratuitous, but was, on the contrary, induced by a great deal of skill and negotiation. Under these circumstances, he moved for the production of the Oude papers, as calculated to explain the transaction. The question, however, with respect to the Hyderabad transactions having been decided, he should be very sorry if any other subject were introduced which might produce a difference of opinion with respect to his lordship's merits on other points. He should therefore propose, that the vote for printing the Oude papers should be rescinded.

Mr. Hume hoped, that in justice the resolution to which the court had agreed on a former occasion would not be rescinded, except on good grounds, and until after due notice had been given of the intention to do so. With respect to the Hyderabad question, he must say that, so far from thinking it had been set at rest, he considered it only just begun. (A laugh.) Injustice had been done, not only to Lord Hastings but to others; but he trusted that the injustice would not be final. It must be in the recollection of the court when the papers in question were ordered to be printed, and they were not yet produced; means must have been taken to keep them back, contrary to the wishes of the court. The papers had been in the press four months, and the Court of Directors ought to answer to the public for not having produced them.

Sir G. A. Robinson observed, that he considered the object of the motion which was made a few days ago was to acquit Lord Hastings of any thing like corrupt practices: that motion having been agreed to, he thought the question was set at rest with respect to his lordship. He was perfectly aware that memorials from the house of Palmer and Co. were pending, and that the whole of the proceedings which had taken place regarding that house, must come under consideration; he did not mean to say that the question respecting Palmer and Co. was concluded, but but merely the question with regard to Lord Hastings, upon which so much debate had taken place.

Mr. Pattison thought, that as the papers had been ordered to be produced, and as his lordship had been apprized of that fact, it would not be quite correct to rescind the resolution without consulting his lordship on the subject.

Colonel Baillie begged leave to say a few words on the subject of those papers, in which he certainly felt a deep interest, though he was neither the mover nor seconder of the original motion for their production. There were two points in the exposé of Lord Hastings' administration on which he entertained an opinion directly opposite to his lordship's. One of his lordship's statements he had felt himself called upon to contradict in another place, while under an official examination; and having done so, he thought it his duty, on a former occasion in this court, to rise in his place and demur to the accuracy of the statement in question. On that occasion he expressed his hope and belief that Lord Hastings would, on reconsideration, admit the inaccuracy of the statement contained in his lordship's exposé; and the papers would be moved for to be taken into consideration in the proper point of view. The consequence of his (Col. Baillie's) observation, his hon. friend (Sir G. A. Robinson) had thought it proper to move for those papers; and the motion, though not seconded by him (Col. Baillie), had, nevertheless, his most cordial assent. Lord Hastings had stated in his pamphlet that the Vizier's government, previously to his lordship's assuming the government of India, had been held in a state of painful and degrading thralldom, inconsistent with the spirit of the treaty subsisting between the two states; and that a spontaneous offer of one or two millions of money, as a tribute or loan to the Company, was the consequence of his lordship's undertaking to release the Vizier from that thralldom. Now he (Col. Baillie) would take upon himself to affirm, in opposition to the statement of Lord Hastings, that the Vizier's government was never held in any such thralldom, and that the loan of two millions to the Company was by no means voluntary nor spontaneous, but was negotiated by himself (Col. Baillie) under most arduous and difficult circumstances, as he had no doubt would be proved to the court if ever those papers should be before them. It was therefore impossible for him to feel a wish that the papers should be withheld, though at the same time he was free to confess that their production seemed of less consequence now than when the motion was originally submitted; in as far as the general question of Lord Hastings' administration in India had been set at rest by the decision of the court. He could have wished, however, for obvious reasons, that the proposition of his hon. friend, to rescind the former vote of the court, to the publication of those papers, had been deferred till some future opportunity, when it might be made in the presence and with the concurrence of the hon. proprietors, who had so ably and zealously advocated the noble marquess's cause.

Mr. Trant wished the motion to be withdrawn.

The Chairman said, there was no motion before the court.

Mr. Campbell took that opportunity of observing, that something had fallen from the hon. proprietor which might lead the public to suppose that the government had issued orders for reducing the allowance of the sepoy. He could take upon himself to state that no such orders had been issued. (Hear!) The government had actually ordered a sum of 4,000 rupees to be advanced to each battalion, to enable them to procure necessaries for their march. He had thought it right to say so much, lest any misunderstanding should prevail on the subject.

Mr. Hume said, that what he had stated was this: that when a representation was made to government of the unpleasant circumstances in which the sepoy were placed with respect to European officers, a despatch was sent in answer, recommending a reduction of the allowances of the native troops. He had in his possession a paper, which was said to be a copy of a remonstrance from Sir E. Paget, against carrying those orders into effect.

Mr. Campbell wished to know whether the hon. gent. meant to say that any reduction of the allowances of the sepoy had taken place.

Mr. Hume admitted, as we understood, that it was not the case.

The Chairman said, that although the conversation had already been carried to an inconvenient length, he could not avoid saying a few words. If it was meant to be asserted that any despatch had been sent from the home-authorities which could have the effect of crippling the efforts of the native army, he must most positively deny the assertion. Nothing could be less true than that any orders had proceeded from this house which were calculated to affect the comforts of the sepoy; on the contrary, every thing had been done to increase their comforts. (Hear!)

Mr. Hume repeated that the orders sent out had produced the effect which he had attributed to them.

Mr. Weeding, having been the individual who presented the motion of an hon. bart., Sir Chas. Forbes, for the printing of the Oude papers, asked when they were likely to be delivered. If they bore any resemblance to the political papers which had been already printed, he should be sorry if they were not produced; for he was sure that much advantage had resulted from the publication of the Hyderabad papers. The character and interests of the East-India Company stood on higher ground since they were made known to the public. He agreed with the learned proprietor, Mr. Jackson, who had said, at a former meeting of the court, that as the members of the profession to which he belonged commonly recommended to the student of law to read Blackstone, so, in future time, the governors of India would desire the young civilian to read the Hyderabad papers. And as the hon. member for Montrose had thought fit to state, that if the Oude papers made in favour of the Marquess of Hastings, it might be a reason why they had not been produced. He (Mr. Weeding), and those who differed with the hon. member on the subject of the late Governor-General, must more strongly desire that they should be no longer withheld.

The Chairman said, that the question proposed by the hon. proprietor had been before put and answered. The collection of papers alluded to had been made some time since, and sent to the printers. They were in progress of printing; and after the discussion which had that day taken place, they would be produced as early as possible. In reference to this subject, the hon. proprietor (Mr. Hume) had a second time made an attack upon individuals who had the honour to sit behind the bar. He had stated that official interference had taken place to prevent the publication of the papers. He scorned such an imputation, and indignantly repelled it. (Hear!) The late discussion respecting the conduct of Lord Hastings, had interfered very much with the business of the house; but when he stated that the papers were in the hands of the printer, he had said enough to defend himself from the charge made by the hon. proprietor. (Hear!)

Mr. Hume said that the papers might have been printed in a month, and he could not understand why they had not yet been finished, unless orders had been given to retard them.

Mr. Dixon hoped it would go forth to the public that no orders had been sent from the Home Government to curtail the allowances of the troops in India. It was most dangerous to make such an assertion.

Mr. Trant said, that, if he had not mistaken the hon. proprietor (Mr. Weeding), he had mentioned that the friends of Lord Hastings did not wish the Oude papers to be produced: that was not the case.

Mr. Weeding said, that he mentioned no such thing.

Mr. Pattison said, it had been asserted that orders had been issued for curtailing the allowances of the sepoys; that should be most distinctly denied—no such orders had been issued; he hoped there was an end of that subject. A discussion had been going on respecting the printing of certain papers. He had not the honour to be a friend of the Marquess of Hastings, though he had been his advocate on a late occasion, because he felt that it was his duty to be so. The Chairman, however, had told the court that the papers would be produced; and therefore, he hoped, there would be an end of that subject also. (Hear!)

The Chairman then proposed that the court should adjourn, which was agreed to.

Adjourned at half-past three o'clock.

East-India House, April 27.

A Special General Court of Proprietors of East India Stock was this day held, at the Company's House, in Leadenhall-street.

The usual routine business having been gone through,

The Chairman (C. Marjoribanks, Esq.) acquainted the proprietors, that the court was specially summoned for the purpose of submitting for confirmation the resolution of the general court of the 23d ultimo, approving the resolution of the Court of Directors of the 26th January last, for the appointment of a person in the capacity of first-assistant in the office of surveyor of buildings, at a salary of £350 per annum. He therefore should move, "that the court do confirm the said resolution."—Agreed to unanimously.

PENSION TO SIR J. MALCOLM.

The Chairman—"I have now to acquaint the court, that it is also specially summoned for the purpose of submitting for confirmation, the resolution of the general court of the 23d ultimo, approving the resolution of the Court of Directors of the 5th January last, granting to Major-General Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., a pension of £1,000 per annum, on the grounds therein stated. I now move that this court do confirm the said resolution."

The motion having been seconded by the Deputy Chairman (Sir G. A. Robinson),

Sir G. Forbes rose and said, he was not present at the last general court, when this proposition was submitted to the consideration of the proprietors. On that occasion it was, he understood, carried nemine contradicente; and he now offered himself to the court for the purpose of expressing his most cordial approbation of the measure. Leaving out of the question, the well-known general merits of Sir J. Malcolm, he would say that, if he had performed no other service for the Company beyond his celebrated arrangement with the Peishwa, he deserved their utmost praise. By that arrangement, the Peishwa was induced to put an end to the war, and to surrender his territories to the Company; thereby affording the only means of effectually securing the Company against future aggression. For the manner in which Sir J. Malcolm had conducted that negotiation, and also for the just way in which he had acted towards the Peishwa, in apportioning the necessary allowance to be made to the prince, he most fully deserved the pension which it was now proposed to bestow upon him. When it was recollected that, by Sir J. Malcolm's arrangement, a considerable accession of power was given to the Company, it surely could not but be considered that an allowance of eight lacs of rupees was a very moderate compensation. He thought it right to offer his opinion on this point, because he understood that the arrangement was not well received in a high quarter in India, and that it was not altogether approved of in this country. But he would maintain, that Sir J. Malcolm deserved the gratitude of the Company for his arrangement on the occasion to which he alluded. He did not mean to enter into the policy of that war. With that, Sir J. Malcolm had nothing to do; but, most unquestionably, the sooner it was put an end to the better was it for the Company. They had proofs before them of what might have been the consequence, if a different line of conduct had been pursued by Sir J. Malcolm. The Rajah, who had not been treated in the same way, was now under the protection of Runjeet Sing, and would, he was persuaded, endeavour to assert his rights on the very first opportunity. From a very early period of his life, he had known the character of Sir J. Malcolm, and he had always viewed him as an able officer, and a most excellent man.

General Thornton said, that, though he had before expressed his sentiments on this subject, he could not let the present opportunity pass without declaring his hearty concurrence in the resolution now before them. He hoped most sincerely that Sir J. Malcolm would be again actively employed. His talents civil and military, stood as high as those of any man he ever heard of, and he trusted they would not be lost to the Company and to the country in general: he hoped he would be again actively employed, and that he would achieve deeds which, while they benefited his country, would immortalize his name.

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

BILL TO REGULATE THE SALARIES OF THE JUDGES OF INDIA, &c.

The Chairman.—“I have now to acquaint this court, that it is further summoned for the purpose of laying before the proprietors, agreeably to the by-law, cap. 1, sect. 4., the draft of a bill now before Parliament, the title of which shall be read.”

The clerk then read the title as follows:—“A Bill for further regulating the Payment of the Salaries to the Judges of his Majesty's Courts in India, and the Bishop of Calcutta; for authorizing the Transportation of Offenders from the Island of St. Helena; and for providing for the Administration of Justice in Singapore and Malacca, and in certain Possessions on the Coast of Coromandel, and in the Northern Circars.”

Mr. Coghlan said, he could not let this measure pass quite sub silentio; and he hoped the court would excuse him, if, on this occasion, he addressed himself almost personally to their late Chairman (Mr. Aschell). That hon. gentleman was a member of the House of Commons; and he did confess, that he felt considerable surprise when he found that that hon. director and other members of the court, who also had seats in Parliament, had suffered this bill to go through so many stages sub silentio. He said this at hazard, because all that was done in the house might not be made public through the medium of the newspapers: observations might, therefore, have been made in the committee, of which he was not at present aware. The title of a bill, and the manner in which different matters were mixed up in it, might to some appear to be circumstances of no importance; but, in a legal point of view, they appeared to him to be of very great importance. Sir M. W. Ridley, an independent and intelligent member of parliament, had given notice of a motion for arranging and classifying the different acts of parliament; much inconvenience was experienced in consequence of their not being so classified; and not long since the Lord Chancellor, one of the first law authorities in the country, had complained of the strange concoction of different acts of parliament. He begged of the court to examine, for a moment, the title of the present bill: it was so extraordinary, that the public newspapers had noticed it. He was glad they had done so, since it proved that other persons thought on the subject as he did. In the title of the bill they would find judges and pickpockets, housebreakers, and bishops, associated together. (Hear?) Suppose that, at some future time, a judge demanded of a barrister, “do you know under what act offenders are transported from St. Helena?” would it not be a very ludicrous, but a very true answer, if he said

"Yes, my lord: under the same act which regulates the salary of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta?" (Alaugh.) The president of the Board of Control was a lawyer; his two coadjutors were lawyers; and yet, strange to say, those gentlemen drew up this bill, and asked for it the sanction of the House of Commons. What would be said, if he were a member of the House of Commons, and when the bill, of which notice was given, for making provision for the Irish Catholic Clergy, was brought in—what, he asked, would be said, if, on that occasion, he rose, with great gravity, and observed, "Mr. Speaker, when this bill is in another stage, I mean to move a clause for the exportation of salt-pork from the port of Waterford?" Would he not be deservedly laughed at? And yet the matters contained in the present bill were equally heterogeneous. What plea could be urged for bringing together matters so dissimilar? He supposed it would be stated, that they were generic—that they came under the genus of India; and, therefore, to spare a sheet of foolscap paper, the judges of the Indian presidencies and the bishop of Calcutta were joined in the same act with thieves. This was more than ridiculous—it was disgraceful; and, therefore, he called the attention of the members of that court, who had seats in parliament to the subject. Their representations might have some weight; and he hoped they would induce those who introduced the bill to take a sheet of foolscap paper, and make a different act of parliament of that part of the present bill, which related to the transportation of offenders. It seemed to him, when he looked at the whole bill, when he viewed its clumsy mechanism, that it was the work of some ignorant clerk, instead of being produced by men of legal learning, and sanctioned by the enlightened wisdom of parliament. If he were in the House of Commons, he should be ashamed to be thought a party to such a bill. How could any lawyer think of classing murderers and housebreakers in the same act with the judges and the bishop of Calcutta? Would it not offend those learned individuals and that venerable prelate? The clause relative to transportation said, "It was expedient that the governor and council acting in and for the island of St. Helena, should be empowered, when sitting as a Court of Oyer and Terminer, to order offenders to be transported from the said island; and that, when any person or persons should have been convicted before the said governor and council, so sitting as a Court of Oyer and Terminer, of the crime of fraud or petty larceny, or of any other offence, for which such persons, before the passing of this act, would have been liable, by the laws of this realm, to be transported, it should be lawful for the said governor and council to order that such person or persons should be transported for such term of years as the said governor and council might direct," &c. Now, under this provision, a man found guilty of murder—only qualified by circumstances—might be sentenced to transportation; and was it fitting that, in the same bill, provision should be made for his punishment, and for the payment of the salary of the Bishop of Calcutta? Yet so it was; for, in the preceding clauses, regulations were laid down with respect to the bishop's salary. This was an exceedingly bad precedent: it tended to make "confusion worse confounded." When things so extremely dissimilar were joined together, it was next to impossible to recollect the statute which provided for them.

Sir C. Forbes entirely concurred in what had fallen from the hon. gentleman, but must observe, that if he had made no observations on the bill, it did not arise from want of inclination. He had watched that bill till twelve o'clock at night, in the hope of being present when it was going through the committee, or some other of its stages; but it was always so managed, as bills relative to India usually were, that the night was far advanced before it was brought forward. He had observed that bills which concerned India were constantly introduced at a late period of the session, and were regularly passed at a late hour of the night. (Hear!) With respect to the title of the bill, he confessed that his attention was first drawn to it by what he had observed in the newspapers. The bill had not been printed so soon as it ought to have been. It was not printed until a month after it had been brought in; and it was now, at the far-end of the session, at this very late period, laid before the court. It certainly might have been printed and laid before the court six weeks ago. He believed the hon. proprietor (Mr. Gahagan) was not aware of one-half of the confusion and inconsistency which characterized this bill. He presumed that the hon. proprietor had got a copy of the bill before it went through the committee, in which stage it was very materially altered. He had procured a copy of the bill as amended in the committee; and the title of it ran thus:—"A bill for further regulating the Payment of the Salaries of the Judges of His Majesty's Courts in India, and the Bishop of Calcutta; and for authorizing the transportation of offenders from the island of St. Helena." But the bill contained much more: clauses marked A, B, and C were added by the committee. Now it would be supposed, of course, that those clauses so added were meant to amend the substance of the bill, as set forth in the title; but it was no such thing. Clause A related to the administration of justice at Singapore and Malacca; clause B provided that certain colonies and establishments ceded to his Majesty on the coast of Coromandel, should be placed under the jurisdiction of Fort St. George; and clause C enacted that Singapore and Malacca should be annexed to the settlement of Prince of Wales' Island. He thought it would be quite discreditable, if the bill were suffered to pass in its present crude and undigested state. He certainly would take care that it should not go through the house without his making such observations on it as might appear to him to be necessary. With regard to the alteration which this measure would make in the provision for the judges, he would be allowed to say, that, two years ago, that subject was pressed by him on the attention of the court and of the House of Commons. He had then observed, in both places, that they were not doing justice to the judges of Madras and Bombay; and he suggested an alteration. His suggestion was not, however, adopted; and he was sorry for it, because it was a just one. By the present measure the judges would certainly be placed on a better footing of equality and justice. There was one clause in this bill to which he would particularly advert. The deaths in the judicial department in India had of late been truly melancholy; and the clause to which he alluded had, he supposed, been introduced in consequence of that circumstance. It provided, "that when it shall hereafter happen that any chief-justice or puisne-judge of the Supreme Courts at Fort William, Bengal, Madras, or Bombay, or the recorder of Prince of Wales' Island, or any bishop of Calcutta, shall have departed, or shall hereafter depart this life, within twelve months after the day when he shall have arrived in India, for the purpose of taking upon him the office of chief-justice, judge, recorder, or bishop, the Court of Directors shall, in such case, cause to be paid to the legal representatives of the individual so dying such sum of money as shall, together with the sum already paid to such individual so dying, make up the full amount of one year's salary." This clause seemed to point at the extreme probability of those individuals departing this life within twelve months after they arrived in India: he therefore wished, that, instead of this provision, a clause should be substituted, enacting, that in all cases where a judge or a bishop died in the exercise of his duty in India, a year's salary should be allowed to his family: that was the least, he thought, that could be given.

Mr. Gahagan, in explanation, said, that certainly the bill he held in his hand was not the same as that from which the hon. baronet had quoted; but, strange as it might seem, the title of the bill had been amended; and he wondered how the circumstance had escaped the hon. baronet's observation. He had seen a copy of that bill, in the title of which the subjects mentioned in the clauses referred to by the hon. baronet were distinctly specified.

Mr. Astell said, that, notwithstanding a personal allusion had been made to him, but as he had the honour of holding the situation of Chairman when this measure was brought before the Court of Directors, he felt it necessary to offer a few remarks on this occasion. He was glad to find that the object which the bill had in view was not complained of, but merely the mode in which it was proposed to effect that object. They had, however, in this instance, precedent to bear them out in pursuing the course they had adopted; for the present measure was nearly a copy of the 53d of the late King, which provided for the appointment of a bishop, the transportation of offenders, and the mode of paying the judges at the different presidencies. The House of Commons had not, as yet, taken much notice of the bill. It was not for him to throw his shield over those gentlemen who had not attended to it; they were, of course, perfectly able to take their own parts. The bill had passed through a committee pro forma; but a day would, no doubt, be set apart, when it would be taken into serious consideration. He was associated with those who introduced the measure; and he did not shrink from avowing his entire approval of it. It was intended by that bill to do strict justice to the bishop of Calcutta and the different judges, and nothing more. The hon. baronet proposed that, in all cases where a judge or a bishop died, a full year's salary should be given to his family, without abating any thing which he might have received in the course of the twelve months; the hon. baronet thought that, under any circumstances, a year's salary should be granted to the representatives of the deceased bishop or judge. This certainly was a very liberal view of the subject; but it was not one which he was disposed to support. They had, in the course of six months, lost two valuable judges who had but recently arrived in India; and it was fit that their families should receive an equivalent for the expense which had been incurred. But the same allowance could not be reasonably expected by the families of those who had been four or five years in India, and had, during that period, enjoyed all the emoluments of their judicial situation. The subject had received the fullest consideration which could be given to it by those whose duty it was to investigate it; and the present bill was the result of that consideration. After this explanation, he hoped the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gahagan) would approve of the measure; but, whether it were approved of or not, he would take his share of the responsibility attached to the measure, as he was associated in the House of Commons with the President of the Board of Control and those by whom the bill was introduced.

The Hon. D. Kinnaird expressed his surprise, that a clause was not introduced for the purpose of defining the manner in which the supreme authority in India should be allowed to exercise towards British subjects the power which it now possessed. He was not going to discuss the question, whether it was proper that this general power—the power of removing from his connexions, and of sending to this country any European who excited the displeasure of persons in authority, should be lodged in the hands of the Supreme Government: that was a distinct question, from the manner in which that power so lodged in the hands of the Supreme Government ought to be exercised. He held in his hand the representation of an individual, who had suffered indirectly from the mode in which that power had been exercised in his case; and he thought that it unfolded as piteous and melancholy a story as had ever been told. The individual thus aggrieved was one to whom no moral stain, no tinge of criminality could be attached. At the time when he was visited by the displeasure of the Supreme Government he was merely a subordinate agent in conducting a newspaper; it having been previously declared that the editor, in such cases, should be the responsible person. He alluded to Mr. Arnot; and, from his statement, it certainly appeared that he was not only an agent a priori, with a responsible editor, but that he was confirmed in his belief of being so by a regulation of the government. When a previous complaint had been made, the responsibility was distinctly fixed on the editor for the time being; and, in fact, Mr. Buckingham had been deported from India on account of his having acted as editor. Another editor succeeded; and, because he was not in a situation to be removed from India by the government, Mr. Arnot, who was only acting as agent, was made the scapegoat. It was necessary, it seemed, to make a sacrifice of some sort, to strike terror into the minds of men, and to signify the displeasure of the government to all India; and for this purpose Mr. Arnot was selected. If the government stated the broad principle, that they found it necessary to sacrifice a victim, that they thought it was prudent to mark the displeasure of the Supreme Government; and that Mr. Arnot could only lament that he had presented himself at such a juncture, he could understand the proposition. But if a victim were wanted, why did they not select the right victim; instead of an innocent one? Supposing that it was necessary that some person should be sacrificed to this despotic rule or policy of government, could that

He felt the most perfect conviction, that there was not a gentleman within the bar who did not, on reading the unfortunate story of Mr. Arnot, sincerely regret what they must perceive to be the unnecessary, the gratuitous severity with which he was treated. (Hear!) No man could state his case with more modesty, or in a manner less likely to create a false or unjust impression, than Mr. Arnot had done. He told his story most eloquently, because he told it simply; and he reasoned so well upon the subject, that he carried conviction home to every unbiassed mind. The Supreme Government had the power of sending individuals from India, on the sole ground that their residence in that country appeared to be dangerous; nothing, however, was said as to the way in which that power should be exercised. But did not common sense, justice, and humanity, say, "If you send a man from India, let it be done with the least inconvenience, with the least suffering to him, either so far as time, or health, or expense are concerned?" But, in the case of Mr. Arnot, what did he state was done? (Cries of Question.) Mr. Kinnaird said, he was making out a case, to shew the necessity of introducing a clause in the bill, to direct how this extraordinary power should be exercised.

The Chairman put it to the hon. proprietor, whether, as the case of Mr. Arnot had not been decided upon, either by the Court of Directors or the other proper authorities, it would not be better to avoid bringing it forward? The hon. proprietor had said enough to make the case appear a difficult one. Under existing circumstances, it was impossible that such a clause as the hon. proprietor had alluded to, could be introduced into the present or any other bill.

The Hon. D. Kinnaird said, he did not mean to anticipate what would be done by the Court of Directors; neither did he mean to touch upon the question as to the propriety of continuing this power in future. All he contended for was, that, if it were suffered to remain, the Supreme Government ought to be controlled in their mode of using it. They ought to send an individual direct to England, and not subject him to the inconvenience of a protracted and circuitous voyage. In consequence of what had fallen from the hon. Chairman, he would enter no farther into the discussion; but he would take that opportunity to say, that the statement to which he had referred, spoke in the most respectful manner of the Court of Directors, and had been circulated by Mr. Arnot in the fair discharge of a duty he owed to himself. He thought that a very clumsy mode was at present pursued for supplying the deficiencies which occurred in the legal department in India when deaths took place. Formerly, he believed, present. (No, No.) He understood it never had been so; but, unquestionably, such an intention at one time existed. He believed, at that period, a little economy was consulted, which prevented the plan from being carried into effect. It was thought better that the sum which was intended to be paid to three judges and a chief justice should be divided amongst three judges only. Great inconvenience resulted from not adhering to the original intention of having four judges; and they now endeavoured to provide for it by calling up a senior barrister, or some other functionary, to fill up, pro tempore, the situation of a deceased judge.

The Chairman.—“There is nothing of the kind.”

The Hon. D. Kinnaird.—Be that as it might, it was a great pity, and was much regretted on the bench in India, that the administration of the law should be retarded by the present system. He thought it would be much better to have four judges, instead of leaving the number as it was at present. He would once more advert to the power of the Supreme Government. He hoped that some measure would be taken to control it; and that the Court of Directors would not again be appealed to against such an abuse of it, as appeared in the severity inflicted on the unfortunate gent. to whom he had referred.

Mr. Canning said that, at the expiration of the Company's charter, all the laws connected with it expired also; and, when it was renewed, it was necessary to re-embody all those laws; and when, from time to time, circumstances called on them to alter and amend particular acts, having reference to particular parts of the 53d of Geo. III. (which was, in fact, the bond of law that pervaded the whole empire), they ought to take care not to confound a bishop and a burglar together.

LOSS OF THE COMPANY'S SHIP KENT.

The Chairman.—“I have now to call the attention of the court to the report of the Court of Directors on the loss of the Company's ship Kent. The report, which is in court, will be read. As the ship was commanded by a near relation of mine, if the court will permit me, I will withdraw while the discussion is going on (Hear, hear!)—and my hon. friend (Sir G. A. Robinson) will take the chair.”

The hon. Chairman then withdrew.

The Deputy-Chairman (Sir G. A. Robinson) having taken the chair, proceeded to state that the Court of Directors had fully investigated the circumstances attending the loss of the ship Kent, and had drawn up a report on the subject, which would be read to the proprietors. Before it was read, he begged to state that his hon. colleague, with the same feeling of delicacy which induced him to retire on this occasion, had also declined attending the investigation before the committee. (Hear.)

The clerk then read the following report:—

“At a Court of Directors held on Wednesday, the 30th March, 1825, “Resolved by the Ballot (eighteen and more Directors having concurred therein)—That Captain Henry Cobb, and the officers of the late ship Kent, be fully acquitted of all imputation of neglect or misconduct in respect to the loss of that ship; and that, as the said ship was fully and sufficiently found, and equipped with all necessary anchors, cables, provisions and stores, the owners be consequently acquitted of all imputation of neglect or misconduct in respect of her loss.

“That the said Resolution be submitted to the Court of Proprietors, in the manner required by the Act of the 58th of Geo. III. cap. 83.

“And that, advertising to the evidence which has been given, with reference to the coolness, intrepidity, and humanity evinced by Captain Cobb throughout the trying situation in which he was placed, and particularly in his unceasing endeavours to save the lives of all on board his ship, in which he was most anxiously and zealously joined by Lieut. Colonel Fearon, the commanding-officer, and Major M'Gregor, of His Majesty's 31st Regt., as well as by all his own officers; this Court deems it right to record its conviction, that every possible effort was made to effect that humane object.”

The Chairman (pro tempore) then said, the resolution which he was about to propose was one that must be determined by ballot. He then moved—

“That this Court concur in the resolution of the Court of Directors of the 30th ult. viz. That it is the opinion of this Court that the commander and owners of the ship Kent are fully acquitted from all imputation of neglect or misconduct in respect to the loss of that ship.”

Sir C. Forbes did not rise to offer any objection to the resolution of the Court of Directors on the occasion of the melancholy loss of this ship; but he would say, whether it was usual to call on the Court of Proprietors to agree to a resolution of this nature, in the absence of documents?

The Chairman said, he had to apologise for a little neglect, in not stating, when this resolution was proposed, that, between this time and the day of ballot, the papers, accompanied by all the evidence, would be laid on the table for the inspection of the proprietors.

Sir C. Forbes said, the few observations he had to offer would not rest at all on those papers. He spoke merely for form's sake.

The Hon. D. Kinnaird said, the intention of introducing the subject to that court, viz., that they might discuss it before they came to a decision. Now it was too much to call on them to decide before they had information. It was a strange way of proceeding, to have the discussion first, and the documents afterwards.

The Chairman said, the Court of Directors only followed the course prescribed by the act of parliament. If the proprietors wished all the papers to be read, it might be done.

Sir C. Forbes said, it was not his intention, in the absence of information, to offer any objection to this resolution. So far as related to the commander and the owners, he believed no blame could be attached to them. The officers of the ship were not, he observed, mentioned in the report; and he could not avoid taking that opportunity to express his marked disapprobation of the conduct of that officer, whoever he might be, who took a lighted candle into the hold, especially as there were spirits stowed there. A lighted candle should not be taken into the hold of any ship; and he did not think that such an act of imprudence should be passed over unnoticed. What he principally rose to state was, his deep regret that the Kent should be allowed to sail, a single ship, with the right wing of the 33d regiment on board. The Scalby Castle, having the left wing on board, should have been her consort. They ought to have sailed together—and they would thus have been enabled to assist each other in case of accident. This separation had arisen from following up a regulation of the Court of Directors, by which it was ordered, that, in no case whatever, two ships should sail together. The avowed object of that regulation was, that they should not have the opportunity of assisting each other when in distress.—(No, no!) He would not say that that was the avowed object, but it was certainly the virtual effect of that regulation. He would state the fact out of which the resolution arose, and leave gentlemen to judge for themselves. One of the Company's ships, the Briannia, happened on her return from China, to be placed in a most perilous situation in the Straits of Sunda; the Winchelsea, another of their vessels, assisted her and saved her from being lost. On the arrival of the Winchelsea in this country, the owners very fairly and properly applied to be allowed the usual demerage for the delay occasioned by assisting the Briannia—that demerage which the Company took very good care to make the owners pay to them when any delay occurred on their part. Nothing could be more reasonable than the request of Capt. Moffatt, whose demand amounted to three or four hundred pounds. That demand was, however, refused; and Capt. Moffatt did that which he thought was no disgrace to him: he insisted on being paid the salvage; he brought an action against the Company (it was rather an unusual thing for one of the owners of a Company's vessel to do so), and he succeeded in recovering 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.*, which the Company had to pay, together with as much more for the costs of suit. If this fell on the Court of Directors he would not care about it—but it fell on the Court of Proprietors, on their honourable masters, not on themselves.—(A laugh!) Now, what was the measure resorted to by the Court of Directors, in consequence of the justice so done to the owner of the Winchelsea? They framed a regulation, directing that no two ships of theirs should be despatched together on any future occasion, let the business be what it might. They said, "we will dispatch them singly, and that will prevent a demand for demerage or salvage."—(Hear!) He believed it was proposed to the ship-owners at the time, by the Court of Directors, to give up in future all claim to demerage or salvage, when one of the Company's ships assisted another, under similar circumstances; and, one or two owners, he understood, agreed to that, in his opinion, very unreasonable proposition. He certainly never would have agreed to it. He would submit to the court, whether the effect of such a regulation was not tantamount to saying, "on no future occasion shall two of the Company's ships sail together—then it will not be in their power to assist each other; and, of course, we shall not be called on for demerage or salvage."—(Hear!) This regulation was agreed to. Several directors, he knew, objected to it, and afterwards endeavoured to have it rescinded; but the majority of the court persevered, and it still remained, notwithstanding the melancholy fate of the Kent. If the Kent and Scalby Castle had sailed together, every man on board the former would, he was sure, have been saved. The year after this regulation was passed, the Ingis, one of their freight ships, got on shore in the straits of Sunda. There was no Winchelsea to assist her (a laugh); and the captain threw overboard 5,000 chests of the Company's tea, constituting a dead loss of 280,000 sterling. This was the punishment the directors inflicted on the proprietors, because Captain Moffatt recovered salvage. The owners of the Ingis lost 25,000 by this business, and the Company 280,000, a sum that would pay all the demerages and salvages that might happen to occur during the remainder of the Company's charter. He hoped the Court of Directors would reconsider that regulation; because they were bound, when they were sending out troops to that country, which was so much in need of assistance, to take every possible measure to ensure their safety. He would now assert, without fear of contradition—and these were professional men present who could contradict him if he were in error—that the great probability was, that, if the Scutley Castle had been dispatched with the Kent, not only the lives of every man, woman, and child would have been saved, but that the fire might have been extinguished. (No, no!) Those gentlemen behind the bar, who treated this assertion so lightly, had, doubtless, information on the subject which he did not possess. But it was consistent with common sense that the men, when they knew that their lives would at all events be saved by the vessel in company, would have redoubled their exertions to save their own, therefore it was possible that the fire might have been got under, and the whole of the people saved. When he said this, he did not mean to underrate the exertions of the officers and crew of the Kent; he believed that all those on board acted in the most praiseworthy manner. From every thing he had heard, he believed that Capt. Cobb and his crew deserved the flattering notice that had been taken of them. He thought the resolution ought to have gone further; and he hoped the hon. Chairman was one of those who would be disposed to consider, whether a more substantial mark of respect than simple thanks ought not to be conferred on Capt. Cobb. He thought every encouragement that could be afforded ought to be given to the Company's officers, when they behaved steadily under such trying circumstances. Rewards in those cases were well bestowed—and he was sure the Company would profit by such measures in the end. If something in the shape of a piece of plate were bestowed on Capt. Cobb, to mark the approbation of the Company, it would be handed down to his children, and would be most highly appreciated. The letters he had seen, and the information he had received from some who had been in the Kent, placed in the most honourable point of view, the conduct of Colonel Feron, who commanded the troops on board. He therefore, for one, most cordially concurred in that part of the report in which that gallant officer was mentioned. He thought, however, that some notice ought to be taken of the officer who went into the hold of the ship, where spirits were stowed, with a lighted candle. It was such an act of madness, that he scarcely thought it possible. He did not wish the young man to be punished severely, but certainly some notice ought to be taken of the circumstances. He would now say a word or two with regard to the state in which that ship went to sea; and, he believed, the remarks he was about to make would apply to other vessels carrying troops out to India. His opinion, on this point, was borne out by some whom he respected, though denied by others, whom he equally respected. He believed that all those ships were overladen with troops. On board the Kent he understood there were 750 souls. This was by far too large a number, and did not admit of the necessary accommodation being afforded. There were from 100 to 150 persons too many on board. In this case, unfortunately, so great was the number of troops on board, that the spirits could not be stowed in the spirit-room. They were, therefore, stowed in the hold, and hence the fire occurred. If, however, the Scutley Castle had sailed with the Kent, he was confident all would be saved. What might not a large vessel have accomplished, when a brig of 200 tons had done so much? The ships Ingis and Kellie Castle had also gone out to Bombay, under similar circumstances: one had the right, the other the left wing of a regiment on board; and they were despatched separately, for the evident and avowed purpose of not allowing them to assist each other in case of accident, in order that demorag or salvage might be avoided. (No, no!) Well, they could not deny that such was the effect of the regulation, that it operated to prevent vessels from giving each other assistance. He had heard from a gentleman, who went on board the Kent in the Downs, that the captain wished one hundred men to be taken out of the vessel, and that he and his officers were crying out "shame!" on account of her being packed in such a crowded manner. This was stated to him by a gentleman who was not in the habit of finding fault with the directors, but who, he believed, generally supported their measures. He hoped the Court of Directors would reconsider that regulation, laying aside any feeling which might arise from the circumstance of his having mentioned it; but, he certainly would notice the subject, both in that court and elsewhere, until the regulation was rescinded. He was sure that the feelings of many honourable men went along with him on this subject; and he trusted, before the court met again, that the obnoxious regulation would be abandoned, and that ships, whether laden with troops or with tea, would be directed to keep company, in order that they might assist each other. When they did so, the passage was always shorter, since there was a much greater stimulus for exertion than when vessels proceeded on their voyages singly. In the latter case, they were apt to take it easy, until daylight appeared; but, in the former, the same exertions were made both by night and day.

The Hon. Hugh Lindsay said, he would confine himself to a few observations on what had fallen from the hon. bart. respecting the crowded state of the Kent. It so happened, that when the hon. bart. made some observations in another place on the same subject, but not so temperate as that which he had now addressed to the court, he (Mr. L.) had a letter in his pocket from an officer, second in command of the troops on board the Kent, in which the gallant writer stated, that, during the time he had been in the service, he had inspected various transports, but he never saw one in which there was so much accommodation and room for the troops, or in which they were so well treated in any respect, as on board of the Kent. (Hear!) He thought it right to state, that fourteen inches were considered sufficient for a berth in his Majesty's ships; whilst, in the Company's ships, eighteen inches were always allowed. (Hear!) He was surprised that the hon. bart. concluded his speech in the House of Commons without some motion; for, if he really believed that troops were stuffed into the Company's ships like smuggled slaves on the coast of Guinea—

Sir C. Forbes. "I said no such thing."

The hon. Hugh Lindsay.—If the hon. bart. really believed this—

Sir C. Forbes. "I did not say so; and, I hope the hon. director will not put the words into my mouth."

The Hon. Hugh Lindsay.—He did not mean to say that the honourable bart. had made use of those words; but he certainly made observations of a nature to induce a belief that troops were placed in the Company's ships in the way in which slaves were packed in ships on the coast of Guinea. If the hon. bart. supposed that to be the case, it was his duty to have made a motion for inquiry on the subject; and, if he had wanted a seconder, he (Mr. L.) would gladly have acted as one. (Hear!) If there was any thing for which the Company deserved credit in particular, it was for the attention which they paid for the comfort of troops sent to India in their ships. In what he had said respecting the slave ships, he meant nothing offensive to the hon. bart., but was merely desirous to show that his observations in another place were calculated to induce a belief that they were most improperly treated. If the hon. bart. would take the trouble to investigate the subject, he would be perfectly satisfied that he was mistaken. With respect also to the circumstance of ships not sailing together, investigation would likewise satisfy the hon. bart. on that point; it was not the fault of the Court of Directors, that the proposition which they made to the ship-owners was not agreed to. (Hear!)

Sir C. Forbes said, it would seem, from what had fallen from the hon. director, that he had availed himself of his privilege as a member of the House of Commons to make use of improper language. (No!) He appealed to those who knew him, whether he was in the habit of expressing himself in so unmeasured terms in one place than in another. Indeed, if he were to make any difference with regard to places, he would express himself in more unmeasured terms in that court than in the House of Commons, where he enjoyed protection. He rejected the idea that he would employ language in the House of Commons which he would not employ in another place. Such, he could assure the hon. director, was not his character.

The Hon. Hugh Lindsay disowned any intention of giving offence to the hon. bart. He had merely stated what was the fact, that in the House of Commons the hon. bart. gave utterance to a more violent expression of disapprobation of the mode in which troops were sent to India than he had done in that court.

The Deputy Chairman said that he had probably suffered the present conversation to be carried to greater length than was proper with reference to the question before the court, which was confined to the conduct of the commander and owners of the ship Kent. The hon. bart. having, however, launched another subject, he trusted that he would be heard with patience whilst he made a few observations upon it. The hon. bart. had expressed a hostile opinion with regard to the manner in which ships were sent out to India, and also with respect to the number of troops which those vessels carried out. On the latter point he was able to produce evidence, which he thought would be accepted as the best possible, on the subject. It was the practice of his Majesty's service that the accommodation for troops should be inspected by an officer appointed for that purpose; that officer was, he believed, Sir Alexander Christie, who was stationed at Chatham. He was borne out by the fact in declaring to the court, that that officer had repeatedly expressed to members of the Court of Directors, who had gone to Chatham to inspect the Company's ships, his opinion of the great superiority of the accommodation afforded to troops in the Company's ships, as compared with that which was furnished on board his Majesty's vessels. (Hear!) He hoped, therefore, that the court would not separate with an unpleasant impression on their minds in consequence of the statements, which had been made by the hon. bart. The hon. bart. had talked of 700 men and upwards being on board the Kent; but the fact was, that the whole number was only 690, including the crew. That was all he had to offer to the court on the subject of the accommodation of the troops. He would now say a few words with respect to the despatching of ships together. He would take upon himself to say, that the Court of Directors were quite innocent of the motives, which the hon. bart. had attributed to them for making the change of which he complained. He was not himself a seaman, and therefore could not be supposed to be particularly conversant with the varieties of danger which attended ships at sea; but he might venture to inform the hon. bart., that, amongst the motives which influenced the Court of Directors in making the change, was the additional risk which attended the dispatch of ships in couples: that was, he understood, the predominant consideration in the Court of Directors, when they determined on despatching ships separately. Gentlemen must be aware that the passage from London to the Downs was very precarious. Ships could not always start together at the moment they were called upon. He would put to those gentlemen, whether, at that season of the year (the winter) in which the Company's ships began to sail, whether much risk did not attend a ship lying in the Downs with an adverse wind waiting for another. (Hear!) Supposing, however, that they arrived together at the Downs, what next happened? In case of their being separated, a rendezvous was fixed at the Straits of Madeira; and at that season of the year there could hardly be a more dangerous situation for ships to lie in. It would be felt, therefore, that as great risk attended the despatching ships in couples as in despatching them singly. He would state another thing on this point; since he had been in the direction, he had known a thousand instances in which ships had sailed together, but he had known very few in which they had arrived together. (Hear!) A separation generally, takes place, and the means adopted for bringing them together again, occasioned additional risk.

These might be considered sufficient reasons for the regulation which the Court of Directors had come to. He had not made those observations with a view to prevent the court from entering, at a proper time, into a consideration of the policy or impolicy of that regulation; he had merely wished to express his doubts of the benefit which the hon. baronet supposed would result from the sailing of ships together. Having concluded what he had to say on that subject, he would now beg leave to state to the court a circumstance connected with the subject under discussion, which was not generally known, but which reflected so much honour on the parties to whom it referred, that it would be a pity that the knowledge of it should be lost, or confined merely to the records of the Court. The Court of Directors, it was known, had displayed much liberality towards the persons on board the vessel, which assisted in saving the lives of those who were on board the Kent; but there were persons on board this ship who were of too elevated a situation of life to be rewarded by a grant of money; he meant the superior class of miners who were passengers. The court of Directors at first thought of presenting them with some plate; but that idea was subsequently abandoned, and it was then determined that a sum of money should be expended in providing for their additional comfort and accommodation on board the ship in which they were going out to South America. The individuals in question acknowledged the intentions of the Court of Directors in the handsomest terms; but at the same time expressed a hope, that, as they had been most liberally and abundantly provided for by persons concerned in the Mining Association, to which they belonged, the Court of Directors would be satisfied with their appropriating the sum of money which was assigned for their comfort, to the infirmary of the place from which they came, which was some town in Cornwall. (Hear, hear!) This was a fact not generally known, but it reflected great honour on the parties concerned. (Hear!) He would just again advert to the subject of the despatching of ships together, for the purpose of mentioning one circumstance, which would show that much safety was not supposed to be derived from that practice. He would venture to say, that if a policy were carried into Lloyd's for a single ship and for two ships sailing together, there would not be a single sixpence difference taken on the two. (Hear!) He would just add that the practice of sending ships in couples did not prevail in His Majesty's service, and he could not understand why the East-India Company should alone be called on to adopt it.

Mr. Carruthers felt himself called upon to address the court, in consequence of an observation which had fallen from the hon. bart. (Sir C. Forbes). The hon. bart. had stated that the accident of the burning of the Kent arose from an officer going into the hold with a lighted candle. To a person not accustomed to a ship, it might be supposed from the hon. bart.'s statement that the officer had gone into the hold with a candle as a chamber-maid would go into a room. (A laugh.) The light, however, which the officer carried into the hold was confined within the small box which he held in his hand (producing a small lantern); so satisfied were the underwriters of Lloyd's that the officer was not to blame, that the large loss which the burning of the ship occasioned was settled in two hours. When the officer carried the lantern into the hold he gave it, in consequence of the ship lurching, to a man to hold, and he at the same time went up stairs to get some article which he wanted. In the mean time a lurch of the ship caused a cask of spirits, which the man in the hold had in his hand, to burst, and thus the fire originated.

Mr. Smart was surprised that the hon. Director (Mr. Lindsay), should accuse the hon. bart. of using intemperate language in the House of Commons, because, if he recollected rightly the hon. director was not present when he spoke.

The Hon. Hugh Lindsay said, that he was not present during the first speech of the hon. bart., but he was during his second, when the hon. proprietor himself was not present.

Mr. Walsborough said, that he had been informed by the Colonel of the troops on board the Kent, that he was very grateful for the accommodation which had been afforded his troops.

The ballot was then fixed for Wednesday the 11th of May, and the Court adjourned at two o'clock.

PROGRESS OF THE BURMESE WAR.

SINCE the publication of our last article under this title (p. 221), the documents respecting the origin of the war, which were moved for in Parliament, have been printed. As they disclose no new fact of any importance, and as some of the most material papers have appeared in this journal, whilst others are perplexed by references to minute particulars, conveyed in no perspicuous language, our readers will probably concur with us in thinking it inexpedient to embarrass our narrative, and destroy its simplicity, by borrowing materials from thence; thereby departing from our original design of laying before them a concise, clear, and intelligible detail of the military events of the war.

We brought the operations at the grand scene of attack down to the 4th of last August. Official advices have since acquainted us with some previous transactions in other quarters.

The detachment sent, as before stated, by Brigadier Macmorine to Kullabar,* under Lieut. Col. Richards, found a party of Burmese at Haulbar, in the vicinity, who afterwards retired to Rungby Ghur. The Lieut. Colonel, having advanced, on the 18th May, to destroy the stockade at Haulbar, learned that the enemy had re-occupied it, and he made arrangements for surprising them. Having posted a body of cavalry, under Lieut. Richardson, in their probable route of retreat, he directed the infantry upon the position of the enemy, who fell into the snare, and experienced a severe loss. The stockade was then occupied by Capt. Horsburgh, and arrangements were made to attack Rungby Ghur; but, on the 23d, the enemy had the temerity to advance again upon Haulbar. Capt. Horsburgh marched out of the stockade and attacked them in front, whilst Lieut. Jones, with the cavalry, took them in the rear, upon which the Burmese troops fled, and Rungby Ghur was evacuated a few days after.

The

* The orthography of names of places in the Burmese territory is in a lamentable state of uncertainty. They are not only written differently in different despatches, but differently by the same officer. The most recent is probably the most accurate mode, which is our reason for deviating from our first method.

The stockade at Tik Naaf, garrisoned by about 150 provincials, under a subadar, was attacked on the 2d June by a large Burmese force, from Ramoo. The garrison mutinied, and delivered up the stockade and ammunition to the enemy. The subadar escaped to the Company's cruizer Vestal; whereupon Lieut. Guy, the commander, stood down the Naaf, and was immediately attacked by about 100 war-boats on the river. The confidence of the enemy, however, who at first demanded the instant surrender of the vessel, was dissipated by the fire from the cruizer and its boats, which made great havoc among them.

On the Sylhet frontier, Lieut. Col. Innes had been for some time endeavouring to reduce the strong post at Tilaoyñ, which was defended with great resolution by the Burmese, who had occasional skirmishes with the British troops and those of our ally, Ghumbur Sing. On the 8th July, a more serious attack was made by the enemy, in great force, upon the ex-rajah's followers, who were driven from the height they occupied. An attempt was made to regain the position; but the Burmese covered the whole line of hills in immense numbers, so that the attempt failed, and the battery erected against the fort became useless, as it was commanded by the enemy. The guns were accordingly withdrawn, with some slight loss; and the Lieut. Colonel re-embarked his detachment on the Barak river, and fell back upon Juttrapore, about two miles from Tilaoyñ, from whence he subsequently retired to Budderpore.

At this place Lieut. Col. Innes remained until 25th October, when, receiving intelligence that the Burmese army in Cachar were retreating, he despatched a party under Capt. Hawes, up the Barak, who disembarked at Juttrapore, and marched to Tilaoyñ: they found the place deserted, and the works partly destroyed. The Burmese had likewise evacuated Doodpatlee, and were retiring towards Munnipore; but the inundated state of the country rendered it impracticable for regular troops to pursue them. Both the posts were completely destroyed by the British; and Cachar is represented to be entirely vacated by the enemy.

On the Rangoon side, during the continuance of the rainy season, the operations were necessarily confined to affairs of small moment, which nevertheless contributed to keep alive the terror of the enemy, and to support the credit of the British arms.

Brig. General Camplrell hearing that some discontent and disturbance prevailed in the province of Dalla, owing to a forced general levy ordered by the Burmese government, sent a small detachment, under Lieut. Col. Kelly, on the 8th August, in boats up the Dalla river, to favour any resistance which the malcontents might be disposed to make. The troops met with great difficulties, owing to the season, and in attacking two stockades, the line was formed, officers and men standing breast-deep in mud and water. The stockades were gallantly taken and destroyed. Subsequently the enemy returned to the same positions, and became so troublesome by their predatory excursions, that a detachment under Major Evans, and the boats of H.M.'s ship Lorne, were sent in the beginning of September to shell them out, which was effected without loss, and several of the enemy's boats were captured. On the 6th September, the enemy made an attack, simultaneously, by land and sea, on a small post established on the Dalla creek. A force of about 2,000 assaulted the British stockade, and a number of war-boats attacked the gun-brigs in the creek. Both were repelled, and the Burmese retreated with the loss of five boats. A detachment under Brig. Gen. Fraser, proceeding up the river, on the 21st September, towards Paulang, where the enemy had established established a fort, took and destroyed various stockades and breast-works on the banks, which were either found to be evacuated, or were abandoned as soon as the troops attacked them; the enemy, after a slight resistance, flying into the jungle.

The Burmese forces having advanced from Pegu, where they had been concentrated, to Annauben and Keykloo, about fourteen miles distant from Rangoon, Brig.Gen. Campbell ordered a force of about 1,200 sepoy, under Lieut. Col. Smith, to advance upon their position, and attack them as circumstances allowed. The Lieut. Colonel marched on the 5th October, and on crossing a nullah beyond Toddaghee, was attacked by the enemy. It was soon perceived that there was a stockade in front, partly concealed by jungle. This stockade was carried, and the Burmese retreated; but some prisoners reporting that they were in considerable force, strongly stockaded, and that their troops were of a superior description, Col. Smith requested and obtained a reinforcement of 300 native infantry. As the force advanced, they encountered detached parties of the enemy, and several breast-works: the former invariably retreated; the latter were gallantly carried. These obstacles, however, retarded the advance of the troops, and Col. Smith did not reach Annauben till the evening of the 7th. The guides then affected to be ignorant of the direct route to the stockade, and some time was consumed in discovering it. When the British troops advanced to the attack, the Burmese reserved their fire until the assailants were within fifty yards of the works; when volleys of grape-shot and musketry were poured from the stockade with the utmost regularity and effect. Major Wahab was severely wounded; the leading officers and pioneers with the ladders were knocked down; the sepoy were panic-struck, and lay down to screen themselves from the fire. The lateness of the hour forbade the renewal of the attack; and a retreat was ordered, after an ineffectual effort to take the pagoda at Keykloo. Hereupon, the whole of the corps became dispirited, ungovernable, and, at last, lost to all sense of what was passing. The men crowded together in one indiscriminate, disorganized mass; order and discipline vanished. The active efforts of their officers succeeded, at length, in restoring them to reason; and the force retreated, without further annoyance from the enemy, to Toddaghee, at eleven o'clock at night. Our loss in this affair amounted to 21 killed, and 78 wounded.

In the expectation that a different result would have attended this expedition, the Commander of the forces, on the same day (5th September) despatched Major Evans with 300 men of H.M.'s 38th regt., and 100 native infantry, towards the village of Martabain, on the Syng river, which joins that of Rangoon above Kemmendine, and which had been strongly stockaded, having become the head-quarters of the Kee Woonghee, and Lykia Woonghee, chief ministers of state, who commanded a considerable and increasing force. After destroying several stockades and war-boats in their advance, the British troops on the 7th reached Martabain, defended by three breast-works and a stockade, and protected by fourteen large war-boats. The breast-works were carried immediately; the stockade, which was of unusual strength, was entered next day, after a cannonade, which did much execution; the magnificent bungalow of the Kee Woonghee, a first minister, being found perforated by balls, and the rooms much stained with blood. The enemy retreated, leaving, contrary to custom, several dead bodies behind.

To check any elation which the enemy might feel upon the issue of Lieut. Col. Smith's expedition, General Campbell, on the 9th October, directed Brig. McCreagh to proceed to Keykloo with 400 British troops, and 350 sepoys. On the road between Todaghee and Keyklob, the detachment indignantly beheld the revolting spectacle of the bodies of the sepoys and pioneers, amounting to twenty-three, who had fallen in the previous attack, fastened to trees, mutilated and mangled with the most savage barbarity. Upon reaching the pagoda and stockades, the Brigadier had the mortification to find them deserted by the enemy, who had retreated the preceding evening to Koghalee. Thither he proceeded, but the Burmese, commanded by a Mayhoon, were in disorderly rout, flying in all directions through the jungle, and burning every thing in their retreat. Upon arriving at Koghalee, which was in flames, five more mangled bodies were discovered. The Brigadier, after completing the destruction which the enemy had begun, withdrew to Todaghee, and thence to Rangoon.

Whilst these operations were in progress, an expedition under Lieut. Col. Miles had obtained possession of the sea-port towns of Tavoy and Mergui, the most valuable possessions of the Burmese on the Tenasserim coast.* The expedition sailed from Rangoon on the 26th August, and proceeded up the Tavoy river, full of shoals and natural difficulties, which the enemy had increased, and anchored before the fort the 8th September. Next day, two Burmese came on board Col. Miles' vessel, and offered, on the part of the second in command, to seize or destroy the Mayhoon, or governor of the place, and obey the Lieut. Colonel's orders. Directions were accordingly given that the governor should be placed in confinement; which were obeyed; and the fort, pettah, and defences of the town (all very strong and extensive) were surrendered to the British forces, with 167 pieces of ordnance.

Leaving 370 men at Tavoy, Col. Miles proceeded to Mergui, before which he arrived on the 6th October. A summons to surrender was answered by a heavy fire upon the cruisers, which was silenced in an hour, and a landing was effected during torrents of rain. The space between the river and stockade was deep mud and water; and upon the advance of a party of H.M.'s 80th regiment, the enemy opened a heavy and well-directed fire. The stockade was carried with great loss on the part of the enemy; and the town, which was found to be well fortified, was soon after occupied by the British troops, the Rajah having retreated with about 300 followers. The ordnance captured at Mergui amounted to 143 pieces.

On the 11th October an expedition, composed of Europeans and natives, under Lieut. Col. Godwin, H.M.'s 41st regt., was sent by General Campbell against the port of Martaban,† which, through the ignorance of native pilots, contrary currents, and other impediments, did not reach that place till the 29th.

* The coast of Tenasserim originally formed part of the dominions of Siam; but in the wars between the Siamese and Burmese, the latter obtained possession of the whole of the coast; and, by treaty in 1783, the Siamese ceded the maritime towns, and the entire dominion of the coast of Tenasserim, with the two important ports of Mergui and Tavoy.

Mergui is about six miles up the Tenasserim river. In lat. $19^{\circ} 19' N.$, long. $96^{\circ} 24' E.$ The river, like all others in this part, has a bar; but vessels of moderate size can ~~pass~~ it, and the port is said to be very commodious: the largest ships can anchor in the roads. The English had a factory here in 1687, and were much esteemed.

Tavoy is in lat. $13^{\circ} 13' N.$, long. $96^{\circ} 8' E.$, and the point, on which stands a pagoda, forms the western side of the entrance of the river. The town is about eight leagues up the river; the country round is fertile.

The inhabitants of the provinces to which these ports belong are a peculiar tribe, called Meng. The natural resources of the country are said to be important: it produces tin, sapin-wood, sticklac, corn, and marble, a timber fit for ship-building.

† Martaban is in lat. $16^{\circ} 20' N.$, about 20 leagues E. of Rangoon River. It was once a place of considerable trade, and the capital of an independent kingdom, but was taken by the king of Ava, who destroyed the town and damaged the fort. It is now celebrated for its potteries.

29th. It was found to be strong and commanding, situated at the bottom of a very high hill, washed by an extensive sheet of water; defended by stockades, a battery with a deep nullah under it, and works of masonry. The rear of the town and works was protected by thick jungle and large trees. The enemy suffered the British to reconnoitre without molestation. On the 30th, after a cannonade during the night, the British troops (consisting of about 220 Europeans and natives, and including 38 seamen of the British navy) attempted to land, but a misunderstanding with respect to the spot delayed this operation, and the fire of the enemy disconcerted the lascar. By the gallantry of Lieut. Keele, of the navy, a means of access to the rock on which the battery was placed, was found across the nullah; it was stormed under a heavy fire, and bravely carried. The remaining works were soon cleared; and although the enemy seemed disposed to make a stand at the pagoda, they fled at the approach of our troops, rushing into the water and jungle by hundreds, under a destructive fire. The town was found to be deserted, and the houses had been carefully emptied of property. The loss of the enemy, whose force amounted to between 3,000 and 4,000 men, was great; a considerable number of prisoners was taken. The Ordnance captured (mostly wall-pieces) amounted to 116 pieces. Our loss was seven killed, and fourteen wounded.

The capture of Martaban was followed by the voluntary submission of Tennasserim, and the town and province of Yeah; so that the whole Burmese coast, from Rangoon to the eastward, is now subject to British authority.

On the north-eastern frontier, Lieut. Colonel Richards recommenced operations in Assam, about the 20th October, by detaching Major Cooper, with a small force, to Kullibar, and Major Evans to Rahachokey, in order to expel the enemy from the country west of the former place, and drive them towards Munnipore, amongst the hostile Nagha tribes. Major Cooper came up with a small party of Burmese at Dickaree, in Chardao, whom he surprised; and he retook two native Christian prisoners. The Burmese troops had retired from Kullibar to Nahgong.

Major Waters embarked on the river Kullung, and upon approaching the village of Moree Kullung, he learned that about 250 of the enemy were at the village of Hautgong, a few miles inland, on the north bank of the river. He set out on the 28th October, and surprised them; the enemy fled into the thick jungle, abandoning their women and baggage. During the march, the troops were exposed to almost incessant rain. This affair was productive of an accidental advantage: the Burmese believed that the British troops were not proceeding higher up the Kullung, and consequently, on our approach to Rahachokey, they were taken by surprise. The stockades and village were carried without loss, and the enemy were pursued for two miles. A party returning from Hautgong fell into an ambush prepared by Major Waters. The prisoners in these affairs were Usael Burmese.

These rapid movements appear to have terrified the Boora Rajah (Burmese governor of Assam), who, upon receiving intelligence of the advance of our troops, fled, with the main body, towards the hills, abandoning stockades, baggage, plunder, and all the heavy property, which the villagers seized. Several boats, guns, and military stores, were captured by Major Waters, who advanced in pursuit as far as Namgong; but the enemy's flight was so hasty and disorderly, that it was useless to pursue farther.

These successes were the prelude to others upon a much larger scale, at the great scene of operations. The Maha Bundoola, who had been long employed in in collecting a numerous army in the vicinity of Prome, with the design of expelling the British from Rangoon, at length approached our army on the 1st December, with the congregated force of the empire, amounting to about 60,000 men. The princes of Tonghoo and Sarawuddy accompanied him; and it was his haughty boast, that he would lead the British in chains to the court of Ava.

The enemy's operations, which lasted several days, began by an attack, early on the morning of the 1st, upon the British post at Kemmendine; and at daylight, large masses advanced from the jungle towards both flanks of the British line, which had the Rangoon river in its rear. The right corps of the enemy had crossed to the Dalla side of the river, and opened a fire upon the shipping. Their right wing and centre occupied a range of hills in front of the great Dagon pagoda, and every part of their line out of the jungle was strongly and judiciously entrenched.

The object of the British commander was to suffer his antagonist to bring forward his whole force within reach. Accordingly, during the first four days, the only molestation he offered was an attack on his entrenchments on the afternoon of the 1st, to discover his design; and another on the 2d, to drive his troops from a height which they had entrenched in front of the pagoda. The enemy meanwhile persevered in their attacks upon the post at Kemmendine, which they continued for six days, but were foiled by the gallantry of the troops under Major Yates, and the seamen in the boats.

On the 5th, General Campbell determined to attack the enemy's left wing. Major Sale, with 1,100 men, advanced against their centre; Major Walker, with 600 men, attacked their left. Both operations succeeded; the enemy were defeated and dispersed in every direction, leaving behind all their artillery, stores, chattahs, and trophies. Major Walker was killed whilst leading his column into the enemy's entrenchments.

The enemy's right, being posted in a thick forest, was not accessible; but the Bundoola, having reinforced it with the remains of his defeated left, and presuming upon the politic forbearance of the British commander, quitted his recesses, and advanced on the 7th close to the British front. He was attacked in four columns, driven from all his works without a check on our part, with the loss of 240 guns (mostly swivels), and 5,000 men killed and wounded. Thus perished the extravagant hopes of the Burmese General! Our loss was 33 killed and 235 wounded.

Upon the return of the army to Rangoon, on the evening of the 8th, it was found that the enemy's corps on the Dalla side of the river had not been withdrawn, owing to their ignorance of what had occurred. The Brigadier General accordingly attacked their works that night, and drove them into the jungle: he followed them thither next morning, and expelled them from the strong holds they possessed there.

The Bundoola, either dreading the consequences of his defeat at the court of Ava, or intent upon retrieving his honour, determined to make another effort: and having rallied and collected a force of between 20,000 and 25,000 men, sent them forward, under another chief, to the village of Corkain, about three miles from the great pagoda, where they entrenched themselves with a judgment which, says the Brigadier-General, "would do credit to the best-instructed engineers of the most civilized and warlike nations." It would seem that a close correspondence subsisted between the Burmese General and certain residents at Rangoon. The day of attack was announced there as being fixed for for the 14th, and on that day the town was fired, by the enemy's partizans, in several places, whereby a fourth part of it was destroyed. No attack was, however, made on the 14th, except an ineffectual attempt on the shipping by fire-rafts; and, the next day, the Brigadier-General advanced towards the enemy in two columns; the right, consisting of about 500 men, under Brig. Gen. Cotton; the left amounting to about 800, under the command of General Campbell. On arriving at the enemy's position, the latter column was formed into two, under Lieut. Col. Miles and Major Evans; and, at the pre-concerted signal, the three divisions rushed to the assault, and in fifteen minutes were in possession of the "stupendous" work. The enemy's commander was mortally wounded; their camp, ammunition, baggage, &c. were taken. Whilst the army was thus employed, the navy engaged a fleet of 32 war-boats, 30 of which they captured, and destroyed several fire-rafts and materials for constructing them. Our loss of troops was 18 killed, and 115 wounded.

In concluding this article for the present, we wish to observe that the pertinacious attacks of the Burniese, their skill and activity in the science of fortification, as well as the character of their country and the nature of the climate, render them by no means a despicable enemy. Our public writers display great precipitation in arguing, from the facility with which the British army has defeated the enemy, that the preparations for the war have been superfluously large and expensive; as if the object were merely to chastise a nation of naked and unarmed savages.

FROM THE CHINESE.

Verses said to be written by a Lady on a Leaf blown into the Window of a Person whom she afterwards married.

WILL the big tear-drops from thy cheek,
Victim of secret woe!
These simple lines perhaps may break
The spell that keeps thee so.

Marble or paper shall not bear
The charm that gives relief;
The gale shall waft it through the air, Borne on an Autumn-leaf.

Haply, this message of my love
His eyes alone shall see, Whom Heaven has meant my faith to prove
And who was formed for me.

The cold, the brutish, and unkind,
By Love's soft tales unmoved,
Must not this fragile relic find;—
They never can be loved.

MISSIONS IN INDIA.

L'ABBÉ DUBOIS IN REPLY TO THE "FRIEND OF INDIA."

As we have inserted an article * in reprehension of the sentiments promulgated by the Abbé Dubois, respecting the conversion of the Hindoos, we think it but fair both to the Abbé and to our readers, to give admission to that writer's strictures upon a long article in the Friend of India, a publication conducted by the Missionaries at Serampore, wherein the work of the Abbé Dubois is very fully examined, and very severely reprobated.

The Abbé has addressed the following letter, in reply to that article, to the Editor of the Bulletin des Sciences:†

Paris, March 1, 1825.

SIR: I have read attentively, from one end to the other, the Friend of India, No. 10, wherein the author endeavours to refute what I have published upon the state of Christianity in India; but nothing he advances has convinced me I am wrong, or determined me to retract a single paragraph of what I have written. What has most distressed me in that article, is the passion, and the tone of asperity and resentment which it displays, as well as the scurrilous expressions and injurious terms which are dispersed in it, and often repeated, directed not only against me personally, but also against all missionaries of the catholic religion without exception, whom the writer is pleased to represent as fanatics, fools, knaves, impostors, liars, emissaries of antichrist, &c. &c. I had always believed that such a style was confined to the polemical works of the 16th and 17th centuries, and that education and the purity of modern manners had banished them from the writings of the present day; or that they were only employed by writers who, having a desperate cause to support, labour to supply the deficiency of plausible argument by insult and invective. Under this persuasion, I carefully abstained in my work from all offensive personalities, and confined myself within the strictest bounds of decency and moderation.

Another serious ground of reproach I have to make against the author of the Friend of India, is the dishonesty he has shewn in almost all his quotations from my work, which are for the most part mutilated, altered, falsified, or altogether forged. He is pleased to make me utter the most absurd, and at the same time the most odious sentiments; and he tortures his faculties in order to extract from my principles the most extravagant conclusions.

In my letters on the state of Christianity in India, I brought forward two questions: 1st. Is there a well-founded hope of propagating the Christian religion in India? 2d. Will the distribution of the Bible, translated into the dialects of the country, among the pagan Hindoos, promote that desirable end? Both these questions I resolved in the negative, and maintained, 1st. That, in the present state of things, there exists no human means of converting the Hindoos to Christianity; 2d. That the barbarous and almost unintelligible versions of the Bible now circulating in profusion amongst them, not only will not produce the effect desired, but will lead to a result directly contrary, by augmenting the estrangement of these people and their aversion towards Christianity.

The author of the Friend of India applies himself to combat these two assertions, and emphatically promises us the speedy conversion to the protestant religion of five or six hundred millions of idolaters who inhabit Asia, and that of all the people of the earth. To destroy my assertions, the author has pressed into his service, all the metaphors, allegories, hyperboles, and parables which he has been able to discover in the Old and New Testament; by the aid of which, and by giving them an interpretation most adapted to his subject and opinions, he fancies he has triumphantly refuted me. It remains to be seen, whether his readers and mine, especially those who know the real state of things in India, will arrive at the conviction he does; and whether they will draw from his premises the same conclusions.

He

† Bull. Univ. des Sciences, &c. Mars 1825.

He then shews, at great length, that the sole reason why all the efforts of the Catholic religion, during three or four centuries, to convert the pagans, have failed, is because its ministers have not been employed, like him and his coadjutors, in distributing the Bible amongst them : but he announces, with perfect confidence, that now, since he and those with him have taken up the matter in earnest, the word of God cannot fail to produce its effect, which point he tries to establish by many passages of Scripture. Speaking of the universal victory which the Bible must soon gain over idolaters, he reiterates his gross and injurious epithets against the Catholic religion and its missionaries ; and affirms that this corrupt religion is not worthy of so brilliant a conquest, but that it ought to be the work of Protestantism, or rather of the Bible alone ; so that, according to our author, it is not even necessary to send missionaries to convert the pagans ; it will be sufficient to transport thither some millions of Bibles, without explanation or commentary, and this book will do the business. This is the whole amount of two hundred pages of verbiage in the Friend of India.

May we not tell this author, en passant, that judging of the tree by its fruit, he seems to have entertained hopes which are purely chimerical ? Thirty years have elapsed, during which the Protestant missionaries have appeared in great numbers in India ; they have circulated more than a million of Bibles in that country ; yet, after thirty years of unmolested labour, they yet reckon, according to the author's own acknowledgment, but 1,000 proselytes. May we not, with reference to such a pitiful progress, apply to these gentlemen the fable of mons parturiciens, which, after making the earth resound with its cries, and threatening some terrible convulsion of nature, brought forth a mouse ? For thirty years, we might say to them, you have been filling Europe with pompous reports upon the happy effects of the Bible among the Asiatics. Behold, said you, five or six hundred millions of children ready to be produced on the ruins of idolatry ! But how happens it (the dullest and most credulous might reply), that after the Bible has been for the space of thirty years in all the throes of labour, during which you have made Europe echo with your cries, and led people to expect the most glorious events ; instead of producing millions, only a thousand have been brought forth, and these are abortions—most of whom perish by apostacy almost as soon as they are born ?

The author seeks consolation, if not in the number, at least in the quality, of the new-born children of the Bible. They are, according to him, of the purest gold ; and if we afford implicit credit to what he relates of them, they leave far behind them, in purity of faith, humble devotion, and fervour of piety, the Christians of the apostolic age. I know not if he could find people, even at six thousand leagues distant from the spot, simple enough to believe such tales. As for me, who came from the country, and know it well, I cannot conceive that a person could dare thus to abuse the credulity of the weak and ignorant. The following is an authentic fact, among many others of the same kind I could relate, which was long the subject of conversation in all the circles in India, and which will not seem to confirm the brilliant statement which the author has made of the fervour of these biblical Christians.

About two years before my departure from India, the Protestant missionaries of Serampore found themselves obliged to expel from their service all their new converts, whom they had employed in their printing establishment in order to furnish them with the means of subsistence. The new Christians, having lost their caste, by embracing Christianity, and finding themselves thrown without resource upon society, presented a memorial to the English Bishop of Calcutta, Dr. Middleton, laying before him their distressed situation, and claiming his protection ; they stated to him that when the missionaries made them Christians, they promised to provide them with the means of getting a livelihood : they prayed him, therefore, to interpose, and make them keep their word ; otherwise they should perish with hunger, since they were repudiated and abhorred by their parents and pagan friends. The bishop investigated the affair, and the missionaries alleged, in their justification, that they had been forced to take this step, because these wretches, after being made Christians, became so vicious and intemperate, that they were afraid the example of their daily scandals would ruin all their their pagan workmen. These are the Christians who, according to our author, equal, if they do not surpass in fervour, those of the primitive church!

Can the author of the Friend of India have forgotten the history of the famous Arab, Nathaniel Sabat, who after having been baptized some years (by Dr. Kever, of Madras), was taken into the service of the missionaries of Serampore, to assist them in translating the Bible into Arabic and Persian? Has he forgotten the pompous commendations of his faith and fervour, which they promulgated with so much zeal in England and other places? Has he forgotten what was published about him by (among others) Dr. Claudius Buchanan, who was not ashamed to bestow, in his sermons, an eulogium on the lively faith of this impostor, to whom he presumed to apply the name of The Star in the East; and whom he represented as "the Apostle destined by Providence to make the Sun of Righteousness shine throughout all Asia?" Has he forgotten that this knave, after having completely duped the missionaries for the space of three or four years, during which he was splendidly entertained, was detected in shamefully abusing the confidence he had gained by his hypocrisy, and in availing himself of his free access to the presses of the mission, to print, in Arabic, works of a defamatory kind, and extremely injurious to the Christian religion and to the British government? Is it not remembered, that when he could no longer conceal his knavery, he declared that he had never been a Christian, and had only pretended to be one, in order that he might understand the doctrine and mysteries of the Christian religion, whereby the better to combat them? This wretch died in exile at the Isle of Penang, invoking Mahomet, and blaspheming J—C—. Such was the eclipse of the Star in the East, and such the end of the apostle destined to make the Sun of Truth shed its beams over all Asia!

When I have more leisure, I intend to review, at greater length, the Friend of India; in doing so, I shall endeavour not to exceed the bounds of moderation and decorum; and certainly shall not soil my pen by retorting upon this author the injuries and insults he has lavished upon me, as well as upon those who concur in my opinions.

I have, &c.

HOPE.

WHAT form is that, whose oft-reverted head Invites approach? Her flowing locks of gold, Enwreathed with early flowers, sweet perfume shed,
That stirs the torpid sense to ecstasy;
Thin robes of various hues her limbs infold,
And in her hand a tender bud I see.
I follow—but she flies: her noiseless tread Outstrips my utmost speed. She beckons me,—
And still I urge pursuit—but still in vain!
The artful nymph, with sweet upbraiding glance,
Chides if I linger—flies when I advance;
Yet leaves no trace upon the dewy plain.
Still unsubdued, I chase my fleeting prize,
With panting breath, tired limbs, and straining eyes.

CHINESE

CHINESE COURT-HISTORY.

THERE has been recently put into our hands a manuscript translation* of a work published in China, during the reign of Kien-Lung, entitled P'ih-mei-sha-yung, or "Songs of a Hundred Beautiful Women." It is of the same class of productions with the celebrated Mémoires du Comte de Grammont; but the anecdotes it contains are in general so extravagant, so frivolous and puerile, that it pays but a poor compliment to the understandings of Chinese readers. The author observes in his preface:—

It is easy for heaven to produce plain persons, but very difficult to create handsome women. From the time of the dynasty Chow and Tsin, to the present (a period of about 3,000 years) few lives of handsome women have been recorded. Is the cause of their scarcity owing to the spirits and vapours of hills and rivers? or is it because they live retired, and, being not seen, their histories cannot be known?

The author (who subscribes himself "AN OLD MAN") does not presume to decide which cause is the most probable of the two; but proceeds forthwith to lay before his readers the lives of those beautiful ladies of the Court "who are virtuous." We shall extract a few examples, as illustrative of Chinese manners and peculiarities.

Mei, one of the ladies of the emperor Ming, of the dynasty Tang, could repeat the She-king (book of poetry) when only nine years of age. She told her father, "though I am a girl, I wish to retain this book in my memory;" at which he was astonished. Her former name was Tse-pun, and she entered the palace during the national epithet, Kae-yuen. The emperor was much pleased with her person. Her talents in various kinds of learning placed her on a parallel with the famous Tse-y-nu. She was negligent in her dress, but her charms required no improvement from the hand of the artist. When Yang-ta-ching became a favourite of the emperor, Mei was removed to another apartment. His majesty did not, however, forget her; and a foreign state having sent a tribute of pearls, he ordered it to be given to Mei. She declined the present, and sent his Majesty the following verses in reply:†

"The Kwei-flower's ‡ eyes in languor close
And mine are dim with tears;
Exiled from thee, I scorn repose;
My dress grief's livery wears.
Can presents give my heart relief,
Or paltry pearls dispel my grief?"

LADY SUN was sister to Sun-keuen, king of the state Shih. She married Lew-pe, the then legal sovereign of China. She was a personage of bold and masculine manners, and adopted the customs of her brothers. She maintained upwards of a hundred female attendants, who waited upon her sword in hand. The prince, every time he entered her apartments, was struck with fear!

His imperial Majesty must have found his domestic comforts somewhat abridged by the martial disposition of his spouse.

The following history is of a more pathetic complexion:

WANG-CHAOU-KUEN, otherwise called Wang-tseang, was a lady of respectable family and correct manners. At the age of seventeen she was presented to the emperor Yuen.

* By Mr. Thoms, of the Company's printing establishment, Macao. Its MS. title is "A Sketch of the Lives of the Ladies of the Imperial Palace of China."

† It is proper for us to observe, that the translator has merely given a literal prose version of the poetry in the work. In our metrical version, we have taken no unfair liberties with the text.

‡ This refers to the story of Chang-kwei, the wife of O-tow.

Yuen. His Majesty having ordered a painter to take the portraits of his ladies, Wang-chaou-keuen refused to bestow on the painter a present; he, in revenge, made her portrait a very indifferent one. It happened that the Heung-nao tribe came to court to solicit a handsome woman to be their queen. His Majesty fixed on lady Wang, probably as the lady whose beauty was least attractive to him. Previous to her leaving the palace, the emperor saw her, and was struck with her charms, which were, indeed, evident to all. As it was of importance to keep faith with the tribe, Wang-chaou-keuen was permitted to mount her horse, holding in her hand the musical instrument Pe-pa. His Majesty could not help thinking of her; and pensively retiring into the interior of his palace, ordered the painter and his attendants to be beheaded. When lady Wang crossed the frontiers of her country, she threw herself from the horse, and killed herself. Where she fell the grass faded; it grew only around her grave, which was hence called "The Verdant Tomb."

The following anecdote discovers some analogy to several tales in our language:

QUEEN TOW's father, of the dynasty Tang, was called Oac. He often remarked to his wife, that there was something extraordinary in their daughter, and that they ought not to be indifferent as to her settlement in life. He accordingly caused two peacocks to be painted on a screen, and required those who asked his daughter in marriage to shoot two arrows, and resolved that whoever shot one through each eye of the two birds should gain his daughter's hand. Every suitor missed the mark, except Kaou-tsou, the founder of the flourishing dynasty of Han, who pierced each eye of the birds."

A specimen of the figure which the French call badanderie, is furnished by the next anecdote:

SEÜH-LING-YUEN was remarkably handsome. When Yüeh-süeh governed the district Chang-shan, he gave a large sum for her, to present her to his sovereign, Wei-wan. On leaving her parents, Seüeh-ling-yuen wept till her garments were soiled; whereupon a small spitting dish was given her, which she filled with tears before she reached the capital, and, it is said, they congealed like blood! When his Majesty went to meet her, attended by ten carriages, the whole road from the palace, as far as the eye could reach, was illuminated with lanterns. His Majesty, on account of the late hour at which she arrived, changed her proper name to Ya-lae, which implies, "came at night." Upon her entering the inner apartments of the palace, whilst his Majesty sat below the lamps, Ya-lae ran her forehead, inadvertently, against a crystal screen, seven cubits high, which darted forth instantly a ray of light, like lightning. This incident induced the ladies of the court, out of respect, to paint a wound on their foreheads. Yae-lae was an excellent seamstress, and so expert with her needle, that she could work without a candle. The ladies of the palace called her "the divine needle."

We hardly know in what class to place the following: "

CUO-SÜEH-CHING, when young, delighted in reading. She was considered clever, and composed a collection of songs of a mournful cast: the work was entitled "The Reading of the Intestines!" The following ode was composed on New Year's Eve:

Last new year's eve, when lanterns shed their light,
And when the moon peeped through the willow tree,
A friend, who promised he would come that night,
True to his promise, spent some hours with me.
But on this New Year's Eve, although the same
Moon shone, and lanterns glared like the last year's;
My friend, not having promised, never came;
And I bedew my sleeve with bitter tears.

A specimen of the romantic is found in the history of Kae-yuen.

KAE-YUEN was an attendant at the palace. When the emperor Yuen-sung sent a large large quantity of regimental clothing to the troops on the frontiers (great part of which was made in the imperial palace), one of the soldiers found in the pocket of his coat the following ode :

The soldier in battle with foemen contending,
Through cold and fatigue is unable to rest;
I make then this garment, his person defending
From cold, though I cannot tell who 'twill invest.
Concerned for his welfare, whoever he be,
I add extra stitches to keep out the wind;
And to guard his dear person, though stranger to me,
I stuff a large portion of wadding behind.
'Tis in vain to expect we shall meet in this life;
But I hope I may be, in the next world, his wife.

The soldier gave the ode to his officer, the officer transmitted it to the emperor; his Majesty ordered strict inquiries to be made throughout the palace for the person who wrote it. When Kae-yuen was asked, she replied, "I am deserving of ten thousand deaths." Yuen-sung took compassion upon her; and he married her to the person who found the ode. The soldier, thereupon, observed to her, with a smile: "you and I have, however, come together in this life!"

One anecdote deserves perusal chiefly on account of the natural and poetical images which occur in the verse.

Soo-hwuy was the wife of Tow-taou, alias Jō-lan, and a person of superior attainments. During the viceroyship of Ho-kūn, Tow-taou was a mandarin at Tsin-chow, but was banished for life to the desert Sha-mo. Soo-hwuy, who never ceased to lament him, weaved an ode into the form of an intricate knot, which she presented in his behalf, to the Emperor. It measured seven cubits five inches in width, and was of five different colours. It contained two hundred and eighty characters, and could be read in every direction.

The translator thinks that the squares were woven, and the characters worked in with a needle. Still it is a most ingenious contrivance; and the Emperor's name (which occurs towards the conclusion) is brought conspicuously into the centre. The ode is as follows :

When my husband was banished, I accompanied him to the foot of the bridge; I tried to suppress my grief, but could not say "farewell."

Why, since your departure, have I not received a letter from you?—Remember, our couch, even in spring, is cold. Through grief, I have suffered the staircase you raised to decay; and the windows with white curtains are soiled with dust.

When you left me, my spirits were bewildered:—I wished to become the shadow of the moon in the sea; or a cloud that flits over the lofty mountains.

The clouds behold my husband's face; as doth the sea-moon in her monthly journey. They can discern him though at the distance of ten thousand lee.

Since we parted, the green rushes by the river's side have faded; and who would have believed that, ere we met, the Mei should blossom again and again.

Every flower unfolds itself to meet the spring; yet our hearts expand in vain.—My thoughts are employed upon your return alone; so that the willow at the door bends to the ground; and there is none to sweep away the falling flowers.

The grass before our cottage grows rank; your flute hangs unemployed in the hall. My husband no more sings to me a Keang-nan song.

For three springs have I heard the wild-fowl utter their cries in crossing the river.—My spirits faint ere my favourite kin becomes relaxed: grief ends my song.

O, husband, forget not your wife, whose affections are firm as a mountain, and who thinks of you incessantly. She weaves this letter, and presents it to his IMPERIAL MAJESTY, beseeching him to grant you a speedy return.

The Emperor pitied Soo-hwuy, and recalled Tow-taou from exile.

HINDU-CHINESE COUNTRIES.

THE term "Hindu-Chinese" was, we think, first employed by Dr. Leyden, and it is certainly more appropriate than the vague and clumsy one of the old geographers, "India beyond the Ganges." The Hindu-Chinese countries may be correctly stated to extend from 7° to 26° N. latitude, and from E. longitude 93° to 109° . The whole of this region is at present divided among three great powers, viz. the Cochin Chinese, who hold the eastern portion; the Siamese, who hold the central; and the Burmans, who hold the western part. Besides mountaineers, and other small and uncivilized tribes, which are numerous, this wide region contains eight considerable nations, viz. the Aracan or Rutkeng; the proper Burman; the Pegu, or Mon; the Siamese, or Thai; the Lao, frequently written Laos; the Kambojian, or Khammen; the Cochin Chinese and Tonquinese, called by themselves Anam, and by their neighbours Yuan; and the Malays. These, with the exception of the latter, form one great group of nations, who, although at the eastern and western extremities, they partake respectively of the character of Chinese and Hindu civilization, bear a strong resemblance to each other in point of language, religion, institutions, and general character.

Amidst the general similitude here referred to, some striking discrepancies must be noticed. The Burmans, the Peguans, the Siamese, the Lao, and the Kambojians, profess the worship of Buddha, with scarcely any variation: they are bigotted, and overrun by priests. In Cochin China and Tonquin, on the contrary, Buddhism has made but slender progress, and its priests are at best despised and neglected. Of the whole of this group of nations it may be said that, in point of civilization, they are greatly inferior to the Chinese, inferior to the Hindoos, the Persians, the Arabians, and the agricultural Tartars; but that they stand considerably higher than any of the nations of the Asiatic islands. There are some palpable and unequivocal signs of barbarism about them, which all their pride cannot conceal; such as being dirty in their persons, indiscriminate in their diet, holding female virtue cheaply, being cruel, and not viewing corporeal punishment, or hard words, as any disgrace. According to our notions, it is not easy to be respectable with such a catalogue of infirmities; and, in truth, the Hindu-Chinese nations are not much entitled to our esteem.

Taking the three great states in the order in which we have enumerated them, the following is a sketch of Cochin China. — It is bounded to the east by the sea; to the north by the Chinese provinces of Canton, Quangsai, and Yunnan; and to the west by the dominions of Siam, principally consisting of Lao. The boundary between Cochin China and Siam, on the gulf of the latter, is well ascertained to be the island of Koh Kong, between the 11th and 12th degrees of N. latitude. The dominions of Cochin China seem no where to touch directly upon those of Ava. The most easy intercourse between them might be carried on by the great river of Kamboja, called by the Burmans Men-kwan-nit.

The Burmans have settlements towards the upper part of this stream, before it enters Tonquin; but the territory of Lantao, a subdivision of Laos, under Siam, intervenes. This last is, we presume, from its situation, the country which the editor of Bissachere announces as a new kingdom, and a new geographical discovery, and which, in his fabricated and unfaithful work (lauded notwithstanding in the Edinburgh Review), he places in the title-page as one of the dependent kingdoms of the present Cochin Chinese empire.

The Cochin Chinese empire is of very irregular and unequal form. It is at present divided into three great municipal jurisdictions, or distinct governments, viz. that of Tonquin, containing fifteen provinces; that of Cochin China, containing nine; and that of Kamboja, containing six. Tonquin is the largest, the most fertile, and populous of these. It is inhabited by the nation called by themselves Anam, the progenitors of the present race of conquerors of the whole empire.

The subdivision of Cochin China itself extends from about the latitude of 18° N. to between 10° and 11° . It is but a narrow strip of land running along the coast, and which seldom exceeds fifteen or twenty leagues broad. It is generally bounded to the west by the kingdom of Lao. In this province, the people of Anam appear as conquerors. The original inhabitants, known by the name of Loy, are now confined to the mountains, and still follow a modification of the Hindoo religion. This is the country called Champa in our maps.

The province of Kamboja is but a modern acquisition: it extends from Cape St. James's, between the 10th and 11th degrees of N. latitude, in the China sea, to nearly the same parallel on the gulf of Siam: thus embracing the whole peninsula of Kamboja. In the interior, and along the course of the great river, it extends much further, reaching at least as far as 14°. The most numerous portion of the inhabitants of this province are the proper Kambojians. The Anam race are the masters. The original inhabitants of that portion of it lying to the eastward of the great river, and bordering upon Lao, are a tribe called Mui.

Within the dominions of Cochin China there are two great rivers, that of Tonquin, and that of Kamboja; and the presence or absence of these determines the general character and aspect of the country. The vallies of Tonquin and Kamboja, through which they flow, are extensive, fertile, and comparatively populous. The rest of the kingdom, especially the province of Cochin China, consists of primitive mountains and narrow vallies, and in proportion to the other two parts is thinly inhabited.

The river of Tonquin is described as having its origin in the mountains of Yunan, and is conjectured to run a course of above 400 miles. The river of Kamboja has a much longer course: it is said to have its origin in a lake within the Chinese province of Yunan, and to be navigable for boats, before entering Lao, between the 22d and 23d degrees of N. latitude. It is evidently one of the largest rivers in Asia; and although it is not probable that it conveys so large a body of water as the Ganges, or has by any means such a number of tributary streams; it would appear to run as long a navigable course, which may be conjectured at not less than 1,500 miles, the whole of which is within the tropics. It flows through the kingdoms of Lao and Kamboja, falling into the sea in about the latitude of 10°, by three distinct mouths.

The following is a brief sketch of Siam. —To the east it may generally be described as being bounded by the Cochin Chinese territories; to the north it touches upon Yunan, but more generally on the Burman territories; to the west and north-west it is bounded by the Burman frontier, as far as the latitude of 11° north, at the river of Pak-chan, opposite the island of Domel; and in every other direction by the Bay of Bengal, and the Straits of Malacca. To the south, the Siamese territories extended to the latitude of 7° N. and are here bounded by the Malay states of Queda and Patani, both of which, as well as three other Malay states, viz. Perak, Calantan, and Tringanu, are tributaries to the Siamese: thus carrying their boundary down to between the 3d and 4th degrees of north latitude. In the map of Col. Symes, the Burman frontier is pushed down to between the 17th and 18th degrees. This may probably have had its origin in the exaggerations of his Burman informers; for there does not appear, from all we have been able to learn, any just grounds for this assumption. From the best information we have been able to obtain, we are inclined to fix the extreme northern limit of the Siamese territory, where it touches upon China, in between 22° and 23° N. lat.; and where it touches on the Ava territory, between 21° and 22°; and its western limit, where it is bounded by the Burman territories, in about the 98th degree of E. longitude.

The Siamese empire consists of the following members, of each of which a rapid notice will be necessary, viz. Siam, or the proper country of the Siamese, or dominant race; the kingdom of Lao; a portion of Kamboja; a small portion of the Mon or Pegu territory, with the tributary Malay states; and those of some mountain tribes.

The proper Siamese, called by themselves Thai, occupy principally the valley of the Menam, and the country watered by its tributary streams, from the latitude of 13° to about 20°. They also occupy the whole of the peninsula, from the head of the gulf, down to the latitude of 7°, where, at Trang on one side, and Sungora on the other, they meet the Malay nation. From Trang up to Pak-chan, in the latitude tude of 11°, the peninsula is occupied by the Siamese race, and they at present possess the exclusive dominion of this portion. This includes the island of Junk-ceylon, the inhabitants of which are Siamese, and the possession of which, with exceptions scarcely worth naming, has always belonged to them. It may be proper to mention, however, that in the year 1810, the Burmans invaded this place for the last time, with a large force, and kept possession of it for several months. Being, however, without provisions, the people of the country being hostile to them, and a Siamese force having presented itself, they were compelled to surrender at discretion. On this occasion the chiefs were beheaded, and the lower orders, to the number of 4,000, carried off as prisoners and slaves to Siam, where many of them are still to be seen in the same state.

From Pak-chan up to Martaban, in the latitude of 16° 30', two-thirds of the peninsula, or of the territory lying between the western sea and the valley of the Menam, still belong to the Siamese. Opposite to the port of Tavoy, the Burman boundaries are marked by three pagodas or temples. Both the island of Junk-ceylon, and the whole coast of Tenasserim, constitute a mountainous, woody, almost uncultivated and very thinly inhabited region, remarkable for no valuable property, except the abundance of its tin ore, and good harbours to the eastward of Junk-ceylon.*

* Abridged from the Singapore Chronicle. This description of the Tenasserim coast varies from other accounts.—Ed.

THE EVILS OF POETRY.

SOME writer has defined poetry to be "the art of perverting words from their primitive meaning." This definition is perhaps open to exception; and the irritable race, whose pursuit it is calculated to degrade, will entertain little respect for the understanding which produced it.

The office of poetry is to relate events and to describe objects by means of tropes, metaphors, and images borrowed from any topic whatsoever supposed to bear an analogy, however remote or recondite, to the matter treated of; and as terms must originally have been limited each to a single and distinct object or idea, the writer does really seem to have some ground of defence; at least there appears evidence enough to let the case go to the jury.

Let us take a verse at random, by way of experiment: the opening lines of the eleventh book of Pope's translation of the Iliad, for example:

"The saffron morn, with early blushes spread,
Now rose refulgent from Tithonus' bed."

- Suppose this verse to be plainly propounded to a plain man, who knew nothing of poetry. As soon as he comprehended its meaning, he would be shocked at the absurdity and falsehood it contains. The morning, that is, the approach of the sun from the lower to the upper hemisphere, is represented to be a female; she is described as rising from a gentleman's bed; she is said to blush at doing what she has daily done, in the face of the whole world, for some thousand years; and her blushes are of a yellow hue! He would think it an insult to his understanding to be told that the expressions implied merely that it was day-break. In fact, there is scarcely a word in the passage which conveys its genuine primitive meaning; for even the term "morn" is used equivocally.

Poets themselves, who, although they strenuously resist the sacrilegious assaults of others upon their holy art, yet, in their mutual dissensions, occasionally reveal their mysteries to the vulgar, sometimes employ their skill in endeavouring to demonstrate that the definition we are considering is substantially correct.

Voltaire

Voltaire never pointed his ridicule more effectively against our Shakespeare, than in those parts of his criticism where he gives a prose translation, in ordinary language, of the poet's sublimest passages. An English reader, vexed and exasperated as he must be, cannot refrain from a laugh at the critic's relation of the interview between Hamlet and his mother. He represents the former (either disingenuously by design, or through a most egregious blunder) as being really persuaded that there was a rat behind the hangings; and as incessantly whipping out his rapier, making a pass at the wall, and, instead of a rat, killing a Lord Chamberlain: in the French author's cacophonic phrase—il tue le bon homme, Polone!

Previous to Voltaire's time, the English poets in the reign of Charles II. employed a similar species of torture upon each other; and many a gaudy poem was thereby converted into a mass of nonsense and inanity. The umbrage which the success of Elkanah Settle's play, "The Empress of Morocco," gave to Dryden, is well known. The latter employed this very expedient to expose his adversary to ridicule; and Johnson has inserted, in the life of Dryden, a few specimens of the operation, which singularly confirm the truth of the definition. We shall subjoin one by way of example:

"To flattering lightning our feigned smiles conform, Which, backed with thunder, do but gild a storm."

Empress of Morocco.

Dryden observes here: "Conform a smile to lightning, make a smile imitate lightning, and flattering lightning! Lightning sure is a threatening thing: and this lightning must gild a storm. Now, if I must conform by smiles to lightning, then my smiles must gild a storm too: to gild with smiles is a new invention of gilding. And gild a storm by being backed with thunder! Thunder is part of the storm; so one part of the storm must help to gild another part, and help by backing; as if a man could gild a thing better for being backed, or having a load upon his back! So that here is gilding by conforming, smiling, lightning, backing, and thundering."

To convince the world that his own verses were not peculiarly susceptible of this species of ridicule, Settle subjected Dryden's next play (the second part of the "Conquest of Granada") to a similar operation, with similar success.

If both authors had used words which conveyed their original meaning, it is evident that this criticism would have been inapplicable; it follows, therefore, not only that the definition is true, but that poets know it to be true, although they are too politic to make the avowal.

Dr. Warton, after the hint of Horace, recommends* that, in criticising a poem, we should drop entirely the measures and numbers, and transpose and invert the order of the words; and peruse the work in this unadorned manner. "If," says he, "there be really in it a true poetical spirit, all your inversions and transpositions will not disguise and extinguish it." With submission to this writer, it is requisite to carry the process further, within the obvious meaning of the Roman author; and to clothe the poem in plain language. Let us try this rule, thus corrected, upon perhaps the most elaborate poem in the English language, Gray's Elegy; the opening stanza of which will appear thus:

"It is now about eight o'clock in the evening; the cattle are slowly quitting the

* Dedication to Dr. Young of his "Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope."

the fields; the tired ploughman is trudging home; and I am left alone in the dark."

Such are the jejune contents of this exquisite stanza, which is thus reduced to a mere caput mortuum.

It may perhaps be objected, that as all nations cultivate poetry at an early period, and that as it is most common amongst the rudest people, the art is probably coeval with language; and that, therefore, the poetical force and signification of a term convey its primitive meaning. This objection is hypercritical; but we may dispose of it by observing, that a given term must be well understood to denote one object before it can be employed figuratively to signify another.

The definition is defensible, moreover, not merely by considering the abuse of isolated terms in poetry; but likewise the general practice of equivocation which the art sanctions and inculcates: there being scarcely any species of prevarication and falsehood which has not been regularly authorised by a rule or law, to which critics are not allowed to demur. Horace, indeed, candidly admits that poets and painters may say and do just what they please with equal impunity:

Quidlibet audendi semper fuit æqua potestas."

Fiction, as Aristotle allows, is the soul of poetry: and this maxim is not more exemplified in the topics chosen by poets, than in the language they employ to express them. That which in plain prose is pronounced a lie, in poetry is denominated hyperbole; to assert one thing and mean another, is not termed deceit, but hypotyposis: where a person really does what he declares he will not do, it is only an aposiopesis in a poet, but is considered a most dishonourable act in any other person; and behaviour which, in ordinary cases, would perhaps justify a commission of lunacy, is extolled as an example of prosopopeia, if the individual be of the privileged fraternity of the Muses. Should an officer of the British army, present at a battle, deliberately affirm, in proper prose, that he beheld his commanding officer hurl fiery thunderbolts at the enemy, singing and scorching all who were opposed to him, he would either be considered a fit object for the lunatic asylum, or would be sent before a court-martial, "for scandalous and infamous conduct, unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman." But if this statement were made in poetry, he would not only pass uncensured, but would be justified, and could express himself no otherwise; it being the customary mode of describing in poetry the actions of a general who sits quietly on horseback whilst his men are fighting.

The foregoing considerations will afford us a faint idea of the state of things in Arcadia. From the representations transmitted to us by ancient authors respecting that condition of society, we are necessarily led to conclude that the ordinary language was poetry; and making every allowance for the operation of those conventional arrangements by which, as in "The Tale of a Tub," a crust of dry bread might have been understood to signify a piece of juicy mutton, as well as for the absence of dishonest intention amongst the people; still there must have been so much practical confusion, that it is not wonderful that the system should soon become extinct. What interminable and embarrassing doubts must have been suggested to the mind of an Arcadian Lord Chancellor upon consideration of the intent and true construction of legal instruments! A bequest or legacy might be construed, per irquam, to mean loss of inheritance: the words pay the bearer might, per metathesin, signify signify let the bearer pay: and I promise, it might have been speciously contended, amounted only, per erotesin, to a mere joke,—I promise, indeed?

Here it may be argued that no laws existed in Arcadia, and that therefore there could be no need of the instruments referred to. But if there were no laws, there could have been no poetry; for unless our idea of poetry be altogether metaphysical, we must conceive it to be an art subject to rules, and bound by certain strict laws of syllabic arrangement. In fact, although the assertion may seem paradoxical, yet it is nevertheless true, that no species of poetry is encumbered with so many rules as that which is generally accounted the most irregular. The argument, therefore, by proving too much, is worth nothing.

We are, by an easy gradation, naturally led to consider whether the cultivation of an art, the very essence of which is deception, be not prejudicial to public morals. This is, however, too grave and serious a question for us to discuss upon the present occasion. It cannot be disputed that poetry has tended, in various ways, to unsettle the brains, and bewilder the understandings, of many individuals, who might otherwise have benefited society. Many a scholar has wasted his time and his oil, many a pains-taking traveller has risked his health and his life, in endeavouring to recognize the site of Troy; whereas the world, which happily grows rapidly wiser, is now disposed to adopt the opinion that such a town never existed, save on the fancy of a poet, whose existence, moreover, there is very strong reason to doubt.

We may observe, by the way, that inculcating the laws of poetical prosody on the rising generation (and thereby subduing that repugnance to deceit which nature seems kindly to have implanted in the human breast) has perhaps been the occasion of more bloodshed than any single war (that of Troy not excepted) within the knowledge or memory of men.

Again; it seems the essential attribute of poetry to have a tendency to make its votaries, really or in imagination, miserable. That poets often suffer actual distress is amply proved: Petrarch has left behind a sonnet, in which he prays his cat to lend him the light of her eyes, as he cannot afford to purchase a candle. But whether rich or poor, poets are invariably complaining, either of the world or their mistresses.

To revert, however, to our former topic, the uncertainty and ambiguity arising from the distorted language of poetry; examples might be multiplied without end, to demonstrate the mischief produced thereby; from that of Pyrrhus, who lost his kingdom and his life through misunderstanding—

Aio te, Eacida, Romanos vincere posse;

to that of Prince, the piper, who, according to Phædrus, was kicked out of the Roman theatre because he mistook, very naturally, the line uttered by the chorus of the play,— as referring to his own recovery from the effects of a broken leg.

Having thus shown how much may be advanced in favour of the definition which represents poetry to be the art of distortion; and having also alleged some special matter of reproach against that art and its professors; the reader, if he is candid and unbiassed, will concur with us in admiring the prudence of Plato, who has banished poets and excluded poetry from his ideal commonwealth.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

Extracts of a Letter from a Gentleman in London.

You were desirous of some details of our colony in Mr. Van Diemen's Land; and it will afford me much pleasure to send you such information as I was enabled to gain of it present state.

The situation of Hobart's Town is imposing; it is built a few miles below a mountain, called Mount Wellington, which is 3,500 feet in height, and covered with snow six months of the year; it requires a tour of fifteen miles to gain the summit.

The anchorage in the harbour is safe and convenient; ships of large burthen being able to lay within hail of the pier, which is thrown out to give facility for landing goods. Settlers' cottages are numerous on the banks of the river, and have a picturesque appearance.

On landing, all new settlers have an interview with the Governor, who is thereby made acquainted with their views, and former line of life.

Entering Hobart's Town, I was much struck with the ragamuffin appearance of the inhabitants; a well-dressed man being rarely seen. The convicts, or government men, as they are termed, are distinguished by yellow suits.

The streets are of a good width, but unpaved, consequently cut up by the carts and constant thoroughfare of merchandize and cattle. This causes the town to be more dirty and wretched-looking, than the most ill-favoured country village in England.

Neither is the interior of the houses much more delectable; few have attained the luxury of papering, and exhibit naked plastered walls. The furniture is of English manufacture; carpets are commonly dispensed with.

From the spirit of emigration hither, which prevails in Britain, the town is yearly increasing in size and importance: it already consists of 700 houses, chiefly brick; and the inhabitants in these are pretty closely packed.

The public buildings consist of a church, which is a handsome brick structure; court-house of stone; governor's residence, government store-house, and gaol: these are situated in the principal street, called Macquarie Street. A stream of water runs through the town, which turns two flour mills. The inns are paltry, ill-adapted to contain the occasional influx of strangers, which an arrival from England or Scotland ever and anon occasions. Hence the encouragement to the few more opulent inhabitants to build, in order to let their houses to lodgers at high rents.

The settler, on his arrival, takes up his abode in a temporary residence, expecting to increase his capital by the sale of his venture, he opens his store, or wine-lic; disposes of his goods; is gulled with flattering accounts; attendant expenses and had debts soon swallow up both capital and profit. This state of affairs does not forward his previous determination of occupying a grant of land, which he finds is fixed some hundred miles from his present abode; at present a forest of well-grown trees, which he is without the funds requisite to fell or burn off. The result is, he is contented to retain his shop, and gain a miserable pittance by this expedient. Such is the picture of many of the shopkeepers of Hobart's Town! Other settlers there are of larger funds, and better acquainted with the colony, having previously visited it, probably as masters of ships: these purchase an estate from some previous occupant who has not funds or inclination to continue a hard-earned livelihood. They bring stock and labourers to their newly-acquired property, and vigorously burn off the trees, on the half-cleared estate, sow wheat, and keep cattle, which they send to market, and receive in exchange a few of the necessities of life: not farmers by trade, yet well adapted, by their former mode of life, to controul their labourers, who are hired from government.

The soil and climate favour their crops, which, though occasionally subject to smut, grow luxuriantly. The farming is rude, many being content to plough round the stumps of the lately cleared ground. Time and expense not allowing them to root them out.

The staple crops are wheat and potatoes. Wheat may be considered the chief export of the colony: this is sent to Sydney, the Mauritius, and Rio Janeiro, though these have generally proved precarious speculations.

The

The principal corn district is at Port Dalrymple, a settlement on the N. E. side of the island, and 150 miles by land. Wool, hides, whale oil, and skins are likewise shipped to Europe.

The climate of this island is fine in the extreme; in July we found it about the temperature of an English spring; thermometer in the shade, 52°; mornings occasionally frosty, but seldom fog. In summer, the heat does not exceed that of an English summer; thermometer, highest range, 86°; neither is it subject to the droughts of Sydney. The soil, dark, rich, and loamy, with quarries of limestone. European fruits and vegetables are cultivated with success.

The animals, native of the country, are few and diminutive: the kangaroo, opossum, and wild cat are the most numerous. The birds have fine plumage; roselle parrots, black cockatoos, quails, mountain and wild duck, black swans, and the wattle-bird, resembling the thrush, are found.

The rivers have bold shores, and good depths, abounding with mullet, a sort of perch, crawfish, and oysters. The streams are rapid after rains, running seven or eight miles per hour.

Of the state of society (excepting those officers holding official appointments), I cannot speak favourably. Many of the settlers are men of broken fortunes, and questionable character. The merchants combine the retail with the wholesale trade, and are seen, in many instances, behind the counter; neither is it unusual to find the shopkeepers emancipated convicts.

The convicts, who are not granted to the inhabitants as mechanics, labourers, or servants, or those who have been returned as bad subjects, are employed on government works, or in roads, and as clearing gangs. Mechanics work from eight till three; two days in a week they receive their rations, and are mustered clean on Sundays, previous to church. They are provided with two suits a-year, which they are at liberty to wear or not. If mechanics, they earn much money by working after hours. In cases of complaint for neglect of duty, they are liable to be flogged, and, for more serious offences, to be transported to McQuarrie Harbour.

The settlement at McQuarrie is situated on the western side of the island, up a river, on which there is a detachment under a lieutenant. The regulations for these outcasts are very severe: they work in irons from day-light until dark; their rations consist of 1 lb. of meat and bread. No spirits are allowed, nor have they the power of buying any addition. Their work consists of sawing and cutting down hewn pine, working in swampy ground: this wood is sent to Hobart's Town in colonial vessels, and is used for building. The situation of these men is so deplorable, that some have attempted to make their escape, and have perished in the woods. One party of eight endeavoured to find their way to Hobart's Town, and had recourse to the dreadful expedient of living on each other, by lots, until they were reduced to two; when the weaker, being afraid of his companion, took an opportunity of chopping his head off. The survivor, being discovered at Hobart's Town, was re-transported.

Instances of flagrant vice seldom offend: cattle stealing is the most common offence. The government very wisely have prohibited racing and theatrical amusements. The Sunday exhibits here a marked advantage over our eastern possessions, and is a season of rest to all classes. Religious ordinances are well performed.

From these cursory remarks, you will be of opinion with me, that Van Diemen's Land presents to an emigrant few of the domestic comforts of England, and that he will have many hardships and privations to encounter.

HISTORY OF COTTON.*

For many centuries, the Greeks and the Romans designated the vegetables which produced cotton merely by the epithet wool-bearing, because they imagined that it consisted of a species of down adhering to the bark. The plants are really of two sorts: the bombax, or cotton-tree; and the gossypium, or herbaceous cotton-shrub, or plant. The principal characters of distinction are the form of the capsule, which contains the seeds imbedded in the down; and the number of valves. The capsule of the bombax is orbicular, elongated, and has five valves; that of the cotton-shrub has but three or four valves, and is round. Lastly, the bombax is a tree; and the cotton-shrub is an annual or biennial plant, though some species are known to be perennial.

Herodotus, who wrote in the fifth century before the vulgar era, and who travelled in Egypt, is the most ancient writer who has mentioned cotton. What he says is applicable to the bombax, which he might have seen in Upper Egypt. He might also have acquired the same particulars from the Persians, who then supplied Greece with the products of India. At all events, we find from Aristophanes, a writer of the same period, that the Persians brought to Athens woollen cloaks of such value that they sold for about £200 sterling. So extravagant a price leads one to think that they must have been manufactured from the wool of the goat of North-India, and that they were a species of cashmeres. It is well known how unvarying is Asiatic taste; and hence the remark can scarcely be considered paradoxical.

Alexander was diligently employing his attention, in the midst of his conquests, upon the commerce of Asia with Europe and Africa. His victories, indeed, by subverting the throne of Darius, diverted trade from its ancient track across Bactriana (now Bokhara), situated to the eastward of the Caspian sea and Persia. But the Macedonian hero founded Egyptian Alexandria, and opened a new channel to the commerce of Central Asia and India, by the Red Sea and Egypt. He sent Nearchus with a fleet to survey the Indian ocean, from the mouths of the Indus to the Persian Gulf. It is most probably, from the reports of this bold navigator, that Theophrastus, who does not appear to have travelled either in India or Arabia, has so accurately described, in one passage, the bombax with its lobed-leaf, like those of certain mulberry-trees; and in another, the gossypium, with its spherical capsule, like an apple. Strabo tells us that the Macedonians made mattresses, and pads for their horses, with the down of the wool-bearing tree, instead of hair or flock. This refers to the bombax, the cotton of which is still used to make cushions, mattresses, and pillows, by the inhabitants of the Sunda islands and those of Brazil.† The name of capak is given in commerce to this species of cotton, which is extremely fine, as soft as silk, but so short that it cannot be spun.

Here ends the list of authors who have mentioned cotton, before the vulgar era, that is to say, before the Romans had united Egypt to their vast empire; which event enabled them to acquire more certain information regarding the products of India.

Although the Hebrews always neglected commerce and shunned intercourse with

* Translated and abridged from a Memoir, read before the French Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, 30th July 1824, in the Biblioth. Univer. of Geneva.

† The writer seems here to labour under a mistake: the silky vegetable down used in Brazil for stuffing cushions, pillows, &c., is not the produce of the bombax, but of a species of acacias, the pods of which are long. There is a species of bombax in Java, the down of which is used for the same purpose.—Ed. A. J.

with other nations, they nevertheless received thence articles of luxury, with which they adorned the temple of Jerusalem. The Hebrew text of the sacred books often speaks of a precious tissue what they called Scherick, translated Byssos in the version of the Septuagint, and Byssus in the Vulgate. It is very likely that this refers to cotton. We can state that the Septuagint have given it the name which it bore in Egypt, in the third century before the vulgar era, when they wrote at Alexandria; since we perceive it in the Rosetta inscription, which states that Ptolemy Epiphanes levied a tax upon cotton wool and cotton fabrics manufactured in his territories. The Greeks still gave cotton no other name than that of wool-bearing vegetable.

Virgil speaks of cotton in his Georgicks; but he describes it likewise as a wool which the Seres gathered from the leaves of certain trees. The name of the people raises a doubt here which we must endeavour to remove. The passage is supposed to indicate the Chinese, and silk, which they still call ser.* It is true, that from the age of Alexander down to the reign of Justinian, silk, which sold for its weight in silver, and sometimes for its weight in gold, and which was regarded in Europe as the product of animals living upon trees, arrived in Western Asia by the same channel as cotton. These valuable articles were brought by caravans, which, after having received the silk from the Seres, properly so called (namely, the Chinese), transported it across the countries situated to the north of India, one of which, Bactriana, was also known under the name of Serica, and deposited it upon the eastern shores of the Caspian Sea, from whence it was conveyed to those of the Black Sea. The Russian caravans which proceed to China or Hindostan still follow the same route, and traverse Bokharu, the Bactriana of the ancients.

Cotton was doubtless called seric, as well as silk, from its arriving in Europe by the same channel. Arrian, or the author of the Voyage from the Red Sea into India, which is attributed to him, and who wrote in the second century, enumerates the articles of merchandize imported from India and Arabia into Egypt, and those which were carried from Egypt in exchange. This writer designates by the adjective seric even the skins brought from the oriental regions. This double application of the epithet seric is supported, besides, by the following passage in Pliny (lib. 34, c. 41): "The best iron," he observes, "is that of Serica; it comes to us from the Seres, with their cloths and skins." The iron, or rather steel, of India (wooltz), is celebrated up to the present day, and is much sought after for certain manufactures. Pliny and Solinus benefited by the correct notions of cotton which the Macedonians acquired on the banks of the Indus, and the Romans in the province of Egypt. It is very probable that the Egyptians had only cultivated the bombax anterior to the Ptolemys; since Herodotus, who visited Egypt a short time before that epoch, spoke only of the cotton-tree. But Pliny expressly says, that in his time (the first century), there was cultivated in Upper Egypt,* opposite to Arabia, a shrub, called gossypion, and χίλον; and that it bore a fruit, like a nut, filled with wool, which was spun. He is the first author we are acquainted with who has employed the term gossypium. Pliny also tells us that the Arabians

* This is not altogether correct. The name of silk in the Mandarin dialect is ser or shu. M. Klaproth had conjectured that the final r, which identified this word with the ser of the Greeks, had been retrenched in pronunciation, and that this letter might perhaps be discovered in the ancient Chinese dialects spoken upon the frontiers of the empire. The conjecture was supported by the fact that the r was found in the languages of people more to the west. In Mongol, silk is called szikok; in Mandchou, szikok; in Armenian, the name of the silk-worm is acheram. But M. Abel Remusat has converted probability into certainty: he has found, in a Chinese vocabulary, the Chinese szee rendered by ser, and ser, a horse, by ser. The conjecture of M. Klaproth is thus completely confirmed.

Arabians cultivated a cotton-tree with long fruit, like gourds. Here we find the cotton-tree and cotton-plant well known and cultivated in Egypt. The Rosetta inscription already cited, as well as innumerable cotton bandages which envelope the mummies (two hundred ells have been found round a single individual), prove that, in the valley of the Nile, there were many cotton manufactories, independently of those of linen.

*In the second century, the cotton tree was cultivated in Europe in Elis or the Western Morea. Pausanias saw, as he states, the bysus, sown there along with hemp and flax; and he distinguishes it perfectly from silk, which he says was produced by certain insects. Pollux, a contemporary writer, draws the same distinction between silk and cotton. It is the herbaceous cotton-plant, and not the bombar, of which he speaks; for he remarks that the capsule, which contains the cotton, resembles a nut, and opens in three valves. The Arabians transported it from India by the Red Sea not only woven and dyed, but in wool, as we learn from the author of the Periplus of the Erythrean Sea.

Egypt, which, after Asia, seems to have been the first nation which practised the mechanic arts, thenceforward furnished Europe, as India had done, with dyed cotton fabrics. The Egyptians even employed mordants, which fact leads to the conclusion that, practically at least, their knowledge of the art of dyeing was somewhat advanced. But the dyed cotton cloths of India were remarkable for the brilliancy of their colours; they also excited surprise by the extravagance of the designs on them. The poet Claudian has left us a description of these designs, which, though perhaps exaggerated, is nevertheless curious. He wished to paint the astonishment with which the Greeks and Romans were seized upon learning the elevation of the eunuch Eutropius to the consulate:

Atque aliquis, gravior morum, Si talibus, inquit, Creditur, ~~et~~ pimiis turgent mendacia mon-stris.
Jam testudo volat, profert jam cornua vultus;
Prona petunt retro fluvii juga: Gadibus ortum
Carmani texere diem: jam frugibus aptum
Æquor, et advectum silvis delphina videbo:
Jam cochleis homines junctos et quidquid inane Nutrit, Judaicis quæ pingitur India velis.

We here recognize that species of painting called Arabesque, which Raphael has so ingeniously employed in the Vatican.

James de Vitry, who died in 1244, and who was in Palestine during the Crusades, is the first of the western writers who has used the word cotton:* "There are," says he, "in the east, shrubs springing from seeds, which produce the bombar, called by the French coton, between wool and flax, with which they weave thin cloths." Cotton is still designated by the names bombagia, and bombazo, at Milan and in Sicily, an island where the people of the west first cultivated and manufactured it. The Arabians, who raised it before our era, called it q'holtan, and it was very plausibly conjectured that this name was given it from Cottonara (hodie Canara) on the coast of Malabar, from whence the Arabian vessels and those of the Ptolemys transported it into Arabia by the Persian Gulf, and into Egypt by the Red Sea.

The writer of the Memoir adds, in conclusion, the following fact :

"I was of opinion that the primitive name of a production of India ought to be found in the primitive language of that peninsula, namely, the Sanscrit—the mother-tongue of so many others. Those of my associates who are familiar with it acquaint me, that the name of cotton in that language is karpasam, as well as that of cotton-stuff. This information has enabled me to trace the origin of Καρπασος, which denotes, in Arrian, the vegetable 'with which,' says he, 'they manufacture in India their common cloths.' The Latin carbasus, employed by Lucretius to designate the drapery extended over the theatres to screen the spectators from the heat of the sun, has the same origin."

ACCOUNT OF MUSCAT.

(From a Bombay Paper.)

THE territory at present under the Government of the Imam of Muscat, and comprizing what is generally termed the kingdom of Oman, is situated between the 22d and 27th degrees of north latitude, and the 50th and 60th degrees of east longitude; having an extent of coast of near 500 miles, with a number of very good ports and roadsteads; the principal of which are Muscat (the capital); Muttra, close to it; Burka, Suak, Sohar, Korfacan, Shenav, Deba, and Limn, to the northward; Calliatte, Zive, and Rasal Huud, to the southward. From all these places there is a considerable native trade to most parts of Arabia, Persia, and Scind; and from Muscat to all parts of India, to the Red Sea, the Isles of France and Bourbon, and the coast of Africa. The ports of Bunder Abbas, and Menow or Minah, on the coast of Persia, and the islands of Kishma, Leirak, and Ormuz, are farmed by the Imam from the Persian Government; several places on the coast of Meckram and the island of Zanzibar, with several other settlements on the coast of Africa, acknowledge the sovereignty of the Imam. The whole of his annual revenue is estimated at 480,000 German crowns, out of which his disbursements, on account of government, are very small, the feudal system being here in full force. The governors of the several districts receive no salaries; on the contrary, unless they are strong enough to resist it, have to pay an annual sum to the Imam, particulars of which I shall mention hereafter. Near the coast, the country is mostly mountainous; inland, more or less elevated, and, at a short distance from the coast, generally well cultivated; affording wheat, barley, the most delicious fruits, such as grapes, pomegranates, mulberries, oranges, limes, citrons, dates, almonds, and most tropical fruits in great abundance. The cattle are, also, particularly fine. The coast abounds with most excellent fish, which are very plentiful and cheap in the markets. To make use of an old saying, it is "a country for which God has done much, and man little." There are also several hot springs, the principal of which are at Boshar and Rustock.

The present sultan, or as he is termed, Imam, Syed Ibn Sultan, succeeded to the undisturbed supreme power on the assassination of his elder brother, Kasee Ibn Sultan, in 1807 or 1808, by Biddo Ibn Saaf. He is about forty-eight or fifty years of age, of most prepossessing appearance, and possessed of considerable abilities; he observes carefully all political events in Arabia or India, and cautiously turns to his own advantage whatever favours his views of government. He has established a very respectable naval force, by means of which he is able to keep in awe that part of his dominions either on, or bordering on, the coast, and secures the revenue, which would otherwise seldom be paid. His government is despotic in the extreme; and nothing but the protection he is supposed to receive from the British Government prevents frequent revolts. The greater part of the island

* We have reason to believe this information to be incorrect. The islands situated at the entrance of the Gulf threw off their allegiance to Persia at least half a century ago, and have been occupied by the Arabs. Kishma, as far as our inquiries have extended, has never been tributary to Persia, or held in farm of that government; Bunder Abbas or Gombardon is so.—Editor of Bombay Paper.

inland territories merely acknowledge his sovereignty, but pay no tribute; neither has he means of enforcing it. The British expedition to Beni Boo Ally, in 1821, very considerably strengthened his power, and he has fully availed himself of the impression then made, to keep up a belief among his subjects, of the British Government being always ready to aid him in bringing any rebels to their duty. He is, I believe, much attached to the British Government for the countenance and protection he has derived from it. He is the principal merchant in his dominions, and has four large ships; and several buggalas and battilas employed in trade. One ship makes an annual voyage to Zanzibar for slaves, from which a very large profit is received. His revenues are derived from customs and the tributes from the different governors. It will be seen, by the accompanying table, how little he receives, excepting from those places situated on the coast. The Imam has only one wife, but several concubines; he has no children by his wife, but has three sons by his concubines, and several daughters. About eighteen months back, a French female creole was brought by the nacoda of one of his ships from Bourbon, and sold to the Imam; how she was obtained I have not been able to learn, but she by no means liked her situation; for she pined away from her first arrival, and died of grief, after she had been about six or seven months in his seraglio. The Imam has lately made his pilgrimage to Mecca.

I shall now give a short detail of the resources, population, and forces of Muscat, and conclude by a general account of the most considerable persons composing the Imam's family.

The population is estimated at 460,000 males, and rather more females; this is supposed to include the slaves, who probably amount to more than one-third. The men are all liable to bear arms, and follow their several chiefs, but do not perform it willingly, when for the Imam's service; although where it is for the aggrandizement of their own immediate chief, they do it most cheerfully. The only troops that receive pay, are about 300 Be-lloches, who form the Imam's body-guard. It is to the Imam's parsimony in this respect that the Arabs attribute the failure of the force against Beni Boo Ally in 1820.

The naval force consists of the Shaw Allum, 50 guns; Caroline, 40; Liverpool, 50; Nasarer, brig, 10; and a small frigate building, of 28 guns; four battilas, mounting each from 2 to 4 guns; one buggala mounting 10 guns; and all his merchant ships are so fitted, as to be armed if necessary, and would each mount 22 guns. These ships of war are kept in good order, indeed much better than most foreign ships that I have seen; but a sufficient number of men for crews it would be impossible for him to procure among his own subjects.

The principal articles of export-trade are gums, drugs, dates, dried fruits, sharks' fins, salt and fish. The imports are piece-goods, indigo, sugar-candy, sugar, coffee, rice, dried fruits, dates, salt, and pearls. A large quantity of ghee is also imported from Scind and Cutch. The greater part of these articles are brought first to Muscat, and from thence sent coastwise to the different places under the Imam's government, and to most parts of the Gulf of Persia.

The following table will show the total amount of the Imam's revenue, and from whence derived. Those places marked (†) are inland; all the others are on the coast.

The heads of the faction inimical to the Imam's government are, first, Biddo Ibn Saaf, the Imam's first cousin and the assassin of his brother. After the quarrel that took place between him and the Imam, from the above circumstance, he retired to Deriah, the Whabee capital, professed that faith, and was much in the confidence of the head of that people. He is still supposed to be much attached to the Whabee tenets. Some time prior to the fall of Deriah, he quitted it, and paid his court to Ibrahim Pasha, with whom he still keeps up a correspondence, and is supposed to be much in favour both with him and his father, Mahomet Ali. The people of the interior, and those of the northern provinces, are much attached to him; he is said to possess superior abilities, and to be likely to attain the sovereignty after the death of the present Imam. He has two sons, Ahmool Ibn Bidroo, the eldest, aged twenty-five years; and Saaf Ibn Bidroo, aged twenty-two years; both these sons are said to be attached to the British Government. His partisans are Ahmet Ibn Helal, his brother-in-law, and second cousin to the Imam; Ahmet Ibn Imam and Nusub Ibn Imam, brothers and cousins to Ahmool Ibn Helal: they are discontented from the Imam having seized Rustock, their paternal inheritance, and which conveys to the possessor the title of Imam of Oman. The next, Ahmool Ibn Azan, and Kaase Ibn Azan, the former aged twenty, and the latter sixteen years, grandsons of Kaase Ibn Sultan, the Imam's elder brother: they possess the whole territory from Sghar to Shaun, in the Persian Gulf; and the inhabitants of this country are much attached to them. The whole of the revenues at present are seized by the Imam, which is one of the causes of their discontent; these two are also said to be much attached to the British Government. The above are the principal of those opposed to the Imam, and, indeed, are all of any consequence in his territories: the only individuals of the family who are any way attached to him, are his uncles, Mahomet Ibn Salem, Saun Ibn Salem, and Ahmet Ibn Salem; but these are without power or influence.

THE INDIAN ARMY.

LITTER VI.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: I ONCE more resume my pen to submit to the consideration of such of your readers as are in power, a few observations on the East-India Military Seminary, which (I presume few will dispute) ought to be on so extensive a scale, as to enable all cadets, previous to their proceeding to India, to acquire a certain knowledge, both of military duties, and the Hindostannee language, including the Persian character.

Towards this point, I would propose that all should enter as infantry cadets, and go through a course of infantry drill (including the sword and rifle exercise), and duties; after which, a suitable number to be transferred to the cavalry, and a selection made for the artillery; the remainder, on passing for examination in the Hindostannee, &c. (which, as I before observed, all cadets should do, ere they are considered) to be eligible to proceed to India, for the infantry.

The cavalry cadets should then pass through a course of cavalry drill and duties (for which purpose a small stud would be required), including the lance exercise.

The cadets selected for the artillery should proceed in a course of appropriate studies and practices; and from them, a selection to be made for the engineers.

I shall now consider the number of cadets required to replace the casualties in the army, which may be calculated at about one in twelve annually; and estimating on the present establishment of the army, according to the late arrangement, viz. 122 engineers, 405 artillery, 437 cavalry, and 3,404 infantry officers; although it may be hoped that those numbers will be considerably augmented.

Calculating that the engineer-cadets will be one year at the seminary, in addition to their previous service (if it may be so termed), in the artillery and infantry branches, $122 \div 12 = 10$ cadets nearly.

The artillery-cadets two years (exclusive of their previous service in the infantry), but as from them, the engineers are to be taken, we must calculate both corps or Artill. Engrs. Total. Yrs.
 $405 + 122 = 527 \div 12 = 44 \times 2 = 88$.

The cavalry cadets a quarter of a year (exclusive of their previous service in the infantry), $437 \div 12 = 36$, nearly, $\div 4 = 9$ cavalry-cadets.

As all the cadets will go through the infantry branch, which may require about three-quarters of a year, we must calculate the entire strength of the army in it, viz.
 Eng. Artill. Cav. Inf. Total.
 $122 + 405 + 437 + 3,104 = 4,068 \div 12 = 339 \div 4 = 84 \times 3 = 273$.—Total, engineers 10, artillery 88, cavalry 9, and infantry 273; total 380 cadets. The chief objections I anticipate to this plan, is its (at first sight) apparent expense. On the contrary, I maintain, that it will prove a saving.

It is well known, that, under the present system, young officers are nearly, if not entirely, useless, for a long time after their joining a native corps; compare the amount of their Indian pay and allowances during that time, and their expenses at the cadet seminary (which would qualify them for their duty the day they joined their corps), and the advantage, in that respect, of the latter will be evident.

I trust our hon. masters will (as is done in appointing to the Royal Military College) appropriate a certain number of the cadetships (say one-fourth), annually, to the orphans of officers who have died or been killed in their service, gratis; a further number (say one-fourth) to the sons of officers now in the service, or who have retired from it; who should pay according to their fathers' rank (say the sons of subalterns £20, captains £30, field officers £40, and regimental colonels £50 per annum), and the remainder may, without injustice, be made pay double the present rate.

I shall now take my leave of yourself and readers. The style and composition of my letters, I am conscious, admit of criticism, and the subject, discussion (which I shall leave to others). But my motive is solely the welfare of the service (dear to me from past recollection), and identified with it, that of our honourable and liberal masters: should the perusal of those suggestions lead their serious consideration to the subject, and the result be favourable to their service, my utmost wish is gratified.

A RETIRED EAST-INDIA OFFICER.
 Cheltenham, Feb. 20, 1825.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: I observe in your last Number a very intelligent letter on the subject of brevet captains, signed "A Company's Officer," who appears so completely master of it, that I feel some surprise at his not suggesting an easy remedy for this evil. Allow me, therefore, to do so. Let the young gentlemen, who enter the Company's service, in place of proceeding to India as cadets, do so as second lieutenants, cornets, or ensigns (according to their branch of the service), their commissions as such bearing date a short period prior to the time fixed for the despatches of the ships, in which they have taken their passage, and be allowed British pay as such, until their arrival in India.

The expenses attending this plan will be trifling to our honourable masters, compared with the advantages of it to their service. The officers (thus constituted) will be competent to the duties of court-martial, and others on board the ship (which, as cadets, they are not), and also amenable to that tribunal on their arrival in India for any misconduct during the passage. I know an instance of a Bombay cadet, in 1806 or 1807, who disgraced the character of an officer and gentleman on the passage out, but could not be tried in India on any other charge than that of not having, after his arrival there, and being in the receipt of pay, &c. &c., taken the proper steps for redeeming his character from the imputation thrown on it.

A REGIMENTAL CAPTAIN.
 York, April 8th, 1825.

To

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sir: From letters from all parts of India, it appears, that there is prevalent a general expression of satisfaction on account of the judicious intention entertained by the Court of Directors, of giving two years of military education to cadets of cavalry and infantry, between the age of fourteen and sixteen years, or half a year later, so that the cadet might arrive in India about the eligible age of seventeen. It is justly remarked, that every government in Europe sees the absolute necessity of early military education, in order that, in the present advanced state of knowledge of military science, the advantage might be equal and general, where a deficiency cannot but be ultimately attended with fatal consequences. So sound a measure as this requires no argument of support: being a self-evident proposition, independent of the manifest injustice of withholding from two leading branches of the service the vast benefit of education very properly granted to the cadets of engineers and artillery. Let any two men converse for five minutes, and they will be sensible of an intellectual difference: and so it will be between educated and uneducated officers; to say nothing of the too-frequently experienced results of ignorance unavoidably in command. The general principle of the case being fully admitted, there remains only for consideration the most eligible mode of carrying into execution, as early as possible, a plan of vast future utility. In conversing on this very important and highly interesting subject with one of the Directors, he observed, that an addition to the establishment at Addiscombe might be sufficient to accomplish the desirable object in view. On many accounts, a contiguity of the academies for educating the four descriptions of cadets is very desirable. The principal advantage would arise from having thus sufficient opportunities of occasionally bringing, and uniting on one field of tactical instruction, the four different military branches of tyros, in order to represent, in some degree, the more simple and obvious movements and evolutions constituting the primary principles of minor tactics. The youthful mind being thus impressed with a due knowledge of elementary tactical manœuvres, grounds would be laid for future genius and reflection to work on, and arrive in due time at a degree of fame and renown, otherwise unattainable. It has been too frequently recorded in history, that genius, devoid of science, has in warfare effected by brute force, and a lavish sacrifice of life, what might have been equally achieved, with little comparative loss, by the aid and application of tactics and strategy. It is quite unnecessary to go ~~into~~ facts manifested in the pages of military history. I need not here repeat brief details of a course of education of cadets, of cavalry, and of infantry, adverted to in a former paper printed in your useful journal; more especially, as the hon. Court are consulting military characters better qualified than I can pretend to be, to suggest the precise course eligible to pursue in accomplishing an indispensable undertaking, which, in general estimation, has already been too long delayed. The fine park of Addiscombe is sufficiently extensive for the purpose of erecting a military college, distinct from the present; and there is circumjacent field enough for tactical instruction. But till such building can be erected, a temporary situation may be found; as not a moment ought to be lost in forming the requisite establishment in question, and which the Directors, with their usual, and well-known zeal, feel much anxiety and inclination to set on foot.

It so happens, Sir, that very frequently in India, from the nature of local circumstances, the civil servants there are often called on to act in a military capacity; and, particularly, in the absence or non-efficiency of European officers. Such being actually the case, the gentlemen of the civil line are quite sensible how much more they would have been au fait, had they possessed merely the degree of military knowledge sufficient for readily handling a body of men, or of acting as officers, when occasion required it. If this be fact, it follows, that the students at Haileybury ought to be instructed in the simple department of the minor tactics; and, without at all encroaching on the time dedicated to valuable studies, one hour out of the four and twenty might be spared for such acquirement, furnishing at once benefit and exercise. During that hour, silence lence, and submission to command, the students themselves would admit to be necessary. I once belonged to a regiment, of which the serjeant-major was an old soldier, full of zeal, quaintly expressed. When drilling some new officers, one of them said, that he was thinking of a better mode of effecting the lesson before him.

"Thinking," said the serjeant-major, with an oath—"No man, Sir, under a field-officer, has any right to think." In the abstract, the serjeant-major was pretty near the truth."

Your's, &c.

JOHN MACDONALD.

Summerlands, Exeter, April 7, 1825.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: I am one of the very few surviving cadets of 1770-1, which composed the select piquet, and formed on the right of the advanced guard in the battle of St. George, in the Mollilla campaign, and, with about one hundred others, was handling brown Beas some years before I obtained an ensign's commission; consequently I cannot but from experience feel how hardly the late orders of the hon. Court, respecting brevet rank, operate upon the feelings and future interests of those well-educated gentlemen who have been sent out cadets, as regards their brevet commissions as captains; and there can be no doubt that such rules can only tend to dishearten the Company's officers. We will suppose his Majesty's cadets were ordered to Madras, Bengal, and Bombay, and were anxiously to wait, as I did, those years for commissions; would it not be the height of injustice, if their brevet captains' commissions did not originate from their absolute embarkation on board ship for their respective destinations? Having the pleasure of a personal and long acquaintance with some of the India Directors, I know them to be most estimable men; but, as old brother soldiers, I must confess they have assented to a regulation which must evidently operate to the disadvantage of their military relations, either now or prospectively; and particularly should the India army be transferred, as suspected, to the royal service, at the expiration of the charter: and the rank, too, of lieutenant-commandant in India is a foreboding that augurs no good to the future welfare of the East-India officers. Why, Mr. Editor, do young men embark on, a distant service, abandoning parents and dear relatives, but with the hope of a competence and high rank in the evening of life, as a reward for toils and liver affections? And as full colonel is designative for the command of 840 men in the King's, why, in common honesty, should it not be assigned for 1,120 rank and file in the India army? and unless the soon-expected brevet brings all our lieutenant-colonel commandants in as full colonels, I maintain, that not one of these gentlemen will ever live to be a major-general. Although I am in the setting evening of life, I trust I have still left the military feelings of a true soldier; for without professional pride a soldier nothing; and I beg, most respectfully, through the medium of your Journal, to appeal to his Royal Highness the Duke of York (who, I understand, reads it), and to ask whether, if the situation of the King's Officers was in contradiction with the Company's officers, he would not promptly insist upon their interests being forthwith supported, and the orders of the Court of Directors rescinded? Who have the India officers to look to but the Directors? The Court of Proprietors being composed of a multifarious aggregate of persons, possessing stock merely from the interest to be derived therefrom, can have little feeling beyond that of money gratification. I am happy to observe that the feelings of the officers at home are roused into an expression of them; and as the India service now affords so few evident modes of comfort for the evening of life, beyond the retired pay, it necessarily behoves them to look to their future interest, in case a transfer ten years hence should place them, as at present it certainly will, upon a very unequal rank with the King's service. My long experience of India, in every part thereof, however, convinces me that India, and her civil and military establishments, will never be so judiciously or ably managed as under the present system, either as to the welfare of the Hindoo or Mussulman subjects there; but, above all, great judgment should be exercised as to who is sent out governor-general; and one of high rank.

rank and military character and distinction should be selected. Certainly, India and its value to this country are little understood or appreciated in England; and although the press has teemed with every information from the valuable histories of Orme, Scott, Wilks, Malcolm, Dow, and many others, yet the disinclination of the members of either house of Parliament, or of the British public, towards informing their minds, is too apparent. I have read with infinite pleasure Captain Seely's "Voice from India;" his observations on the danger of a free press in India are just, and I hope he will give us his promised concluding volume. His description of the wonders of Elora, in my opinion, exhibit the works of the chisel and hammer there, as far surpassing the works of Canova and Bacon of our day.

I have, out of curiosity, taken in the various numbers of Buckingham; but I must honestly confess to you, that there is in them such a spirit of malevolence, hatred, and contempt towards the Court of Directors, and all constituted authorities who differ in opinion with him, or his politics, that ninety-nine out of a hundred of his subscribers will leave him in disgust. I give him this side-wind opinion through you; hoping, for the interest of his family, he will hereafter keep within the bounds of decorum; for what can he know of India, residing in Rana Moody Gulley, and only four short years in Calcutta?

A CADET OF THE YEAR 1770-1.

London, 4th May 1825.

THE FALL OF GURRAH.

ARGUMENT.—Gurrah was a rich, happy, and populous territory, ruled by native Hindoo princes, till the time of the Emperor Akbar, in whose reign it was finally subjected by the Moguls. Durghetti, the last queen, died on the field of battle fought near the fortress of Jora, which decided the fate of her dynasty, family, and country.—See Dow's "Hindustan."

Alas! what pangs, Durghetti, seiz'd thy breast,
When round thy ear thy fainting people prest;
When, as thy pale eye glanced o'er Jora's mead,
It met no sight but dying man and steed.
For scarce ten decads left, with efforts vain,
And bootless courage, braved the Tartar train;
Yet dauntless, 'midst despair and patriot blood,
In steely circles round their sovereign stood;
And still sedate, unconquered, and serene,
'Midst toil and danger, stood their heroine queen.
When lo! a shaft (the hand from whence it came Unseen, unknown, but certain was the aim) Transpierced her cheek; a cry of horror rung
From all her train, and every nerve unstrung.
"Fly not," the heroine cried, "but rather die,
"Inch after inch, than from these Tartars fly!
"Feel not for me, my friends; but rather feel
"The wounds your country bears from hostile steel.
"Pain I despise, nor value loss of breath:
"To me, Fame's life; and shame alone is death!"

She spoke, determined: while she vainly strove,
With agonising tugs, the shaft to move;
Vainly she strove: at length the treacherous wood Broke short; the barbed prong deep-rooted stood.

Yet

Yet dauntless still, her soul unquell'd by pain,
 She urged, exhorted, fired, and led her train :
 Though man on man her brave defenders die,
 Her circle narrows, and her foes draw nigh.
 When, lo ! another arrow cuts the skies,
 Her neck transfixes, and her garment dyes.
 She bows, she faints ; with shouts the Tartar crew,— Unmanly shouts !—the falling Queen pursue.
 But still, her port and brow as they behold, Queenlike, the shrinking legions backward rolled.
 " Oh, Queen ! oh, mistress ! " generous Adhar cried (His was the post her elephant to guide),
 " Let me conduct thee from this fatal fight,
 " And bear to Jora's battlemented height,
 " Ere Gurrah sees her line of sovereigns o'er,
 " And loyal zeal maintain defence no more :
 " Swift is the beast, unmatch'd by rapid steeds,
 " And sure of foot to cross these slippery meads.
 " Light of my eyes,—but issue thy commands,
 " And lo ! his speed shall baffle yonder hands."—
 " No," said the Queen, as lighted into life,
 Her eye proclaimed her victor in the strife
 With death's grim pains ; and resolute she drew
 The shaft distilling gore to Adhar's view :
 " No ! I command thee, Adhar, not to wait,
 " Or meanly shun inevitable fate ;
 " But bear me instant on the hostile band,
 " And let me fall amidst my fallen land."
 She spoke ; and Adhar, springing from the tow'r, Mov'd with firm step toward the hostile pow'r.
 Six Indian chiefs the track devote pursue,
 And five that instant either warrior slew ;
 Then rushing in, with shouts and lifted brands,
 They bore destruction on retiring bands.
 Conspicuous most, heroic Adhar stood,
 'Midst cloven shields and spouting streams of blood ;
 While, following close behind the warrior's back,
 His wounded sovereign hailed his glorious track ;
 And oft, though fainting, from her lofty-car
 Impelled her jav'lin on the Tartar war.
 Aghast, astonished, at their wond'rous deeds,
 Rank after rank beneath their fury bleeds :
 Urged back in heaps, they tremble and they fly,
 As if avenging Branha rushed from high.
 While thus a handful drove the Tartar host,
 Like doves pursued by hawks, to Jora's post,
 Their starting leader marked his broken lines,
 And once again advanced his fell carbines.
 Loud rung their palling volley, short and strong,
 And thinned incessant Gurrah's falling throng ;
 Till scarce ten men were left to dare the field,
 The foe to combat, and the Queen to shield :
 When faint with blood, and racked with growing pains,
 And sore beset, by unremitting trains
 Of foes ; but still more harrowed with the dread Lest Delhi's walls should see her captive led,—

She called on Adhar,—“ Generous friend, draw near,

“ And end my life and troubles with thy spear.

“ True, we have lost the battle on the plain,

“ But still untarnished honour we retain ;

“ And Fame's loud trumpet to future years shall tell “ How Gurrah's children 'midst her ruins fell.

“ Bred by my hand, in fortune's halcyon ray,

“ This late, this last equivalent repay ;

“ Snatch me at once from insult and from shame,

“ The self-destroyer's or the captive's name.”—

The heroine paused ; and gushing sorrows broke From Adhar's eyelids, as his soul he spoke.—

“ Disposer of my being and my will !

“ Shall I, a slave, the blood of sovereigns spill ?

“ Earth would exclaim against the monstrous deed,

“ And heaven direct its lightnings at my head :

“ E'en now, e'en now, my elephants shall bear

“ Thy person safely from the ranks of war ;

“ E'en now—” No more he said : Durgheiti's blade

Had rendered vain all sublunary aid,—

Plunged in her breast ; and from the deathful wound

Her spirit rushed, and, rising, spurned the ground.

Stung to the heart, despairing Adhar flew

Amidst the fiercest of the charging crew ;

And, fighting to the latest gasp of life,

Fell, gashed with deadly wounds, in desperate strife ;

And, death-devote, the remnant of his train

Sunk on his pallid corse, 'midst heaps of slain.

THE PERIODICAL LITERATURE OF BRITISH INDIA.

THE intellectual character of a nation or society may generally be inferred with some degree of certainty from its periodical literature. Works of an elaborate and permanent kind may be regarded as too independent of popular humour to be forced to comply with every fantastic fluctuation in taste or manners ; and their authors profess at least to be influenced by a nobler ambition than that of administering to the mere transient gratification of literary idlers. Newspapers, on the contrary, are chiefly dedicated to the discussion of temporary topics, and to recording the fugitive incidents of the day, as well as to the chronicling of political transactions at home and abroad. Such works, therefore, receive the impress of their character from those who read them, and upon whose approbation they depend for their very existence : for “ those who live to please, must please to live.” Although it may (and it doubtless is) in the power of the conductors of periodical works, especially those of a political nature, to direct, to a certain extent, the opinion of the public, yet this design is rarely attempted until it is shrewdly suspected that the majority of those who are to be directed are disposed to be led. In short, the readers of our political journals expect them to reflect the very image of their minds ; so that the various hues and complexions, which discriminate those numerous productions from each other, are faithful indicia of the shades of difference which distinguish the opinions and characters of the several classes of individuals of which the public is composed.

The facilities hereby afforded to the historian and the philosopher are as obvious as they are important. The periodical press, which, by a figure not too bold, may be described as the mouth-piece of the people, must not be regarded merely as constituting a check upon oppression, and an insuperable barrier against arbitrary power, or as affording a convenient vehicle for communicating knowledge throughout the nation; but as providing for after ages a faithful and copious record of its transactions. Although it is not to be expected that files of newspapers will occupy a lasting place upon the shelves of public or private libraries; yet their most valuable contents will gradually filter through other works; and posterity will receive the facts unadulterated by passion, party spirit, and prejudice, which, at the period of action, are apt to mingle therewith, and to pervert the mind of the reader.

It is only necessary, in order to be convinced of the benefit which posterity will reap from these diurnal histories, to reflect upon the invaluable aid which historical monuments, deduced from such sources, would contribute to our researches into the transactions of early ages. Had the art of printing been known even to the ancient Greeks and Romans, and had daily, weekly, or even annual registers, at those periods, exhibited the state of manners, the vicissitudes of taste, opinions upon passing events, and other particulars analogous to those which are recorded in such productions at the present day, how smooth and straight would be the path of the historian! The office of antiquary would be superfluous. A few copies of a Grecian Times, or a Roman Courier, or even a number of an Egyptian Asiatic Journal, would probably supply more facts and real information than all the piles of books which literary industry has accumulated upon historical subjects, connected with those empires, since their transactions began to excite curiosity. If every copy of such works were extinct, their having once existed would be a triumph for history; for then the Grecian and Roman historians would have had neither the assurance nor the temptation to stuff their works with such trash, absurdity, and falsehood, as we now find in them.

The only works we possess which afford the least insight into the peculiar manners and domestic character of the ancient world, are their satires, dramas, and epistolary compositions. Few of either exist; and the two first represent distorted, aggravated pictures; yet they are valuable in the absence of better. The private letters which have been transmitted to us—those of Cicero and Pliny, in particular—are evidently written, like our Pope's, with a view to publication, as models of epistolary style; yet these are not destitute of that species of interest which attaches to whatsoever displays man in his natural and most universal character: for history affords but an artificial representation of the characters of mankind.

According to the rule just before laid down, the intellectual character of Anglo-Indian society should be rated very high. The newspapers and periodical productions of India, compared with those of our other dependencies, maintain, at present, a very superior rank. The names of their conductors and supporters (Bruce, Fullarton, Abel, Wilson, Atkinson, Jamieson, Gordon, Herbert Compton, Bryce, &c. &c.) furnish, indeed, a strong pledge of their character; comprehending men eminent in the learned professions, as well as others distinguished as oriental scholars: persons who discover none of that indolent temper which has been attributed to the residents in British India by the Quarterly Reviewers;* but who seem, on the contrary, to be accurate observers, and eager to augment the stores of oriental learning already possessed by the mother country.

* In These gentlemen, in reviewing Mr. Elphinstone's Cabul, observed that science was a commodity with which the market in India was not overstocked.

In Calcutta, the English newspapers are the Government Gazette, the John Bull, the India Gazette, the Bengal Hurkaru, and the Weekly Messenger. At each of the other presidencies there are also two or three. Besides recording the political events of the day, and the transactions in the Mofussil, a large portion of each paper is occasionally devoted to original communications upon the geography, history, commerce, and political condition of the surrounding states and people; as well as to much information of a more strictly philosophical character, acquired by the civil and military servants of the Company (generally men of good education), or others, in the course of travel, conversation, or research. Our own pages bear ample testimony to this statement: we have not scrupled to transfer into this Journal, from those sources, such articles as European readers would be desirous of perusing, and which deserved a more protracted existence than an Indian newspaper was likely to secure to them.*

It is due to the character of the late Calcutta Journal to state that, in this respect, it displayed a very laudable example to its contemporaries. During the few years it existed, this paper was the medium of many valuable communications upon various subjects relating to the arts and literature of the East. Si sic omnia, scarcely an individual in India would not have regretted its extinction.

If we were required to select a particular Indian paper which was the most distinguished for valuable intelligence, we should not hesitate to name the Singapore Chronicle. There is no work in India which enjoys such facilities for acquiring information as that paper. Situated as the settlement is, upon the confines of several states, with whom we are still but imperfectly acquainted, and enjoying, by its internal and municipal regulations, free intercourse with all around, gross stolidity alone could neglect the opportunities thus offered of ministering to European curiosity. The authorities of Singapore seem to have possessed, not merely the inclination, but, what is more essential, the ability, to take advantage of favourable circumstances. The visitors and traders at this port are exempt from other tax than that which is exacted from them to answer the demands of literary curiosity. At this flourishing settlement, commerce appears in her legitimate character, hand in hand with science and the arts.

One of the most ancient maxims of government, and which has operated most successfully to maintain mankind in servile subjection to despotism, is that which inculcated the duty of secluding knowledge from all but the ruling classes. To this maxim, which seems to have been almost universal in the eastern world, is to be traced the invention of those mystic characters, the relics of which still subsist in various parts of the world, and, however different in their nature and principles, were all employed for the same end. Commerce, however, has always offered impediments to this project of locking up the mind in ignorance. However learning may affect to disdain the association, it is to her connection with trade, and to the agency of mercantile adventurers, that she has been indebted for some of her most splendid acquisitions.

* We have observed a remonstrance against this practice on our part, in one of the Indian newspapers, conveyed in no very measured language. Since the commencement of the present volume of this Journal (which is as far as our experience extends) the source from whence we have borrowed articles already in print has been acknowledged, except when the article has been transmitted to us corrected by the original authors; or when it has appeared in so many Indian newspapers as to render its origin a matter of doubt; or when we have so changed it by the incorporation of original matter, condensation, abridgment, &c. as to make it in some respects our own. We apprehend our readers would not thank us for excluding a valuable geographical sketch of the Burman empire, for example, merely because it had been printed in the Bengal Hurkaru, which nine-tenths of our readers would probably never see.

The establishment, at Singapore, which was the first bold departure from the selfish commercial system, has developed a new source of advantage, not, probably, contemplated by its projectors. It has not merely become the emporium of traffic with the Hindu-Chinese and Malay countries, but is the focus of scientific intelligence respecting these parts, and the channel of communicating to Europe what have been hitherto desiderata.

Those who have the means of comparing together the periodical productions of our various dependencies in Asia, Africa, and America, must concur in opinion with us, that the East-Indian press is of a superior character, and indicates a more refined and polished society. If we except our South-African colony, the periodical literature of which is in its infancy, the only journals which can be named in competition with the eastern papers, are those in some of our West-India colonies. But the unnatural state of society existing there is manifest in the characteristics of those productions. Although some of them are evidently conducted by men of talent, articles of literary or scientific interest are rarely found in them, and are never the growth of the soil. If we exclude European and American politics, and the personal altercations amongst the editors, there remains nothing in them, or, what is worse than nothing, disgusting details respecting their human chattels, and laboured treatises to prove the justice and policy of slavery.

Having said so much in praise of the Anglo-Indian periodical press, we may be permitted to add a word or two by way of reprehension; although the remarks will have no reference to intellectual character, nor convey any severe reproach upon the conductors of Indian journals.

The gross mechanical inaccuracies, conspicuous in those papers, constitute a very serious drawback upon their value. The source of these errors is the ignorance of the workmen; and from this very circumstance it necessarily happens that the most elaborate and recondite articles, in fact those in which accuracy is most desirable, abound with the greatest number of typographical mistakes. It is often with infinite toil we are able to rectify the sense, and especially the figures, of many articles inserted in the latter portion of our Journal, which are extracted from India papers. A classical quotation, or scientific term, is generally misspelt (examples of which are occasionally extremely ludicrous); and every particular we find it necessary to revise, as far as we are able, previous to re-publication. These occurrences show a remarkable deficiency of good compositors in India; and they are perhaps attributable, in a certain degree, to a relaxation of vigilance on the part of the editors.

Perhaps it would not detract from the respectability of the Indian periodical press if the mutual hostilities of its conductors were less frequently obtruded upon the world. We are aware that these are sometimes expedients employed to extend the circulation of a paper; and that the subjects of dispute may possess an interest with the public abroad, which we cannot partake of. To us, those subjects appear very dull, and seem to be treated in a very insipid manner.*

* We refer more particularly to the dispute between the Hurkaru and the John Bull.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR : Being of opinion that the following information may be of considerable importance to navigators who frequent the Pacific Ocean and the seas of India, I will be thankful if you can conveniently give it a place in your popular work, the Asiatic Journal.

JAMES HORSBURGH.

Chart-Office, East-India House, May 5th, 1825.

NEW ATLAS OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC OCEAN.

Commodore Krusenstern, of the Russian navy, celebrated by his successful voyage of exploration and circumnavigation, has been employed for many years collating and selecting the best materials afforded by modern voyages, to enable him to construct an Atlas of the Islands and Dangers in the Pacific Ocean, on an extensive plan. He is at present employed on the Charts of the North Pacific Ocean, for which he possesses many excellent documents, chiefly by Russian officers, who have explored many of the islands and coasts adjacent to that ocean.

The Atlas of the South Pacific Ocean has been already published, by command of the Emperor Alexander, at St. Petersburg, and is dedicated to him. There is a quarto volume of letter-press accompanying the Atlas, affording a satisfactory explanation of the data used in the formation of the Charts. The work is published both in the Russian and French languages; and of the latter, several copies have arrived in London, as gifts to friends; and a few copies are placed for disposal, with Messrs. Kingsbury, Parbury, and Allen, No. 7, Leadenhall Street.—The contents of this Atlas are as follow :—

1. General Chart, from lat. 5° N. to 70° S., and from lon. 68° to 253° W.	Large Sheet.
2. Chart of New Guinea, Torres Strait, and part of the Molucca Islands	do. do.
3. & 4. Do. New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, and adjacent seas	do. do.
5. Chart of New Ireland and Admiralty Islands.....	Middle Size.
6. Do. New Britain and Santa Cruz.....	do. do.
7. Do. Louisiade and Mendana Archipelagos	do. do.
8. Do. Salomon Islands	Large Sheet.
9. Do. New Hebrides	Middle Size.
10. Do. New Caledonia.....	do. do.
11. Do. New Zealand.....	Large Sheet.
12. Do. Friendly and Society Islands	Middle Size.
13. Do. Fidji, and Navigator's Islands.....	do. do.
14. Do. Archipelago of Basses.....	Large Sheet.

Most of the abovementioned Charts are neatly engraved, and evince great improvement in that art at St. Petersburg, during these last few years.

ACASTA ROCK, NEAR VICTORY ISLAND.

A New Discovery, communicated by Captain Norfury.

Extract from the Log-Book of the American Ship Acasta.—" May 15th, 1820, at 10 h. 15 m. A. M. Victory Island bearing about S. by E. six miles, the man at the mast-head saw shoal-water near us; immediately put up the helm, and passed to leeward of a shoal patch, about twice the ship's length, which appeared like a rock under water, of a very brown colour on its centre, decreasing to a pale green all around."

The existence of this danger is now satisfactorily proved, by the following account transmitted transmitted to me from Canton, by Capt. Gottlieb, who was chief officer of the ship Isabella, of Prince of Wales Island, when she nearly struck upon the rock :—

"Dec. 19th. At noon, Victory Island bore E. S. E. five or six miles.—At 1 p.m. a strong breeze, with a heavy sea from N. N. Westward; standing to the N. Eastward, observed heavy breakers on a rock about thirty fathoms distant on the lee bow; put the helm down, bore all a-back, and the ship's head veering round again to the N. Eastward, she passed so close to leeward of the rock, that two of the breakers rebounded from it and struck the ship on the weather bow. This rock bears from Victory Island N. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. distant about five miles, which will place it in lat. $1^{\circ} 39' N.$, and in lon. $106^{\circ} 21' E.$ It appeared to be very dangerous, as no part of the rock was visible above water, even when the breakers receded from it, but at these times it appeared to be two or three feet under the surface of the sea; and in smooth water it is probably one, or one and a half fathom below the surface, with deep water all round, as about a cable's length to the eastward of it we had no bottom at thirty fathoms."

ROCK IN THE CHANNEL, INSIDE OF CHEDUBA.

Capt. Ross, the Company's Marine Surveyor at Bengal, states that nearly in mid-channel between the Island of Cheduba and the Ramree shore, and about four miles and a half to the north of the anchorage, a dangerous patch of rocks has been discovered, having only ten or eleven feet on it at low water, with six fathoms close to it, seven and eight fathoms to the westward, and five and six fathoms to the eastward.

BOMINY HARBOUR, about twelve leagues to the northward of Chittagong, situated between Bominy Island and the main, about thirty years ago, was a safe place for ships to anchor in, when driven past Chittagong river by stormy weather in the southerly monsoon: but it is said this harbour no longer exists; the soil brought down by the freshes in the great rivers having filled it up, and also great part of the channel between the Island Sun-Deep and the main, so as to preclude any safe passage or place of shelter for ships.

A NEW VIEW OF LITERAL ECONOMY.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: In one of the earliest volumes of your miscellany, my first essay on a universal language and character, with an explanatory diagram, made its appearance, under many disadvantages, from the want of an appropriate set of types, and that experience in the pursuit of an object, which more than ten years' persevering cultivation has since afforded, I presume, with commensurate effects. At the period here mentioned, I promised to prosecute the scheme to practical perfection, I therefore do feel bound in honour to convince the subscribers of your Journal that I am still a man who never wished to conceal, under a bushel, whatever light he could throw upon any useful subject; far less, to shrink from the defence of his own doctrines, however eccentric and worthless they may appear in the eyes of superficial observers, or of those profound scholars who deem learning alone the summum bonum of social life, in lieu of real knowledge. With the professed view of courting liberal criticism from the British Indian community in particular, and the public at large, you are most welcome to insert the whole Diorama in your number for June; and I flatter myself it will find favour not only in your sight, but prove acceptable also to the majority of your Oriental readers at home and abroad, who will be both able and willing to appreciate my pending lucubrations according to their deserts, when the whole have been fairly submitted for that tribunal's sentence, whence, as there is no appeal, respectful submission in me becomes a matter

a matter of course to its irrevocable judgment. In the mean time, it is possible some seasonable hints may be generously communicated through the medium of your popular Journal, and I shall not fail to use them thankfully during the progress of the Polyglossal British Atlas, now in the press; that the work may be thus brought, if practicable, at once to perfection—the grand aim of all my philological labours, since their origin, nearly half a century ago. After the luminous observations, published a few years before his Lordship left India, by so accomplished a writer as the Marquess Hastings, in praise of the English language, contrasted with every other, my feeble voice on such a theme here, would be quite superfluous, if not impertinent; especially as it is generally taken for granted, from recent leading articles in his literary creed, that the acute and classical Mr. Canning even, is equally partial to his native tongue; which, were its glaring cacography now reformed on rational principles, would soon become, in preference to French, the most current speech over the whole civilized world, because it could then be communicated efficiently to all foreigners, within the space of a few months, instead of as many years, hitherto required for that purpose, and might thus be deemed a sine qua non accomplishment to the literati of both hemispheres.

The Diorama, in its present state, must speak for itself; and if assailed in those parts that may yet be considered vulnerable, I mean either to defend myself boldly, or honestly to acknowledge every detected mistake; my object being, in fact, rather to inculcate the utility of cultivating common sense and of establishing permanent truths among mankind, than to obtain the fleeting triumph which any polemic victory or defeat could ever produce.

A variety of attempts have been heretofore abortively made to establish a general standard for occidento-oriental orthoeigraphy, but none of their projectors, myself excepted, ever contemplated the possibility of therewith combining a universal language and a catholic character, on principles of such evident utility and simplicity, that he who runs may almost read their practicability in each department of my new view of literal economy; and adapted, as it is, to every dialect under the sun, ultimate failure in this project will prove rather a misfortune attributable to public apathy than to any fault of mine.

To many of my earliest pupils, who probably constitute a large proportion of your subscribers, I must explain a deviation or two from my first system of Hindec Roman orthoeigraphy, to reconcile them at least to all subsequent improvements, and upon similar grounds, viz. those longings after perfection, which Providence has wisely implanted in every ingenuous breast, as the soul's surest guide and noblest claim to immortality, after its body has been mingled with the parent dust. The ridiculous alphabetical name and occasional sound of our letter u, was originally denoted in my Dictionary by eu, but shortly afterwards, for obvious reasons, yoo was invariably substituted for eu. In the like manner, kea, keea, were converted to kya, kiya, restricting the power of y, uniformly, to its consonantal sound, heard alone in the English words printed thus—y-awn, y-ou, y-olk, &c. never pronounced eye-awn, eye-ou, or eye-olk. This judicious step having been seasonably taken, consistency of principles obliged me to obliterate entirely the vocal sound which y has in my, cry, by superseding this for ever with ue, ui, perceptible in buy, guide, guile, guise; and in the Scottish pronunciation of, not tyoosday, but as it is more plainly exhibited in Tuesday; besides, the fact of this ue being in perfect unison with the Oriental mode of forming this very common diphthongal vowel, audible if not visible in the organ, letter, and pronoun, indis-

criminally called eye, i; a bivocal, very different indeed from the y, noticed above in y-awn, for the iota, with us, indicates ai, ae, ue, ui, eye, not the yaw, as in yaw-n, which the Hindoos term yu-kâr, never wy. Previous to the emendation in question, the words tyar, yyam, and many more of a similar kind, exhibited the preposterous use and abuse of y, vocally and consonantly together; an evident absurdity, but ultimately rectified thus; tueyar, &c. To avoid the possibility of ou being ever deemed the French combination in pour, which might consequently be confounded with the English poor, and a parity of reasoning on both uo and ue from Eastern orthography, induced me to transpose the vowels ou, in house, sound, our, to form out of them, both more synthetically and analytically, the canine or bow-wow diphthong, uo, so-uor, guo, suo, buo, wuo, &c. at which unequivocal uo, and its twin-brother ue, my thoughtless quondam-scholars have been barking ever since, without either rhyme or reason on their side, but merely from sheer inability, indolence, or mulish disinclination, to follow me in the right path, after I had left the old beaten one, which greater experience clearly evinced was palpably wrong. That the Diorama will excite some such hue and cry, after its innovations, also, is probable enough, till those who complain of my progressive improvements shall deliberately recollect how repeatedly Watt, and every other grand inventor of useful machines, were employed all their lives in rendering them still more perfect by the various alterations and additions, which long practice and self-conviction of existing defects suggested from time to time; always in the hope of reaching thereby, the ne plus ultra of aspiring genius that was to transmit such men's names to posterity, as the honest, indefatigable benefactors of their own age and country. Had the true sound been retained of the interjection hae (hue), introduced above, to chime in with the cry raised after a thief, it alone must have levelled my adopted ue (eye) with the meanest capacity; but our notorious cacography has converted hae, through hue, to hyoo—something totally distinct in oral complexion from the hae crane! huc krue! formerly intended; and which is yet daily heard by every London coach-driver, as ho! hae! hue! hy!—familiar exclamations, and moreover, completely Hindoostanee! With the Diorama, a neat lithographic prospectus of the Catholic Litæclature and Lord's Prayer, in script symbols, will of course reach you, that the printed and written doxology may be compared easily together, along with the New Series of Letters, as the most convenient harbingers to a long-projected scheme of mine for communicating pure Hindoostanee rapidly to Englishmen, and good English equally so to the natives of British India. Both objects of this comprehensive design may be accomplished simultaneously by means of the proposed universal character, in which the subsequent editions of my works will successively appear, but, all greatly curtailed in prolixity, intricacy and price, from an earnest desire, on my part in future, to supply the whole of those who shall still confide in me, with a maximum of practical Oriental knowledge, through a minimum expenditure of time, toil, or cash, during the prosecution of such literary pursuits, at home or abroad. Learners from the age of six to sixty years, and of both sexes, will, on personal application, or by post paid letters, receive every aid in my power, including references to those instructors and private institutions, where the improved system of Oriental tuition has been or shall be successfully adopted and applied to the youngest scholars.

... I cannot terminate even this long address without most earnestly recommending the immediate extension of infant tuition to practical Orientalism in the

the British isles; but on such conciliatory principles, and short self-evident propositions, that every child may comprehend them almost at one glance; a purpose for which I am at present preparing a pleasant wholesale mode of instruction that will soon supersede the disgusting retail method, hitherto so much in vogue, of cramming juvenile heads with useless rules in endless and tormenting detail, thereby converting a pleasurable pastime to that scholastic drudgery which has now become quite insufferable. The capacities of mere children have never yet had fair play by the early cultivation of their intellectual faculties, in a familiar, endearing way, through the precocious curiosity peculiar to their tender years, whereon we might, under proper treatment, engraft the fairest classical fruits of adolescence, instead of devoting this maturer period of existence for the acquisition of arts and sciences, almost exclusively to the mere correction of idle bad habits, assumed in the nursery, the kitchen, a vicious neighbourhood, or last not least, of some evil communications imbibed in the very parlours and drawing-rooms of the infant's own infatuated parents. Much more may be taught under the age of seven than inexperienced people can readily credit, and from that period till twelve or fourteen, tuitionary wonders might in general be performed, even in the higher branches of education, in consequence of the great improvements daily making in the useful art of teaching. When these shall have been extensively adopted, the most ungovernable portion of human life, between twelve and twenty, may thus be so completely engrossed with scientific, professional, and other interesting occupations, that the vicious and criminal propensities of heedless youth will find neither time nor place for luxuriant growth, as rank weeds, in such prolific gardens for the most ennobling productions, from both their heads and hearts. Should the recently projected university be founded in the British metropolis, I trust it will accord much better than its established predecessors with the progressive spirit of the present century, and that among other desiderata, the seasonable culture of English and other living dialects, with a quantum sufficit of ancient lore and elementary Orientalism will be no longer overlooked or rejected from any silly preference of dead languages and classical erudition, as this preposterous predilection is too apt to create an exclusive monopoly, hostile to all future improvement.

I remain, &c.

IMPOSITIONS IN INDIA.

It is desirable that persons connected with India should be advertised that impositions, upon a large scale, have been practised upon the editors of news-papers in India, in regard to the insertion of births, marriages, and deaths. This system of imposition is termed a hoax; and the act is as barbarous as the name. No less than six marriages, two births, and two deaths, were announced in the Calcutta Government Gazette of November 15, which prove to be false. It appears that the information was transmitted to the editor of the Calcutta John Bull in a letter from Delhi, with directions that it should also appear in the Gazette.

Tricks of this nature are more cheaply practised upon Indian newspapers than at home (where they are nevertheless too frequent), because the insertion of this species of intelligence in the former is gratuitous.

ACCOUNT OF THE PRANGOS HAY PLANT OF NORTHERN INDIA.

By MR. JOHN LINDLEY, F.L.S., &c. &c.*

In the north of India, in the neighbourhood of Imbal or Draz, grows a plant called Prangos, much employed as fodder for cattle, and of properties represented by the natives to be so marvellous, as to have excited doubts among the Europeans, whom reports of it had reached, as to its being more than an Oriental exaggeration. Owing to the little intercourse which takes place with the unfrequented districts where it was stated to grow, no opportunity occurred of gaining accurate information respecting it till the year 1822, when William Moorcroft, Esq., the superintendent of the Honourable East-India Company's stud, on deputation to Upper Asia, having occasion to enter into communication with the Chinese authorities of Elu, undertook a journey to Draz, for the purpose of examining into the truth of the properties ascribed to the plant by the natives.

The information, thus acquired, appeared to this gentleman of such importance as to be worthy of an especial communication to the government at Fort William. Two chests of the seed, and specimens of the Prangos Hay itself, were forwarded from India to this country, and presented by the Honourable Court of Directors to the Horticultural Society, with the correspondence between Mr. Moorcroft and the Indian government. Having had the honour to receive permission to use these important documents for the purpose of publication, I have prepared the following account of this remarkable plant, which may possibly become an object of great importance to our colonies in an agricultural point of view, whether we consider its amazing produce, its beneficial effects as a food for cattle, or the little care which is requisite in its cultivation.

The following are extracts from Mr. Moorcroft's letter, dated from Wakha, left bank of the Molbee Ches, 15th August 1822:—

"The plant called Prangos is employed in the form of hay, as a winter fodder for sheep and goats, and frequently for neat cattle; but its seed, when eaten by horses, is said to produce inflammation of the eyes and temporary blindness. The properties of prangos as a food appear to be heating, producing fatness in a space of time singularly short, and also to be destructive to the fasciola hepatica or liver fluke, which, in Britain, after a wet autumn, destroys some thousands of sheep by the rot, a disease that, to the best of my knowledge, has in its advanced stages hitherto proved incurable. The last-mentioned property of itself, if it be retained by the plant in Britain, and there appears no reason for suspecting that it will be lost, would render it especially valuable to our country. But this, taken along with its highly nutritious qualities, its vast yield, its easy culture, its great duration of life, its capability of flourishing on lands of the most inferior quality, and wholly unadapted to tillage, impart to it a general character of probable utility unrivalled in the history of agricultural productions. When once in possession of the ground, and for which the preparation is easy, it requires no subsequent ploughing, weeding, manuring, or other operation, save that of cutting, and of converting the foliage into hay. Of its duration I have two facts, viz. one of its seeds having been carried westward along with those of yellow lucerne, above forty years ago, and sown on the eastern frontier of Kashmeer, where they vegetated, and where the plants of the first growth still remain in a flourishing condition; in the second instance, the seeds were transported eastward, and sown upon rocks near Molbee, where their plants flourished for about forty years, but in consequence of a long period of drought, during which there fell scarcely either rain or snow, the prangos perished along with the crops of that district in general.

* This article was prepared by permission of the Hon. Court of Directors of the East-India Company, and inserted in the last No. of the Quarterly Journal of Science, &c.

"From various facts, it is conceived not unreasonable to presume that by the cultivation of this plant, moors and wastes, hitherto uncultivated, and a charge of disgrace to British agriculture, may be caused to produce large quantities of winter fodder, and that the yield of highlands and of downs, enjoying a considerable depth of soil, may be trebled. I have made every precautionary arrangement in my power by presents, &c., for gathering, drying, packing, and transporting a large quantity of the seed, and have left Mr. Guthrie, the apothecary, to superintend the operations. One cask will be transmitted through Kashmir, and two others through Bushohar. And I take the liberty of submitting to the most noble the Governor-General in Council, the probability of this plant being of use to the new settlers, our countrymen, at the Cape of Good Hope, and to the colonists in general. As the prangos has hitherto been of spontaneous growth alone, practices better adapted to the nature of the plant or of the country may be adopted at a future time; but from a view of its habitudes in its wild state, I venture to suggest that the seeds be dibbled singly into holes an inch deep and a foot apart, a short time before the rainy season.

"During three years the plants will be little productive, but in that interim they will not be in the way of any other surface crop."

Judging from the specimens sent by Mr. Moorcroft, each plant will produce about one and a half pound of dry fodder; which, allowing each plant to occupy four feet of ground when in perfection, will give a produce for bad land of more than a ton and three-quarters each acre, which is nearly equal to the produce in hay of the best English meadows. But if the distance recommended by Mr. Moorcroft be sufficient for the growth of the plants, that is to say, one foot, then allowing a plant to produce only half a pound of hay, an acre would yield the amazing weight of something more than nine tons and a half, a quantity which certainly appears to exceed credibility.

It is much to be regretted that from the length of time which elapsed between the despatch of the seeds by Mr. Moorcroft and their arrival in England, that is to say, from the 15th of August 1822, to the month of April 1824, their vegetative powers had become so much exhausted as to render it extremely doubtful whether success will attend the experiments upon growing them. Now, however, that attention is called to the plant, other and speedier means may be employed for despatching the seed; no difficulty in procuring which can now be anticipated. Mr. Moorcroft having made arrangements with Rippghias, the Kenphun, and Mahomed Khan, the Chikmual of Draz, for a supply of any required quantity of the seed.

The prangos hay plant is a perennial herbaceous plant, with a large fleshy root-stock, usually measuring at the top from eighteen to twenty-two inches in circumference, and formed by the aggregation of an infinite number of crowns or winter buds clustered together at or above the surface of the ground. The crowns are closely covered over by the coarse fibrous remains of the old leaves, by which the buds must be effectually protected from frost or accidents when the plant is in a state of rest. From each crown rises an abundance of finely-cut leaves about two feet long, when dried, of a highly fragrant smell, extremely similar to that of very good new clover hay. They are supra-decompound, quite smooth, with linear, entire, or three-parted segments; their principal petiole is slightly sheathing at the base with a crisp thin margin; upwards it is solid, round, or slightly angular, with a smooth finely-striated skin. Of the secondary petioles there are from six to ten opposite pairs, according to the vigour of the leaf; they are in all respects like the primary petiole, except being smaller and more compressed and having the first pair of their segments proceeding from their very base. In these leaves the whole crop may be said to consist.

From the centre of the leaves rises the flower-stem, which I have only seen in a young and mutilated state. Good specimens of the inflorescence have not reached me; but from some imperfect umbels of flowers, I can state that the male and female flowers are produced upon distinct umbels. Of the male flowers the umbels are compound, shorter than the bractes by which they are subtended, and both axillary and terminal; the bractes are finely and deeply pinnatifid with three-parted segments, of which the end-lobe is broader than the rest, and often three-toothed. The involucre is both general and partial, each consisting of five or six membranous ovate-acuminate leaflets, which are shorter than the stalks of the umbellules, or of the flowers. At the base of the umbel are clustered several scarious rudiments rudiments of florata. The calyx consists of five distinct ovate minute sepals. The petals are five, lanceolate, spreading, incurved, with a minute dorsal nerve. The stamens are five, spreading, the same length as the petals, and inserted opposite the sepals beneath a large, fleshy, slightly wavy discus, which surrounds two little processes, the rudiments of as many styles. The filaments are incurved, and quite smooth. The anthers large, square, innate, bilocular; each cell opening longitudinally with two valves. The female flowers have not yet been observed. The fruit is inferior, and consists of two united achenia, at maturity separating from base to submit from their common axis; it is oval-lanceolate, compressed, eight or nine lines long, and is crowned with two recurved styles, arising from the centre of a large, fleshy, wavy discus, and with the corky sepals of the persistent calyx. Of these achenia, the commissure or point of union is nearly flat, and narrower than their transverse diameter. Of each the pericarpium is corky, with five primary juga or elevations, which are in the centre produced into a corky wavy wing, and on each side covered densely with coarse tubercles; there are no secondary juga, and the valliculæ, or intervals, are concave and smooth. The seed is of the same form as the pericarpium, from which it is easily separable; it is covered over with an indefinite number of colourless vittæ, both on the commissure and back; it is an involute horny albumen, and a minute, inverted, white embryo at its upper extremity; the cotyledons are flat and oval, the radicle rounded, and as long as the cotyledons.

From the foregoing description, which has been formed from such materials as have reached this country, it appears that the prangos hay plant belongs to the natural order of umbellifera, and that it bears much affinity to the genus Cachrys, with which it agrees in the corky nature of its pericarpium, in the absence of secondary juga, in having no vittæ, and in the involute structure of its albumen. With Krübena of Hoffmann, which it resembles in the general appearance of its fruit, it may also be compared, notwithstanding its difference of habit; with that genus, however, it cannot be united, on account of its involute not solid albumen, numerous vittæ, and lanceolate not emarginate petals. From Laserpitium it differs materially in having involute albumen, an indefinite number of vittæ, and no secondary juga, while its primary juga, which in Laserpitium are obsolete, are in prangos the most conspicuous part of the fruit. To Rumia of Hoffmann it is not referable because of its solid pericarpium, distinct winged juga, and long flat achenia.

To revert, therefore, to cachrys, with which, as I have already stated, prangos has many points in common: if cachrys morisoni, the fruit which has a solid, corky smooth pericarp, with its juga nearly obsolete, is to be considered the species in which the essential character of the genus is to be sought, it is obvious that prangos cannot be considered of the same genus. But if cachrys be admitted in the form under which it has been placed by Sprengel, in the sixth volume of Römer and Schultes's Species Plantarum, it is equally certain that the subject of this article cannot be separated from it. Differences in the fruit and petals of umbellifera are, however, by the common consent of botanists, admitted to be of such importance in fixing the characters of the genera of that order, that a combination of plants, like that which has been attempted in the work above quoted, must be considered utterly subversive of analytical division, and can only lead to a return to the genera of umbellifera as Linnæus left them.

Besides krübena and rumia, the distinctions between which and prangos I have already explained, there is a third genus included in cachrys by Sprengel, but separated by Professor Link, under Bauhin's name of Hippomarathrum. From this prangos seems principally to differ, in having entire, not pinnatifid, involucre, the juga winged, not rounded, and the petals lanceolate, not round with a broad involute segment; all points of great importance in characterizing umbelliferous plants.

Having thus shewn that the prangos hay plant is strictly referable to no genus of umbellifera at present constituted, I propose here to establish it with the following name and character:

PRANGOS.

Char. Nat.—Calyx quinqueidentatus. Petala equalia, lanceolata, incurva, integerrima. Discus carnosus, crispus. Achenia a dorso compressa. Pericarpium suberosum:

Among the plants placed by Sprengel under his genus cachrys, is the laserpitium ferulaceum of Linnæus, found in the Crimea, a climate not very different from that of Draz, and described by Marschall von Bieberstein under the name of cachrys alata. This having a winged corky fruit, like that of prangos, and otherwise agreeing with it in character, the genus now established will consist of two species, which may be distinguished thus:—

1. Prangos pabularia. Mihi supra.

2. Prangos ferulacea.

GALLO-INDIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE poverty of accurate information respecting the circumstances of British India displayed by French writers, has often been strikingly manifest. Their mal-intelligence, assisted by the diligent efforts of interested individuals in this country, has contributed to disseminate throughout Europe very erroneous notions of the political condition of Hindostan. We were not prepared to believe that this tendency to error was promoted by correspondence with individuals in India; but the following extract of a letter, which appeared in the Journal des Débats, stated to be written by a civil officer in the French service, dated Tranquebar, 25th September last, does furnish some palliation or excuse for their delusions. In submitting this specimen of French illiberality to our readers, it is unnecessary for us to direct their attention to the mis-statements, or the malice of the writer. The different order of things spoken of refers probably to the substitution of a French for an English Governor-General.

The English, in their expedition against the Burmese, have not as yet obtained that success upon which they calculated. The inhabitants of Pegu have adopted a plan of defence which entirely disconcerts their adversaries. They burn all the country they leave behind them, so that the English are obliged to draw all the provisions necessary for the army from Madras and Bengal, which exposes them to great privations, and occasions an enormous expense.

The Peguans fight with great intrepidity, and greatly depend on their barricades, in the construction of which they are wonderfully expert; they raise them in the course of a night, at short distances, and thus oppose continual obstacles to their enemies, who can only overcome them with great loss of men, and particularly of officers. It is said that this war was undertaken by the Governor-General of Bengal, Lord Amherst, against the opinion of his Council, who particularly pointed out that the present was not a favourable opportunity, not only in a political point of view, but also with regard to the season of the year. The English army happen to be at Rangoon at the height of the rainy season; this circumstance has been felt in a melancholy manner, by the breaking out among the English army of epidemic diseases, which have already carried off many victims, and among them Commodore Grant, the commander of the naval part of the expedition.

The English, harassed by an enemy, and barricades, which are daily renewed, by continual rains and the uncertainty of procuring provisions, fear to depart from the coast, and have fallen back on Rangoon, awaiting the return of the fine weather. The Emperor of Ava has not, in the mean time, been inactive; he has assembled an army of 40,000 men, of which he has cantoned a part in the upper provinces, and despatched 20,000 men, under the command of Prince Lanawady, against the English at Rangoon.

When one sees the insolence and severity with which the English exercise their superiority in India, it is easy to calculate the probabilities that may lead to a different order of things, however distant it may be.

I read with pleasure in the Madras Gazette, that the researches the English have made in the interior of the pagodas at Rangoon, to dig up the treasures supposed to have been buried, have been fruitless.

EGOTISM.

Me! me! adsum qui feci! Vana.

Egotism is—but why should we superfluously define what we all understand, and what is natural to us all? Every child of humanity has a tingling desire to dwell upon the monosyllable which expresses himself. Is egotism a vice? No: it is too universal to deserve so harsh an appellation. Is it a virtue? No: it is a frailty, a weakness, a folly, which wise men avoid; and which weak men would, perhaps, avoid if they could, but nature is too powerful for them.

Egotism originates in vanity, or, more properly, is an evidence of it. Vanity is not peculiar to, nor the necessary adjunct of, intellectual feebleness; but it denotes that the discriminative and distributive faculties of the mind wherein it exists are less vigorous than the perceptive. Poets and men of imagination are often egotists; persons distinguished by any peculiar traits of originality, which are commonly designated as marks of genius, are sometimes so. The bulk of egotists, however, we generally find to consist of men of superficial understanding, the scope of whose mental vision is limited; who may have enjoyed abundant facilities for acquiring knowledge, and who, therefore, assume that they possess it: although study, travel, and conversation, may have qualified them only to dogmatize. We recollect the anecdote of the old gentlemen who declaimed against the ignorance displayed by philosophers, in asserting that the earth was spherical; whereas, he observed, “I have sailed all over the world, and it is as flat as the table.”

Cicero is the archetype of egotists: “I,” and “my consulate,” were expressions perpetually issuing from his mouth or his pen. But it is rare to find vanity so tolerable as in the example of Cicero. A man who should attempt to justify his egotism by an appeal to the practice of the Roman orator, ought to be able to say, not merely, “I am an egotist, and so was Cicero;” but, “Cicero saved his country, and so have I.”

Neither weaknesses nor crimes can be palliated by the example of others, however splendid their characters in the aggregate. Drunkenness is not less a vice because it was practised by Alexander. We may add, that a cadaverous countenance never could be a mark of personal beauty, although the flatterers of Horace drank cummin to render their complexions as ghastly as his.

Egotism in conversation is perhaps on the decline. The rules of politeness and good breeding are compounded of maxims derived from experience and good sense; and they have operated wonderfully in propagating throughout society a species of pseudo-intellectuality, if it may be so called, or mechanical judgment, whereby actions seem to be under the direction of right reason; although, in many cases, no other reason could be given than magister dixit, the dancing-master, or Lord Chesterfield, has said so. It is not esteemed well-bred for a man to harangue in his own praise; and politeness prescribes, as a rule of propriety, an apparent deference towards the opinions of others. The diffusion of education is another cause of the abatement of egotism: there is less inequality in the condition of the people in this respect than heretofore, and which often constituted the ground of arrogant comparison. The evil habit, however, never will be effectually subdued. There is something in confidence which captivates, and in falsehood which staggers. Every egotist is therefore surrounded with a cluster of satellites, whose curiosity, or perhaps wonder, he often mistakes for applause.

It is usual to consider vanity as, in general, a harmless quality, especially when it clings to men possessed of some intellectual endowments. But when it openly develops itself by egotism, it is not only more obnoxious, but more dangerous, than when it lurks in the breast, and is detected only by the eye of discernment. An egotist who is intent only upon extolling himself, whose constant aim is to make I "the hero of each little tale," must be often tempted to practise cunning and deceit, besides being presumptuous and dogmatical. A vulgar egotist is distinguished by impudence and falsehood; and an egotist of a higher rank in life partakes, in some degree, of the same qualities.

The most common forms in which egotism discloses itself at the present day are the four following:

First, by complaint that the world, or some portion of it, has not done justice to the egotist; he has been wronged; he has been grossly abused; his merit has been overlooked, or scornfully disparaged. Hence he acquires the precious privilege of expatiating upon the sole agreeable topic; and he resolves to tell his case to the public, though he would do better, in many instances, to tell it to his physician.*

Arrias is an egotist of this sort. He complains of being the victim of oppression; but it is evident that his only motive to complaint is a desire to talk of himself. His oppressors do him a real favour by refusing to remedy his alleged wrongs. Meanwhile the press groans with his lucubrations, which are everlastingly about himself. His friends grow sick of the cloying theme; yet he perseveres, and

"spins the slight self-pleasing thread again."

Men of sense discover a refutation of his case in his own tedious details. He sets up his superficial understanding as the standard of perfection, and quarrels with those which are superior to it. His praise is worthless, because it can be purchased by flattery; his abuse is harmless, for it is bestowed indiscriminately upon all who dissent from him. His knowledge is skin-deep only: yet "he will talk,—ye gods, how he will talk!" He boasts of his sagacity, yet he is the instrument of those whom he governs.

Egotism in this form is the most ridiculous. It manifests itself, secondly, by an affectation of singularity. This is a very refined species of egotism. A person who declaims perpetually upon his own astonishing talents, or upon the dullness of mankind in overlooking them, seldom attains his object, of provoking attention, so effectually, as he who confesses some amiable infirmity, or who discovers a nice peculiarity of taste, which discriminates him from the grosser species of the human genus. The celebrated beau Brummell affected to dislike all vegetable food, though he acknowledged, with some reluctance, that, once in his life, he ate a pea. Men of this character are careless of the sacrifices they incur. Taking opium in immoderate quantity is occasionally used as a trick to attract observation. A hobbling gait, a distortion of the muscles of the face, pretended defect of sight, a peculiar twirl of the head, a sepulchral cough, a pair of creaking boots, nostrils choaked with indurated snuff, a shabby hat, &c. &c. are often really employed quasi deumt—"pray look at me!"

A third description of egotists are those who entrap the admiration of the world by means of deceptions practised through the public press. These are chiefly

* "I will tell it to the world," quoth Smellfungus; "you had better tell it," said I, "to your physician." Sterne attributed Smollett's inferiority to life.

chiefly professional men and authors. We read occasionally in the newspapers such paragraphs as the following :

"We are concerned to hear that Dr. — has sustained considerable personal injury by the overturning of his carriage; he has, in consequence, determined, for the future, to visit his numerous patients on foot."

Or, "It is not Mr. J., but Mr. I., whose play has been so highly commended in the green-room, and amongst the first dramatic circles."

Or, "We are happy to state that Mr. —, whose death was announced some days since, is perfectly well, and engaged in preparing his poems for the press."

Numerous are the expedients of this nature daily employed to awaken public attention, and thereby gratify the vanity of an egotist.

A fourth, and the most despicable species of egotism is that wherein the person bullies mankind into an opinion of his consequence. This is accomplished by a swaggering and assuming demeanour, which some people unhappily mistake for a symptom of overboiling courage, and respect it accordingly. Treading intentionally upon a gouty toe, and offering the satisfaction of a gentleman to the crippled patient; creating a disturbance in the boxes of a theatre; obtruding a card upon every frivolous occasion; and interlarding the discourse with such phrases as "cropping ears," or "letting light through the body," or "blowing out brains;"—these are the characteristics of Thrasonical egotism.

Whatever opinion may be entertained as to the innocuous character of egotism in respect to its interference with the social duties, it cannot be disputed that this weakness is dangerous to the possessor, since it exposes him to become the easy prey of artifice and fraud. Even the Thrasonical egotist is obnoxious to the same peril, and may be made a gull by the merest novice in the art of crafty adulation. A man may doubtless possess numerous qualities more pernicious both to himself and to others, than that of which we are treating; and should his character be compact of egotism alone, he may still console himself with the maxim of La Bruyère: "Un caractère bien fade est celui de n'en avoir aucun."

One might imagine that it was an overweening egotism which suggested the ridiculous system of egoism to the German philosophers, who made ego, or I, a sort of magical being. "The ego of Fichte," says Dugald Stewart, "has a creative power: it creates existence, and it creates science; two things which, according to him, are one and the same. Even my own existence, he tells me, commences only with the reflex act by which I think of the pure and primitive ego. On this identity of the intelligent ego and the existing ego (which Fichte expresses by the formula $\text{ego} = \text{ego}$) all science ultimately rests! "

OF THE ANTIQUITY AND ORIGIN OF THE CHINESE, AND OF THE CHINESE EMPIRE.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR, Mr. Davis's Memoir concerning the Chinese, printed in the Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society, and inserted in your Journal,* is a valuable acquisition on the subject of Chinese history; and I think I shall but further the views of its learned author, as to the formation and diffusion of distinct ideas in relation to the inquiry, if I request you to insert a few notes, which I have been led to make during its perusal.

1. Mr. Davis supposes the authentic history of the national occurrences of the Chinese to begin with the beginning of the dynasty of Chow, about the year before Christ 1,100.

2. The dynasty of Chow he continues till about the year before Christ 240, or 200; when Chi, King of Tsin, at the close of the Chen-kwo, or period of the "contending nations," obliges six of the neighbouring states to acknowledge his superiority, and assuming the title of Hoang-ti, or emperor, founded the Chinese empire, and became its first emperor. Chi-hoang-ti appears to have been troubled with foreign enemies abroad, and by public opinion at home. He built the great wall, and burned the books of the philosophers.

3. The Chinese empire, as founded by Chi, embraced the greatest portion of the northern half of Modern China; and is that which we ought to regard as Ancient China, or China Proper, known, as it should seem, to the Chinese, by the name of Han. "At the present day," says Mr. Davis, "the term for a Chinese, in contradistinction to a Tartar, is Han-jin, 'a man of Han.'" The dynasties of which Chi was the founder, or rather, perhaps, the dynasty which, in the person of Chi, assumed the empire, is called the dynasty or dynasties of Han. The doubling of the dynasties of Han implies only the change of place of the court. The first dynasty is called si, or "western," from its having resided in Shen-si; and the second, tung, or "eastern," from the removal of the court to Honan. The removal was occasioned by the troubles and territorial losses, which ended in the overthrow of the dynasty or dynasties of Han. Mr. Davis applies to this dynasty or dynasties the name of Han, or Tsin, indifferently. Tsin, as I understand Mr. D., was the ancient kingdom of Chi, and was one of the states of Han, of the whole of which Chi possessed himself. Han is the ancient name of the northern half of China, extending from the great river Keang to the confines of Tartary.

4. The dynasty of Han, or Tsin, or race of Chi-hoang-ti, reigned, with various grandeur, during a period of something more than four centuries; that is, till about the year of Christ 220. Its career was troubled by the Tartars, with whom it formed alliances, to whom it paid tribute. In its latter days, reigning princes ceased to bear the title of Hoang-ti, or emperor, and were contented with that of Choo, or lord. It is a celebrated and favourite period of Chinese history. Learning is said to be under great obligations to it: paper and ink are said to have been invented in it.

5. To the period of the one empire of Han, but still under the Han dynasty, succeeded, about A. D. 220, that of the San-Kwo, or Three Nations—all "men of Han," or Chinese. "The dress of that period," says Mr. Davis, "as represented on the stage and in pictures, forms a singular contrast with the

the modern garb, which has been forced upon the Chinese by their Tartar conquerors. Instead of the long queue, or tail, proceeding from a single tuft at the back of the head, the ancient Chinese are depicted with fine heads of hair, folded beneath their caps, and with dresses of a fashion differing altogether from the national costume of the present day."

6. The period of the San-Kwo lasted from about A.D. 220 to about A.D. 416, when it was succeeded by that of the Woo-tae, or Five Short Dynasties, the occupants of a third duplicate of centuries. Under these dynasties, China, which, by this time, had extended itself to the southward of the Keang, was divided into two empires, the northern and the southern, between which the river just named was the reciprocal boundary. In the year of Christ 585, an usurper of the northern empire made himself master of the southern also; and thus China, north and south of the Keang, became one territory.

7. In the year 620, a new revolution, as we are left by Mr. Davis to conclude, gave to the Chinese empire a new dynasty of sovereigns, distinguished by the name of Tang. This dynasty lasted till the year 900; after which Mr. Davis enumerates five others. Of these, the first, to which he gives no name, reigned from the year 900 to 950; and the second, that of Sung, from 950 to 1281.

8. But whatever were the contentions and revolutions in China, previous to the thirteenth century, all the dynasties which successively appeared in it were Chinese, or natives of the soil. In 1281, the Tartars, for the first time, established themselves in China. These were the Mongols, or Western Tartars, under Cobloï, or Kouli Khan, and their dominion lasted only a part of a century.

9. In 1365, the Chinese sovereignty was restored, under the dynasty Ming.

10. In 1644, the Manchow, or Eastern Tartars, overthrew the dynasty Ming, and established, in China, a throne, which they maintain to the present time.

The following is a recapitulation of dates.

In this manner, as we are taught by Mr. Davis, about three thousand years of Chinese history may be traced, and the origin of the empire assigned to a date of about two thousand years gone by. The antiquity and origin of the Chinese, the founders of the empire, is a different question; and, in reality, their origin is one question, and their antiquity another.

Respecting their antiquity, Mr. Davis runs no risk when he rejects, as unauthenticated and suspicious, many of the earlier traditions. All ancient history commences with fable, or with traditions, of which the facts are mutilated, lated, the dates usually lost, and consequently the order of their occurrences disarranged. When history, as in the case of that of the Chinese, attempts to present us with the persons of the inventors of the earliest arts of life, this at least is certain, that it greatly errs if it describes those inventors as living in an advanced stage of society, and as filling places in any thing that corresponds with our ideas of governments or states. The existence of the earlier arts necessarily precedes that of what is commonly called civilization; and civilization, that of kingdoms and empires. If, however, we substitute the title of "chiefs" for that of "princes" (a distinction merely of association), it is, perhaps, less improbable than may at first sight be imagined, and as Mr. Davis so strongly insists, that a chief and an inventor should be one and the same person; since talent might equally make the inventor a chief, or the chief an inventor. Neither is it so wholly out of historical probability, as Mr. Davis, after M. de Pauw, may contend, that princes (even those of some pretension to the title, in consistence with our modern ideas) should be the recorded inventors of even humble articles of use. It is said, it will be remembered (and with no violation of probability in narrative), that our English Alfred was the inventor of the lanthorn. As to the rest, mankind has commonly enveloped the history of the invention of the early arts in fable, either describing inventors as gods, or gods as inventors. To fable of one of these descriptions we are doubtless to refer the Fô-hi of the Chinese.

But the truth is, that all this invention, generally speaking, precedes any date at which we are to look for the origin of the Chinese. The inventions were, in reality, performed before the Chinese had a name or separate existence. When, then, did this name, and national or separate existence, begin? How long have the Chinese, the men of Han, possessed a place upon the earth as a people? Assuredly this possession began some time between the invention of the earlier arts, and the appearance of the Chinese as a powerful people—before the dynasty of Han, and even before that of Chow. But what date shall we assign to it?

Mr. Davis refers to the Chinese history of the regulation of the calendar by Chuen-hiô, whom the Chinese describe as living at an era which corresponds with that of the two thousandth year before Christ, or nine hundred years before Mr. Davis's era of Chow. In this Chinese date there seems nothing very incredible; but, on the other hand, Mr. Davis's astronomical objection may be valid, and may reduce the antiquity of the calendar of Chuen-hiô six hundred years.

Menu is supposed by Sir William Jones to have written more than a thousand years before Christ, and his work makes mention of the "Chinas." In this manner we trace the "Chinas" backward for a period of at least four thousand years.

But Mr. Davis thinks himself entitled to assume, that the Chinese nation, in the time of Menu, was in a state of infancy; and on this, as on another occasion, mistakes, as I think, the conclusion properly to be drawn from the words of the Indian lawgiver, who tells us that "many families of the military class, having gradually abandoned the ordinances of the Veda, and the company of Brahmens, lived in a state of degradation; as the 'Chinas,' and some other nations." Mr. Davis having connected this passage with his discussion of the antiquity of the Chinese, or their degree of national grandeur at the remote era referred to, I must conclude that, by the words "state of degradation," he understands state of weakness. In no other sense can I interpret the sentence which follows his extract from Menu: "The great antiquity," says Mr. D., "of the laws of Menu, is in favour of the above testimony; for, at the period at which Sir W. Jones supposes them to have been written (above one thousand years B.C.), there can be no doubt whatever but the Chinese nation was yet in its infancy, and that it could lay no claim to the character of an extensive, united, and powerful empire until many years after that date." How Mr. Davis contrives to discover all this in the words which he cites from Menu, I am wholly at a loss to divine. Had he, on the other hand, reserved his conclusion as a tail-piece to his quotation from Dr. Morrison's Chinese Chronology, which immediately succeeds it, I should have found somewhat less difficulty perhaps.—"I content myself," adds Mr. D., "with noticing, in this place, the statement of one of their own histories (see Morrison's Chinese Chronology, p. 52) that, twelve hundred years before Christ, the Chinese nation was small and feeble; the Eastern foreigners (that is, the aborigines, perhaps Tartars, between them and the east [sea?] coast) numerous and strong."

The description of an "extensive, united, and powerful empire," and the words "small," "feeble," "numerous," and "strong," have so much latitude of meaning, and are so comparative, and consequently equivocal, in their import, that it is almost impossible either to admit or to reject their use; yet, I confess, that upon the strength of the passage in the Chinese Chronology (always supposing the fidelity of the double quotation) I should be disposed to arrive at the conclusion, that, twelve hundred years before Christ, the Chinese, though they had a national existence, were a small and insignificant nation—were it not for what I think proofs to the contrary, furnished me by Mr. Davis's Memoir.

In the first place, Mr. Davis places the beginning of the race of Chow eleven hundred years before Christ; which is no more than one hundred years after the Chinese nation is described in the Chronology as small and feeble, in comparison with the aborigines (whimsically called the foreigners) of the sea-coast, or eastern part of the country. Now, I can easily believe both these statements together. I can easily believe that Mr. Davis's authentic history commences within a hundred years of the time when the Chinese were small and feeble—compared with their neighbours—but not so, that it commences within a hundred years of the time when the Chinese were small and feeble—positively speaking. Again: I can easily believe that the Chinese nation, "above a thousand years before Christ," that is, exactly at the date of the commencement of Mr. Davis's authentic history, did not possess, comparatively speaking, "an extensive, united, and powerful empire;" but I cannot easily believe that the Chinese, at that date, did not possess an empire of some extent, some unity, and some power.

Mr. Davis places the era of Confucius in the middle of the dynasty of Chow, or about five hundred years before Christ; and attributes to the same date the subtle philosophy of Laou-Keun. The Chinese, he tells us, have no records older than the compilations of Confucius. The escape of history from fable he dates, somewhat variously, either at the beginning, or at the middle (the era of Confucius) of the dynasty of Chow. The building of the Great Wall, and the colonization of Japan, he gives to the second century before Christ; and the introduction of Buddhism, or the religion of Fô, into China, he assigns to the first century of the Christian reckoning.

But, by the side of all these arrangements, Mr. Davis presents us, as I think, with testimony to a material and conspicuous existence of the Chinese of a higher antiquity than he is himself willing to allow. He addresses that passage of Menu, which I have repeated after his pen, and from which I think we are entitled to conclude that the Chinese were a people of power and renown in the days of the author of the Hindoo Institutes; or, "above a thousand years before Christ."

This is a question, however, to be examined along with that of the origin of the Chinese, a subject upon which, likewise, I think myself obliged to dissent, with deference, from the conjecture of Mr. Davis; and which, together with the interpretation of the passage quoted from Menu, I shall discuss in a future letter.

I am, &c.

NEW FOUR PER CENT. LOAN.

THIS loan seems to have produced much discussion in India, where opinions differ as to the comparative merits of its securities. As many persons in England are probably interested in it, we subjoin a statement on each side of the question.

The following article appears in the Calcutta John Bull:

We have had our attention directed to the rate of the 4 per cent. promissory notes, of the new loan, as quoted in the Exchange Gazette, which we are assured is so far incorrect that, when purchasers are eagerly seeking for paper at the discount therein stated, not a single note is to be had in the market. How this error has arisen it is impossible for us to guess; but its existence is calculated very much to mislead capitalists at the other presidencies and in the Mofussil, who, under such an impression as that likely to be produced by the report of the paper being at such a discount, may be induced to forward instructions to purchase that which is not to be had at the rate described. It has been suggested to us, and we cannot but agree in the suggestion, that the rates of government paper should be given from bonâ fide transactions, and not on the mere authority of any shroff in the bazar, who may be deeply interested in conveying to the public an erroneous estimation of the value of an article, which is intimately connected with all mercantile transactions on a large scale. It is scarcely necessary, therefore, to point out how very injurious such errors must be in their operation on those at a distance, who have no other means of knowing the state of the money market. There are other considerations to which we might advert; but we are only desirous of having accurate rates published for the public guidance, and shall, therefore, abstain.

With respect to the promissory notes of the four per cent. loan being at a discount, from what we can learn on the subject, such a circumstance would afford matter for no little surprise; since, if our information is correct, the advantages which it offers to purchasers exceed those of the six per cent. remittable loan, which is now at a premium of 33 and 34 rupees—the last month it was as high as 37-8. Let us contrast the situation of a purchaser at the present moment in both. The six per cent. remittable loan has little more than nine years to run; at which period, for every hundred rupees of paper, for which now 134 rupees must be given, 100 rupees in cash, or in bills on the Court of the Directors, at 2s. 6d. the sicca rupee, payable twelve months after date, will be given; if the purchaser receives the cash here, he at once loses his 34 rupees, premium, which he paid on purchasing the paper, or 3 Rs. 12 annas per annum for the nine years, while during that period he will only have received 6 Rs. per ann., about 4½ per cent.; thus deriving only two rupees, four annas per annum on his capital of 134 rupees, not quite 1½ per cent. If he takes a bill on the Court of Directors, its value will depend upon the rate of exchange at the time; but as it is understood that by far the greater portion of this loan belongs to creditors in England, it is reasonable to suppose that an immense amount of bills will be at once thrown into the market, and and probably not be saleable at a more favourable rate than 2s. the rupee.

At this rate, the holder of paper to the amount of 100 rupees, will obtain for his bills sicca rupees 125, which being deducted from the sum he paid for the paper, viz. 134, he will obviously lose nine rupees, or one rupee per annum, which, deducted from the interest received, will leave short of four per cent. per annum, on his capital of 134 rupees. But this is by far a more favourable view of the probable rate of exchange at the period alluded to, than we are entitled to calculate upon. The present rate may assuredly be considered as a minimum; and the probabilities are, that, without the operation of the large influx of bills, which the paying off of the loan will create, that the rate will increase. Suppose, then, they should not be saleable under the rate of 2s. 3d. per rupee; in this case, a holder of 100 rupees of paper would receive 111 rupees 11 annas for his 134 rupees; sustaining a loss of 22 rupees 5 annas, rather more than 2 rupees 7 annas per annum, reducing his interest on his 134 rupees to 3 rupees 9 annas per annum, or about 2 rupees 3 annas per cent. per annum. These are the probable situations of purchasers at the present moment of the six per cent. remittable loan. The new remittable five per cent. paper may be shewn in the same manner, not to be calculated for present purchasers; though the interest which a present purchaser may expect for his money may be a trifle more than in the six per cent. remittable. Let us now see what are the prospects of a purchaser in the four per cent. loan. Instead of the reduced rates we have shewn above, he will be secured in the receipt of 4 per cent. per annum; and instead of having to look forward to a loss, on account of premium, at the day of payment, he may fairly anticipate a rise in the value of his paper, in proportion as the others deteriorate as the day of payment approaches. At the period of nine years he may look forward to selling out at a premium, and, if he is a resident in England, to a much more favourable rate of exchange, a rate indeed rendered more favourable by the payment of the other loan. There are various other considerations, as affecting a resident in England, which would render the purchase of the new paper preferable: but which we need not touch upon at present. We think we have said enough to shew the superiority, in every respect, of the new loan over the other at their present rates of premium. With respect to the probable increase in the value of money, it is well known that three per cent. was lately refused on loans secured by government paper, and that large sums are now held at the low rate of 2½ per cent. for a long term on similar security; and we believe no doubt exists that a return to similar low rates will take place when the four per cent. loan is closed. Our only object, in thus noticing the subject, is to do away with a very erroneous impression that has got abroad, highly prejudicial, in our opinion, to the interests of those who have capital to invest.

The subsequent counter-statement was soon after inserted, from a correspondent, in the India Gazette:

Sir: The John Bull has been labouring, with more than his usual zeal, to prove the superiority of the new four per cent. loan to the other securities of the hon. Company. He has arrived at some extraordinary conclusions, which might well induce him to suspect the accuracy of his reasonings; but he appears to be fully satisfied, and I am not disposed to disturb his self-complacence. The subject, however, is one of much importance; and I will, therefore, with your permission, endeavour to set it in a proper light, by contrasting the real values of the new four per cent. loan and the remittable loan at six per cent.

The present premium on the remittable loan may be taken at 34 per cent. Suppose, then, that you have sicca rupees 134 which you wish to lay out in government securities, and are doubtful whether to purchase a note for rupees 100 in the six per cent. remittable loan, or to advance your money to the new loan at 4 per cent. By preferring the former, the interest of your money will amount to . . . Rs. 6 0 0 by choosing the latter, your interest will be only . . . Rs. 5 9 such being the interest of Rs. 100 at 4 per cent. There is, then, in favour of the six per cent. loan a difference of interest of . . . 0 10 3 But this is not all. Your six rupees in the one case will fetch in the English market . . . 12s. 6d.

the interest being remittable at 2s. 1d., while, in the other case, your 5r. 5s. 9p. will procure only 10s 8½d. Such being its value at the exchange of 2s. in the English market; then, there is a difference of..... 1 9½ which brought back to Calcutta at the same rate of exchange is equal to 14s. 4p., and this is the true difference of interest in favour of the holder of the remittable loan above the holder of the new four per cent. loan.

So much for interest. Let us now look to the value of your principal, when you are obliged to convert your securities into cash.

Your note for Rs. 100 in the remittable, secures to you, in the English market, at the termination of the Company's charter, £12. 10s. sterling; the loan being payable at the exchange of 2s. 6d. I think it is assuming too much to say, that you may calculate on the exchange of the day, nine years hence, being at 2s.; but suppose it for the sake of argument. At that rate, your Rs. 134 in the four per cent. loan, will procure £13. 11s. in the English market, and consequently £1. 4s. more than the same sum invested in the remittable. This difference in favour of the new loan, when transferred to the Calcutta, at the same rate of exchange, is equal to Rs. 12.

That is, therefore, the loss of principal which you will sustain by preferring the remittable loan. But to meet this loss you have an annual increase of interest of 14s. 4p. which at six per cent compound interest will amount in nine years to about 9r. 9s. 2p.; leaving a difference in favour of the holder of the four per cent. loan of only 2r. 6s. 10p.

It must be recollected, that, in order to produce this small difference, it is necessary to assume, that the rate of exchange will not fall below two shillings. This is an assumption, however, on which a possessor of capital will not reckon; and there is nothing in the present state of the money market to sanction it. Although the necessities of government may, for a short time, raise the value of money in India, this value cannot be maintained so long as capital remains at its present low value in the English market, and is free to move from thence to supply the deficiencies of the market of Calcutta, and the credit of the East-India Company preserves its present level in England.

NECROLOGY.

No. V.

GENERAL SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

THIS highly distinguished officer entered the British army as early as the year 1776. He was appointed an ensign in the Royals, and was promoted to the rank of lieutenant in the same corps, 25th Dec. 1778. In the month of April 1780, he obtained a company in the 97th regiment of foot, and served in that corps at the celebrated siege of Gibraltar, in the year 1782. He was soon afterwards placed upon half-pay; but in December 1787 he was attached to the 74th regiment. He became major by brevet in 1794, and obtained a majority in the before-named regiment in the succeeding year. Soon after he had risen to the rank of lieutenant-colonel (4th Dec. 1795), he accompanied the 74th to India, and rendered himself very conspicuous in the Mysore war, and at the capture of Seringapatam in the year 1799. One exploit which he performed upon this occasion, and which created great confusion in the Sultan's army, was an attack upon a circular work, from which he dislodged the enemy with great gallantry, pursuing them across the bridge of communication, and entering the island with the fugitives. He came upon the right of the Sultan's entrenched camp, where he bayoneted some of the enemy in their tents, and spiked several guns.

He attained the rank of colonel in the army in the month of September 1803; and when the present Duke of Wellington commenced his campaigns in Spain, Col. Campbell served in his army with the rank of brigadier-general.

In the arduous conflicts which attended the commencement of that war, so gloriously terminated, Brigadier Campbell greatly distinguished himself; but particularly at the severe and well-contested battle of Talavera, 27th July 1809.

Upon that occasion he was posted in a commanding spot of ground between the two armies. When the enemy had been defeated on other points, he commenced a desperate attack upon Gen. Campbell's position. The result is best expressed in the concise but flattering words of the Duke of Wellington: "This attack was most successfully repulsed by Brig. Gen. A. Campbell, who took the enemy's cannon; and I was highly satisfied with the manner in which this part of the position was defended."

In the general orders published at home soon after this action, his Majesty, in communicating his approbation of the conduct of the several general and other officers at the battle of Talavera, observed that the instances of their previous gallantry had not escaped him; and a comment upon this remark subsequently appeared in a list of the names of officers, to whom a medal was awarded for their distinguished services at Roleia, Vimiera, Corunna, and Talavera, among which we find that of Brigadier General Campbell.

In Dec. 1809, Col. Campbell obtained the colonelcy of the York Light Infantry Volunteers; and in July 1810, he was advanced to the rank of major general.

At the actions of Casal Nova and Foy d'Aronce, in March 1811, Major Gen. Campbell found new opportunities of distinguishing himself; and his name is mentioned in the despatches of the commander of the combined army with commendation.

Next year he was appointed to the command in chief of the forces at the island of Mauritius; and was made lieut. general in June 1814. He returned to England in the year 1819; and was appointed, in the latter end of the year 1820, to the post of commander-in-chief of the army at the Presidency of Fort St. George, with the rank of full general in the East-Indies.

Having spent a large portion of his military life in this part of the world, General Campbell had obtained a minute acquaintance with the habits, temper, and feelings of the native soldiery. The beneficial results of this experience on the part of this lamented officer, in conjunction with that of Sir Thomas Munro, the Governor of Fort St. George, whose local intelligence is deep and extensive, are strongly displayed in the promptitude and zeal manifested by the Madras sepoys at the breaking out of the Burmese war. When the government of Madras announced the orders of preparation for the Rangoon expedition to the army, every man on furlough, every regiment in distant cantonments, eagerly contended to be allowed to join it; and although the orders permitted any soldier to exchange without incurring reproach, only three individuals out of eleven thousand, availed themselves of the privilege, and they only on the score of age and infirmity. One corps of infantry made the astonishing march of 300 miles in thirteen consecutive days, under a burning sun, in order to be ready for embarkation.

In the month of November last, General Campbell suffered an attack of apoplexy; he partially recovered, and great hopes were entertained that he would be enabled to overcome the effects of it; but a further attack terminated the the life of this distinguished and highly esteemed individual, on the 11th December, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

Every testimony of respect towards his memory was manifested by the government and the army. At the funeral, which took place the ensuing day, the governor and members of council at Fort St. George officiated as pall-bearers; minute-guns were fired from the fort-battery; and nearly the whole of the gentlemen of the society of the presidency joined the procession, which was accompanied by a vast concourse of natives.

The Government general orders, dated the 11th day of December, contained the following tribute to the memory of the deceased general :

“ With much grief the hon. the Governor in Council announces to the army the demise of His Exc. General Sir Alexander Campbell, Bart., K.C.B., commander-in-chief at this Presidency, which took place this morning at eight o'clock A.M. Sir A. Campbell's close connexion with the army of Fort St. George, and his cordial attachment to it, which had subsisted for a period of thirty years, were confirmed by his share in some of its most honourable achievements, and completed by the high station which he filled at the termination of his distinguished career.”

His successor in the chief command, Lieut. Gen. Bowser, thus expresses himself in his general orders, dated 15th December :

“ Lieut. Gen. Bowser succeeds to the command of the Madras Army, with no common feelings of pride and satisfaction; its long established character and increasing fame, he has witnessed through every rank. The high principles of military pride and devotion to the service, which have long characterized this army, and which were supported and impressed by the late lamented and distinguished Commander-in-chief, His Exc. General Sir Alexander Campbell, Bart., and K.C.B., with such energy, as justly to mark the value and ability of that gallant soldier, who was so devotedly attached to his profession, and so true a friend to the Madras army; an army in which he had served with such enviable reputation, that the lieutenant general cannot but express his hope, that these principles will be strictly attended to; and he pledges his assurance that he will not fail in his best endeavours to unite, with Sir Alexander Campbell's professional pride and zeal, his never-ceasing anxiety for the honour and interest of the Madras army, which will long deplore the irreparable loss of such a Man and such an Officer.”*

General Campbell was a Baronet, and a Knight Commander of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath. He was twice married: first to Miss Morshead, sister of Sir John Morshead, Bart., of Trenant Park, Cornwall, by whom he had two sons (both of whom fell in action) and three daughters. The eldest daughter married Alexander Cockburn, Esq., of Madras (deceased), and perished at sea. The second married Major General Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., of Hyde Hall, Sawbridgeworth. The youngest married Lieut. Col. Macdonald Kinneir. Sir Alexander's second wife, the present Lady Campbell, is a daughter of the late Rev. Thomas Pemberton, and by her he had a daughter. The baronetcy descended by special provision, to the issue of his daughters successively; the present inheritor is the General's grandson, Mr. (now Sir Alexander) Cockburn, who, we believe, intends to assume the name and arms of his grandfather.

* The remarkable manner in which the Madras sepoys distinguished themselves at Rangoon will be seen in a subsequent part of this Journal, from a private communication from thence with which we have been favoured.

Review of Books.

Origines; or Remarks on the Origin of several Empires, States, and Cities.
By the Right Honourable Sir W. DRUMMOND. ... Vols. I. and II. pp. 394 and 519. London, 1824.

THE name of Sir William Drummond is familiar to the learned world. He is the author of an excellent translation of Persius, several very profound and elaborate articles in the Classical Journal, and he published, conjointly with Mr. Robert Walpole, a few years back, some valuable disquisitions upon subjects connected with the discoveries at Herculaneum, entitled Herculaneum. He is also well known by his learned controversy with Mr. (now Dr.) D'Oyly, respecting a curious work called Œdipus Judaicus, and of which Sir Wm. Drummond was the author.

The present work Sir William candidly confesses he does not expect will excite attention beyond the closet of the antiquary. It is an attempt to investigate, elucidate, and reconcile subjects which seem to be in the same state of conflict as the elements during the reign of chaos, dark as the palpable gloom of Erebus, and profound as the deepest gulf which plummet has vainly been employed to sound. The learned author is qualified for the adventure he has engaged in by his knowledge of the ancient sciences, and especially by his acquaintance with their languages. The volumes before us contain quotations, which may well appal an ordinary reader, from Hebrew and Chaldaic, Ethiopic and Coptic, Arabic and Persian, in their original characters, besides Greek, Latin, and modern European tongues. To follow a writer who has displayed such an extent of research and erudition, would demand not merely the talents, but the comprehensive and varied acquisitions, which distinguish Sir Wm. Drummond.

Were we competent to the task of a close and critical analysis of such a work as this, the limits of our Journal could not afford space for the investigation. We have read it diligently through; and we think that in most of Sir William's efforts to overthrow the hypotheses of former writers, he has fully succeeded. That he has been always equally fortunate in establishing his own, we cannot prevail upon ourselves to admit. Evidence derived from etymological inquiries and comparisons is, in its very nature, uncertain and suspicious; and the ease with which a writer demolishes a fabric raised upon such a ground, generates a doubt as to the stability of that which is newly erected by him upon a similar basis.

In calculating the value of proofs derived from the similarity of words and names in different languages, we are deficient in the knowledge of a fact which is very essential to be known, namely, the respective modes of pronunciation employed by different people. The Greek and Latin writers may throw some dubious light upon this subject; but when we penetrate to remote ages, what shadow of certainty can attend our deductions from apparent resemblances of words, when we know that the Chinese, for example, are incapable of articulating the sounds uttered by other nations (pronouncing Russia Golosce); and that the sound appropriated to a given character differs, toto cælo, in the various dependencies of that empire?

Sir W. Drummond anticipates the objection which may be urged against etymological proof by the only rational argument in its favour, namely, that where where no other species of evidence can be procured, we must be content with that or none.

The first book of the Origines is devoted to an inquiry into the origin of the Babylonian empire.

The dimensions of the city of Babylon Sir William has endeavoured to fix with as much precision as the conflicting authorities allow. The walls of the city composed a square; and each side of the square formed by the city itself extended 7 English miles, 3 furlongs, and 180 feet, which was also the length of each of the 50 streets, one half of which crossed the other at right angles, and divided the city into 625 squares; and these were laid out in gardens. Allowing for the space occupied by the Euphrates, and for the enclosures in which the temple of Belus, the hanging gardens, and the royal palaces, were situated, the capital of Chaldaea must, he thinks, have contained many more houses than London; and as Herodotus describes the houses as mostly three or four stories high, the population must have been immense.

After endeavouring to reconcile the accounts of Eusebius and Georgius Syncellus respecting the names and periods of rule of the antediluvian kings of Babylon, the writer enters upon the fabulous history of the empire, contained in the romance of Berossus, which he assigns reasons for believing to contain allegorical representations of real facts, or occult records of astronomical and scientific truths.

In this part of the work (vol. i., chap. iv.) the author shews that the first descendants of the individuals saved from the deluge became heliolators; and that Tsahaism was a very prevailing form of religion amongst the nations and people of the world at that early period. Hence he derives a medium of explanation, by referring proper names to the sun and heavenly objects; and by connecting recorded events with astronomical phenomena.

He assumes, and justly, that the oriental nations were well acquainted with astronomy; and demonstrates from the sarai, or periods allotted to the ancient kings of Babylon, that this part of the history is nothing else than an astronomical allegory. The other extravagancies of the Babylonian writer, Sir William explains in a similar manner:

Thus the centaurs of Berossus may represent the first men, who mounted and subdued the wild steeds of the desert. In the satyrs of the same fabulist we may recognize the mountain tribes, that drank the milk, and clothed themselves with the shaggy hides, of their goats. The monsters, who with the bodies of men had the heads of bulls, may have been the symbols of the herdsmen who defended their cattle against the attacks of beasts of prey. Those, who dwelt on the banks of the Tigris and the Euphrates, and who gained their livelihood by fishing, may have been represented under the forms of men with the tails of fishes; and the dog-headed monsters may have typified the hunters of the forest, who shared with their dogs the dangers and the pleasures of the chase.

Considered under this point of view the language of Berossus becomes intelligible; and the author, ceasing to be a fabulist, rises to the rank of an historian.

By collating the names of the monsters, in the fragments of Berossus recorded in Greek, with Chaldaic words, which they obviously resemble, Sir William seems to corroborate his hypothesis; and he observes, that when the veil of allegory is withdrawn, the picture presented to us is interesting and curious.

We confess that we discredit the early history of Berossus altogether. Fables may (as our author observes in p. 364) mingle in the narrative of Livy; but it is easy to distinguish the wanderings of credulity.

In his account of the deluge, Sir Wm. Drummond considers that Berossus borrowed from the Old Testament, concealing this theft by puerile variations; for example, he describes the ark as more than a quarter of a mile long!

The Babylonian writer makes the vessel rest in Armenia; and Sir Wm. Drummond has demonstrated, by geographical data, that the place of descent was the mountains of Kurdistan. He shews that אֲרָרַט, Ararat, or properly Arri, is a name not of Hebrew origin; and maintains the probability that the ancient Persian art or ard (high, great) would, by the guttural pronunciation of the Armenians, be converted into khard, or khurd. Two Targumists, Jonathan and Onkelos, wrote Kardon and Kardu for Ararat, or Arri.

On the subject of the tower of Babel, Sir William declares his belief that the general dispersion of the descendants of Noah (which he invariably writes Noach) took place ages before the erection of that edifice; and that the contrary opinion is not supported by the authority of the sacred historian. This statement he sustains (cc ix.—xi.) with great learning, and in a very ingenious manner. The Nimrod of Scripture he considers as proved to be the same with the Bel, or Belus, of the Chaldeans, and the Zohak and Amar-Pel, of the Persians; and Ninus was his son, who deified his father, and established the worship of Baal (לַעֲלֵ, dominus); a title applied by the Tsabaists to the sun. This name Sir Wm. Drummond traces in the religions of a vast portion of the world, including the Arabians, Indians, Goths, Celts, and ancient Irish.

Much geographical as well as historical research is displayed by the author in his inquiry into the probable position of the city and tower of Babel. He identifies the Shinar of Scripture with the desert of Sinjar; and fixes upon Senn or Cene (כַּנְעַן, Kana), as it is written in the Anabasis as the same city called Canek, by Ezekiel (xxvii. 23.), and which Hebrew critics agree is identical with Chalne, or Calne, named by the Septuagint as the spot where the ancient tower of Babel was built. This place is on the plain of Sinjar, about seventy geographical miles below Mosul, on the western bank of the Tigris, near to where the lesser Zab falls into that river.

Sir William Drummond traces several institutions to the reign of Belus, or Nimrod:

Belus instituted the order of Priests called Chasidin. These were the instructors of the people, and formed a class by themselves. Established on the same footing as the Priests of Egypt, they were exempt from the payment of all public taxes, and from every species of service. As the priesthood could not go out of their families, fathers were the teachers of sons, and education commenced from infancy (Diod. Sic. L. 2). Man, who is the creature of habit, becomes what education makes him; always indeed in proportion to the capacity and vigour of his mind; but without education he remains a savage, be the strength of his intellect what it may. The first impressions are the strongest; and men in general carry to the tomb the notions which were instilled into them on quitting their cradles. He, who has many teachers, will sometimes be puzzled to reconcile discordant sentiments. Among the Babylonians, learning was confined to one class of men; and among these a son had no other preceptor than his father, except perhaps some of those who were associated with the latter, by having common interests, and by holding common opinions. Thus the principles imbibed in youth were retained in age. The Chaldeans appear to have made great advances in the study of natural philosophy, of mathematics, and of astronomy. Separated from the rest of society, over which they had obtained that influence, which superior knowledge always gives to its possessors, they lived by themselves, and for themselves—Religion was their profession, science their amusement, and government their occupation.

Although it be probable that after the conquest of their country by the Persians, the Chaldeans were compelled to abandon their scientific pursuits; yet, while they gradually lost sight of the mathematical and astronomical knowledge of their ancestors, they seem to have retained their religious doctrines, which might have continued to be still transmitted from one generation to another. It appears, indeed, that down to the time of their final destruction they held and taught the principles of Tsabaism. They thought the nature of the world to be eternal; but they attributed its order and beauty to the Divine Providence; and they believed the motions of the celestial bodies to be produced neither by chance, nor spontaneously, but to result from the fixed decision and from the deliberate judgment of the Deity. (Euseb. Præp. Ev. L. 4. Diodor. Sicul. L. 2.)

With

With the first part of this doctrine sound theology will not be satisfied. Philo Judæus, however, is not authorized in stating that the Chaldeans attributed all things to the motions of the stars; that they believed that these motions dispensed the mundane powers, which result from their numbers and harmonies; that they worshipped only visible objects, examining solely the order of these, and not comprehending objects invisible and intellectual; or finally that from the revolutions of the celestial bodies, the four seasons of the year, and the sympathy of things celestial with things terrestrial, they consider the world itself to be God.—τὸν κόσμον αὐτὸν ὑπάρχον εἶναι Θεόν. The whole of this accusation is distinctly contradicted by Diodorus Siculus, who tells us, that the order and beauty of the universe, according to the Chaldeans, originate with Divine Providence; and, in more direct opposition to the assertions of Philo, he adds, καὶ νῦν ἕκαστα τῶν ἐν οὐρανῷ γινομένων, οὐκ ὡς ἔτυχεν, οὐδ' αὐτομάτως, ἀλλ' ὀρισμένην τινὶ καὶ βεβαίως πεποιημένη θεῶν κρίσει συνετελεσθαι—and now every thing that happens in the heavens is accomplished, neither by chance, nor spontaneously, but by a certain determined and firmly decided judgment of the gods. This is given by the author as the doctrine of the Chaldeans; and it plainly recognizes the existence of final causes, together with that of a superintending Providence. The Chaldeans may not have expressed themselves concerning the Divine Being, and concerning the great truths of natural religion, with the sublimity of Plato, or with the eloquence of Cicero; but if the statement of Diodorus be correct, and I see no reason to suspect its accuracy, they cannot be classed with the hyloistical atheist, who considered mind as a modification of matter, and who mistook the external universe for the infinite intellect, which gives it order, proportion, and beauty.

One custom is mentioned by Herodotus, which has been copied in later times, namely, that of putting the marriageable women up to auction; the handsomest were sold to the highest bidder, and the money they produced was applied as dowry for those whose personal attractions alone could not procure them husbands. The same historian states, that in Babylon there were no physicians; and the sick were carried into the streets, and received gratuitous advice from those who had suffered from the same maladies.

In the next division of his work, Sir William treats of the Assyrian empire. In assigning the geographical limits of Assyria, he has occasion to remark the gross errors of the ancient writers. In his recognition of local names, he here displays much aptitude at etymological research; particularly when he supports the conjecture of Bochart that the name of Lurissu, given in the Anabasis a place on the east bank of the Tigris, is but a corruption of Resen, or rather a transmutation; in the same manner as Istambol, and Stancho have been transformed from Constantinople and Cos, by connecting the preposition and article (εἰς τὴν πόλιν, and εἰς τὴν Κω) to the proper name.

The city of Nineveh was, according to our author, 12 miles, 2 furlongs, 280 feet in length; 7 miles, 2 furlongs, 590 feet in breadth; and 38 miles, 5 furlongs, 70 feet in circumference: the walls were 100 feet high; and the towers, each 200 feet in height, amounted to 1,500. This mighty city, Sir William, after a very elaborate investigation, determines to have occupied the space between the Tigris and the Zab, or Lycus, for an extent of several miles immediately above the confluence of those rivers; and not to have been situated, according to the general opinion, opposite Mosul.

The monarchy of Assyria, our author considers to have been added to that of Babylonia by Ninus, during the lifetime of his father, Belus, or Nimrod. That monarch appears to have been early inspired with the love of military glory; and after he had overrun the wealthy cities of Babylonia, he vanquished Armenia, Media, and Syria, pursued his career beyond Caucasus, and extended his empire along the eastern shores of the Euxine, to the Palus Mæotis, and the Volga. He then employed his troops in building Nineveh: and subsequently annexed the whole kingdom of Iran to the Assyrian empire.

It was during the siege of Bactra (now called Balkh), the last fortress of the Iranian monarch, that the celebrated Semiramis discovered her astonishing talents. She was the wife of the Assyrian chief of the besieging army, named Menones, and being summoned to his aid by her husband, who knew her capacity, during the protracted siege, directed the operations against the fortress, and effected its fall. The admiration of Ninus was easily converted into a more tender sentiment; he demanded her of Menones, who was driven to despair by his threats, and hung himself.

Every obstacle being removed by the death of Menones, Ninus espoused his widow, the celebrated Semiramis, who has been the heroine of history and of fable for nearly four thousand years. Whether she sprang from the unchaste loves of the son of Apollo and of the goddess Derceto, or whether she were the daughter of the shepherd Sinna, her beauty and her talents sufficiently account for the good fortune which attended her. Menones, the Governor of Syria, smitten with the charms of her person, had not disdained to espouse an humble shepherdess; and, soon convinced of the superiority of her judgment to his own, he asked and followed her advice upon every occasion. After his death, when seated on the first throne of the world, she knew how to divide with Ninus the admiration of mankind, and to share the glory of the greatest monarch of the age. In her the King of Assyria found a spirit as lofty, a genius as vast, and an ambition as inordinate as his own; and this haughty prince probably soon discovered, with regret, that he had met with an equal in a wife, and had given to himself a rival in a woman. Uninfluenced by any of the gentler feelings of her sex, Semiramis imitated the manners and even the dress of a man; and, accustomed to hardships, and inured to fatigue, led the life of a soldier at the head of an army. This mighty-minded female seemed indeed to have been born to govern mankind. Her dauntless courage was alarmed at no danger, and perhaps her daring spirit shrunk from no crime. Ambition was her passion, war her occupation, and power her object.

The epoch and duration of the Assyrian empire constitute a subject involved in so much mystery, that it is apparently extremely inviting to a writer of Sir Wm. Drummond's character and pursuits. He quotes a list of authors who, in their respective systems of Assyrian chronology, differ one from another, and each from all the rest. Even the great Newton entered upon this arena, and, according to Sir Wm. Drummond, has been successfully defeated. Our author commences his inquiry by observing that,

After the failure of so many great men to ascertain the exact duration of the Assyrian empire, it is not for inferior strength to undertake the task. Some inquiries may, however, be allowed to curiosity; and probable inferences may be admitted, where certain conclusions cannot be obtained.

The points of inquiry which he proposes to consider are four: the number of reigns from Ninus to Sardanapalus; the accordance of the period they lasted with the period assigned to the empire; how far the conflicting statements of ancient authors are reconcilable; and the epoch when Ninus lived.

With respect to the first point, he considers that the evidence shews the number of reigns to be 33; and with regard to the second, that Velleius Paterculus has mentioned the most probable number of years, namely, 1,070, which differs from the theoretical calculation by only 19 years; in the third place, the authorities, according to Sir William, are not really so irreconcilable as they seem. With reference to the last point, the era of Ninus, he has given a very learned disquisition, which amply proves that, upon this subject,

“All our knowledge is,—we nothing know!”

Sir William concludes this division of his work by some observations upon the reign of Ninyas, in the course of which he has occasion to speak of the exaggerations of authors and travellers concerning the arbitrary power of Asiatic princes; and he shows, in the following passage, that despotism is not so easily exercised as it is generally believed to be:

Two strong feelings have always agitated, in a greater or less degree, the state of human society—the desire to possess power, and the desire to resist it. The struggle between these feelings necessarily exists under every form of government; nor can the most imperious despotism, though it may intimidate and subdue, ever entirely eradicate and destroy the spirit of opposition. We hear of Asiatic despots, who, in the mere wantonness of their moody cruelty, command human beings to be butchered before them; and we are thence apt to infer, that there is no restraint on their will, and no limit to their power. But this is an error into which Europeans have generally fallen, from their imperfect acquaintance with the laws, usages, and manners of eastern nations. It is generally among his ministers, his slaves, and his favourites, that the Asiatic tyrant seeks for his victims. He seldom ventures beyond the sphere of his court to murder or to spoliates; and while the floors of the imperial residence are purpled with the blood of his officers, his vizirs and his concubines, he would pause, ere he unjustly deprived the meanest citizen of his property, or of his life. The man, who passes within the gates of the palace, leaves behind him the sympathy of his fellow-subjects. They know that ambition has guided his steps, to the foot of the throne; and that he has bound himself to obey the will, in order to share the power, of his master. They, therefore, hear with indifference of his disgrace, his exile, or his death; but let a sovereign violate the laws of justice, in depriving a private and unoffending citizen of his liberty, or of his life, and he will learn to his peril in the East, as well as in the West, that no king can be secure on his throne, where no subject is safe in his house. The power of the most despotic monarch must always find its limit at last in public opinion.

The last division of this volume embraces the origin of the empire of Iran, or, as it was denominated by ancient writers, the empire of the Medes and Persians.

The ancient geography of this splendid empire is very ably treated of in the initial chapter of this book. Sir Wm. D. considers the province of Pharsistan as containing the genuine race of Iranians; and it was here that the monarchs of Iran built the magnificent city of Istachar, or Persepolis. As the etymology of Istachar is unsettled, our author has exercised his skill upon this knotty question.

We know the name of Istachar from the modern Persians; and there is nothing improbable in the supposition, that they neither pronounce nor write it correctly. The Romans took the name of Vesta from the ἱστία of the Greeks; and changed, as in other examples, the aspirate for the Æolic digamma. But the Greeks had obtained the word ἱστία from the Orientalists. Eta, in Syriac and in Syro-Chaldaic, signifies fire; and there is reason to think that this word bore the same meaning, and was in use among the ancient Persians. According to Xenophon (Kyp. Hæid. l. 1. 6.) Hestia was one of the Deities adored by Cyrus; and this historian, who must have had some acquaintance with the eastern languages, would hardly have mentioned this word, if he had not known that the Persians worshipped fire under the name of Hestia, Estia, or Eta. Procopius, speaking of the Persians as worshippers of fire, says (l. 1. 24.) this is the fire which the Romans called Hestia, and worshipped in ancient times. Herodotus (l. 4. 59.) informs us, that the Scythians adored Hestia, and that they had changed the name into Tabiti. But I suspect this to be a mere illustration of the word eta; as there can be little doubt, that the name which Herodotus writes Tabiti is the same with the Persian word تابش tabush, which signifies heat, or fire. The capital of Persia may have been originally a pyreum; and its name may have been استاخور Ista-chur, or Eta-chur, ignis Solis. Shahrstan mentions a pyreum named Adur-chur, which likewise signifies the fire of the sun.

This extract will afford an example of several similar attempts in the course of the chapter.

In treating of the origin of the Persian monarchy, our author refers to the ignorance (the surprising ignorance, we should say) of the Greeks upon the subject of Persian history. They seem, as he observes, to have entertained a childish contempt for the language and character of the Persians. He has shewn that the names they gave to the Persian monarchs were really titles.

The

Probably (as M. de Sacy observes) Sapor was Shah-pour, filius regis. The want of ancient Persian histories, earlier than the Hegira (for the Sadder and Zendavesti are apocryphal) is a great misfortune. Sir W. D. subscribes to the opinion that, in the early ages of the world, Iran and India were under the same laws and government; and he observes that the Brahminical religion is but a distorted system of Tsabaism.

The fifth chapter contains an account of the Peshadadian dynasty; and the concluding chapter is devoted to a few remarks upon the mutual intercourse between the ancient nations of Eastern Asia.

As we have already reached the bounds we had prescribed to our review of this work, the examination of the remaining volume, which is exclusively devoted to Egyptian history, must be deferred till next month. In the mean while, we can assure our readers that Sir Wm. Drummond is not only a learned but an elegant writer. In his Dedication, Preface, and wherever his subject permits, he discovers a very polished style of composition.

A Review of the Financial Situation of the East-India Company in 1824. By HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, Esq. London, 1824. 8vo. pp. 244.

THE ignorance which prevails in this country respecting the subject of Indian finance has at length, unhappily, led to serious consequences. Much opportunity has been afforded for misrepresentation; and writers of considerable talent upon the continent of Europe have been deceived, by want of correct information upon that subject, into the adoption of the grossest mistakes, to which the reputation of the writers gives currency and sanction.

A work has been long wanted which, by means of simple and intelligible details, would rectify public opinion as to the true situation of the East-India Company's affairs. It is fortunate that the office has been undertaken by a gentleman so well adapted as Mr. Tucker, by past experience, as well as by talent, to fulfil a task to which some degree of intricacy necessarily belongs.

Mr. Tucker commences by expressing a very natural surprise that any doubt should exist in deciding whether the possession of our eastern territory is to be esteemed a source of wealth or of weakness to the mother country. He ascribes the existence of any difficulty in solving the problem to ignorance of the facts and circumstances upon which the solution depends; and he adverts to the strange proposition, put forth from a quarter where it was once the fashion to exaggerate the value of eastern possessions, that British India is a burthensome dependency. M. Say, he observes, has gravely maintained that England incurs a charge of two millions sterling annually on account of its eastern territory. Mr. Tucker adds, that if the opinions of this philosopher exerted no influence beyond the Continent, or merely tended to allay the spirit of avarice, they might safely be left to produce their effects:

But, unfortunately, there are persons in this country who are sufficiently prone to adopt the same erroneous notions, and whose errors, far from conducing to any salutary end, must exert a baneful influence over the destinies of India.

Overlooking the mistakes committed (we presume by M. Sismondi) in respect to the character of the Indian Government, by attributing to it the oppression of the people, the violation of their rights and institutions, and the merciless extortion of revenue from them, whereby poverty has been entailed upon India without commensurate advantage to England; overlooking these mistakes, Mr. Tucker proposes to confine himself to the financial part of the subject, subject, and to furnish a clear and connected account of the Company's revenues: a matter most essential to be well understood by those whose property is invested in Indian securities.

Two very serious objections offer themselves in limine to M. Say's statement: he has consulted very old authorities; and he has adopted, as the basis of his calculations, the results of a year of actual war, or averages from a series of years wherein war generally prevailed. To demonstrate how utterly the French writer's statements are at variance with the genuine data, Mr. Tucker inserts an account, extracted from official and authentic documents, of the annual result of the Indian revenue from 1792-3 to 1821-22; and he shows that (exclusive of the deductions at home to which the revenue is liable) we realized during that period a considerable surplus beyond the local expenditure (including the interest of the public debt), after deducting the deficit which occurred in particular years. He subsequently demonstrates, as satisfactorily as figures can make out the fact, that instead of an annual deficit upon our Indian account of revenue and charge, to the amount, according to M. Say, of more than two millions, there is really a surplus amounting to nearly that sum: for Mr. Tucker considers the statement of Lord Hastings, who speaks of a net revenue of four millions, as exhibiting too favourable a picture of our financial situation.

In the course of his investigation into the causes of M. Say's hallucinations, Mr. Tucker discovers a serious error in his calculations regarding the Indian debt and assets in the year 1805, a period which is strangely chosen by the French writer to illustrate our present condition:

He first alleges that the sum of £25,600,000 is the amount of our Indian debt, after deducting the amount of assets, and that in these assets we have included what is technically termed "dead stock," or the value of forts, buildings, furniture, bad debts, and the like; and he, therefore, proceeds to add the sum of 400 million francs, or sixteen millions sterling, to our acknowledged debt, for the purpose of exhibiting, as he conceives, the real condition of our finances.

But it is not true that in arriving at the sum quoted by M. Say, the "dead stock," or even the "quick stock," had been deducted from the Indian debt, although the latter, consisting as it does of cash and other available assets, must be deducted in order to shew the true state of the Company's affairs; and that writer has consequently committed a two-fold mistake, first, in assuming a deduction to have been made which never was made; and next, in adding to the assumed debt of £25,600,000, a sum which, if correct, ought to have been deducted from it.

Several less inexcusable mistakes are pointed out in his preliminary chapter (on the Territorial Revenue); which is concluded by some very judicious observations upon the financial character of the several India governments, from the administration of Lord Cornwallis to that of Lord Hastings.

After this general view of the revenue of India, Mr. Tucker proceeds to a more minute examination of the items or ingredients which compose it; and treats, in his second chapter, on the duties upon salt and opium, the customs, akbarry, stamps, and other sources of revenue. In regard to the salt monopoly, which we presume to be one of those grinding expedients which M. Sismondi refers to, Mr. Tucker offers the following sensible and philosophical vindication of it:

If a certain revenue be required beyond what the land will produce; and if the number of opium consumers, in whose hands luxuries, and other tangible objects of taxation, might be found, be so small and so dispersed that the charge of collection would go far to absorb the produce of the tax, then it would appear that a government has no alternative but to have recourse to some article of general consumption as the object of taxation. It never can answer any useful purpose to tax and torment a country with taxes and tax-gatherers, when such taxes are unproductive, or produce little little more than is sufficient to maintain a host of revenue officers. These officers are an evil in any country; but in India, where it is almost impossible to prevent their mal-practices, they are a serious evil. Such is the force of long established habit under a bad government, that even now, when there is an anxiety felt by the ruling power to repress abuse and to afford protection to all, the revenue officer exacts, and the people suffer his exaction, as a matter of course, and almost without a complaint.

If, again, a people be constitutionally timid, or unable, from whatever cause, to defend their property and to resist oppression, then it would seem to be a happy discovery, if, instead of subjecting them by direct taxation to the screw of the Exchequer, the government should succeed in drawing from them the periodical contribution required, by a process scarcely perceptible, in sums so minute as scarcely to be felt, and by means totally divested of the odious character of force.

He candidly admits, in a subsequent passage, that the people do not consume so much salt as they desire to use, and that the article might be placed more within their reach.

The opium monopoly stands in need of no defence: the only point to be considered is whether the mode of managing this peculiar branch of trade be judicious with reference to its productiveness. Mr. Tucker treats, in a very full and satisfactory manner, this item of the inquiry.

The Indian excise, payable upon spirituous liquors and intoxicating drugs, bears some affinity in character to the last tax. Its objects have relation to public morals, and police restraints, as well as to fiscal advantages. Mr. Tucker entertains the opinion, which is often expressed with respect to our own tax upon liquors, that rendering the medium of intoxication more expensive to the consumer does not repress or diminish the practice.

Mr. Tucker disapproves of the tax levied on the pilgrims resorting to Juggurnat'h and other holy places; he thinks it does not harmonize with a great and liberal government. The tax was originally intended to protect the pilgrims against fraud.

The stamp duties, we agree with Mr. Tucker, are impolitic. Every tax which diminishes capital should be avoided as much as possible. The defence advanced in favour of the stamp-duties in England is the facility of collection; but it appears in India that the treasury receives only £9 out of every £15 collected.

The customs are in a very flourishing state, which fact alone affords a very encouraging picture of Indian commerce, notwithstanding the partiality exhibited in our home revenue system to the prejudice of certain articles of Indian production:

Our Indian subjects have just cause to complain of being treated as aliens in our system of commercial policy; and if the stream of wealth which has flowed into the mother country should become languid, or altogether fail, it will be no more than the natural result of those restrictive measures which seem to say, "you shall not produce, either for our benefit or your own." The people of India are British subjects, and they have claims to something beyond the privilege of paying twenty-two millions sterling in annual revenue.

The land, however, has constituted for ages the chief source of revenue in India; and Mr. Tucker, accordingly, in his third chapter, treats very copiously upon this interesting branch of his subject. The zemindary system, which was substituted by Lord Cornwallis for the khas, and other objectionable modes of deriving the revenue, is investigated by Mr. T. in a manner which discovers much local knowledge; and he strongly urges the policy of adopting a permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

He next considers the plan of management familiarly known under the name of the ryotwar system; and combats in a free, though respectful and candid manner, the arguments of Sir Thomas Munro, the present governor of Fort

Fort St. George, who has distinguished himself as the zealous advocate of that system. The fundamental proposition of Sir Thomas Munro is this; namely, that private landed property has never existed in India, excepting on the Malabar coast. This dictum is not only successfully controverted by Col. Mark Wilks, in his History of the South of India, but it is inconsistent with all our ideas of progressive civilization. Even a savage, as Mr. T. observes, has a notion of property: he adds,

I will not appeal to the Altunga and other royal grants of the Mahomedan rulers, which are every where to be met with; nor to the Birmooter and other religious grants of the Hindoos, which are to be found in every part of the country; because these, as well as the "enam" or free grants, may be considered as alienations of the royal domain, which do not come within the precise terms of the proposition; but if I were called upon to point out the country where landed property is most highly appreciated and cherished, where landed possessions are most tenaciously retained, and where the land makes up the sum and essence of all which the individual can properly call his own, I should point to India.

He subjoins (as a further evidence that the people of Bengal, in particular, not only possessed land, but resisted their sovereign's attempt to usurp a part of it) the translation, by Mr. Colebrooke, of a curious inscription on a rock at Tarāchandi, near Sahasaram, in South Bahar, which contains a protest, dated in 1220 Sanvat (A.D. 1173) of a Hindoo landholder against a grant made by the Rajah of Canouge in favour of certain priests, to the prejudice of the rights of the protestor.* Even Mr. Mill, the historian of British India, who maintains that the right of property vests in the sovereign, qualifies his argument by certain admissions in favour of the ryot, which go far to establish ownership.

The evidence of such a writer as Sir John Malcolm is highly valuable upon this disputed point; and we are rather surprised that Mr. Tucker, who appears duly to appreciate the merits of Sir John, should have overlooked his testimony upon this occasion. In his Memoir of Central India, if we remember accurately (for we have not the book at hand), Sir John states that, according to the most revered Hindu writers, the kingly office itself was instituted subsequent to the cultivation of the soil, and the enjoyment of property; and that a portion of the revenue was set apart for them in consideration of their services as arbitrators and protectors.

Mr. Tucker winds up his inquiry with the following conclusion:

Upon the whole, the land revenue of India may be relied upon generally, as a firm and legitimate resource; and the only doubts which I entertain of its permanency and productiveness, have reference to the system of management which has been adopted in particular quarters. I do not pretend to decide who are, or ought to be, the proprietors of the soil, whether zemindars, talookdars, or malicks, meerasaydars, ryots, or the village corporation; but in every stage of my inquiry I find reason to be satisfied that the government neither is, nor ought to be, that proprietor.

The concluding chapter of the work is devoted to a consideration of the financial and commercial situation of the East-India Company taken collectively. The declaration with which Mr. Tucker begins, must convince candid persons of the small reliance to be placed upon the statements published upon this subject, which can be deduced from no authentic and secure data.

It is not easy to form an accurate estimate of the commercial concerns of the Company, because they are not required to submit to Parliament an account of their profits or loss, and there is no direct evidence from which we can deduce the exact result of their

* This valuable document, if we are not mistaken, will appear in a future volume of the Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society.

324 Review.—Financial Situation of the East-India Company in 1824. [JONES, their commercial transactions. The Court of Directors have, however, in their financial correspondence, lately published, acknowledged on various occasions the existence of a commercial profit; and in a note subjoined to the last statement of their commercial stock, it is expressly declared that “the sum of £4,754,900 sterling has been advanced, or set apart, from the surplus commercial profits in England, towards the liquidation of Indian territorial debt.”

But the statement of their affairs, laid by the Company before Parliament when their present charter was renewed, was very circumstantial; and if MM. Say and Sismondi had adopted that statement as the basis of their calculations, although it brings up the account to no later period than 1815, they would have escaped many of the errors they have committed.

Mr. Tucker assumes that statement as the foundation of his comparisons; and contrasts the style of the Company's commercial concerns at that period with results which the Indian accounts of 1822 and the home accounts of 1823 severally exhibit; extracting his figures from printed official accounts, in order that the documents may be referred to for the purpose of authenticating his statements.

From these public documents he exhibits the comparative state of the Company's commercial situation at the two periods, as follows:

1814-15	Commercial assets in India and at home.....	£22,787,034
	Commercial debt in India and at home	2,484,270
	Commercial assets.....	£20,302,764
	Deduct also amount of bond-debt at home	4,487,170
	Net commercial balance...	£15,815,594
1822-23	Commercial assets in India and at home	26,878,165
	Commercial debt in India and at home	2,252,307
	Commercial assets.....	£24,625,858
	Deduct also amount of bond-debt at home	3,937,729
	Net commercial balance.....	£20,688,129

Thus it appears that the net commercial balance in favour has increased nearly five millions sterling; and that the debts have diminished whilst the assets have increased. Mr. Tucker, however, for the sake of strict accuracy, adjusts this balance by subtracting from it the advances made in India on the commercial account in 1821-22, and adding thereto certain advances made out of the “surplus commercial profits” towards the liquidation of the territorial debt, which still leaves an unexceptionable balance of increase in the commercial assets to the amount of £3,630,595; which shows a profit to have been realized on the Company's commerce at the average rate of more than £450,000 per annum for the last eight years.

At this rate of profit an addition would be made to the commercial assets of £4,950,000 in the course of the next eleven years; and the Company, at the expiration of the present charter in 1834, would remain possessed of a commercial capital to the amount of £24,500,000 sterling, after discharging the whole of the bond-debt in this country.

This is the fund upon which the proprietors of India have a fair and legitimate claim for their indemnification; and it is quite clear, that, if the charter should not be renewed in 1834, they must be considered to be entitled to a division of the commercial capital, which ought to be quite sufficient to secure them the value of their stock at its present price (290 per 100), after making ample allowance for the loss likely to be sustained on the sale of the India House and other moveable property.

Mr.

Mr. Tucker, in examining the details of the Company's trade, adverts to the article of tea, and remarks that "it has been supposed that the Company derive an inordinate profit from their trade in tea; and a clamour has been raised against them on the ground that the people of this country are heavily taxed to administer to the avarice of a body of insatiate monopolists." He calmly investigates the foundation of this complaint; and he shows that the first element in the price of this article is the duty, which out of every six shillings takes three; and that the second, namely, interest on the capital employed, is far less than private individuals could be content with; the sum charged as interest on the tea of 1822-23 he finds to amount to less than 2½ per cent.; and he proves that the sum total of the contribution levied by the Company upon the British consumer of tea is £565,000 annually, equal to about fifteen per cent. on the amount sales, exclusive of duty, or to about 5¼ per cent. on the capital employed after defraying the charge of interest.

If the people of Great Britain are desirous of drinking their tea on the same terms as the people of America, it is undoubtedly in their option to have it at 3s. or 2s. 6d. per pound, instead of 6s. or 5s. 6d. per pound, after the very next session of Parliament. They have imposed upon themselves the duty of 100 per cent., and it rests with them to take it off, whenever they please; but, before they resort to such a measure, it will certainly be proper for them to consider whether any better alternative presents itself; and whether, in repealing or reducing one tax, they might not find it necessary to have recourse to a substitute of a still more objectionable character.

Mr. Tucker next proceeds to combine the territorial with the commercial accounts; and to place the general results in one view, as follows:

1st. It has been shewn that, during a season of peace, a surplus territorial revenue is likely to be realized in India to the extent of two millions sterling per annum, after defraying all local charges, and providing for the interest of the territorial debt.

2dly. That this surplus is liable to an annual deduction, to the amount of one million and a half, on account of territorial and political disbursements made in this country, leaving a net surplus revenue, derivable from our Eastern possessions, of five hundred thousand pounds per annum.

3dly. That the debt of India, bearing interest, amounted, on the 30th of April 1823, to the sum of £31,623,780 sterling, entailing an annual charge of £1,896,824; and the net territorial debt, abroad and at home, after deducting assets, to the sum of £16,386,953.

4thly. That the commercial assets and credits abroad and at home, after deducting the bond-debt and other commercial debts, amounted, in 1823-24, to the sum of £14,424,500, constituting a fund, properly belonging to the proprietors of India stock for the replacement of their capital.

5thly. That a profit is drawn from the Company's trade, after providing for the dividends to the proprietors and the interest of the bond debt, and after defraying all the expenses of their establishment, abroad and at home, to the estimated amount of £450,000 per annum.

6thly. That the net income of the Company, territorial and commercial, during a period of peace, may accordingly be assumed at about one million sterling per annum, which is applicable to the gradual liquidation of debt, or to the augmentation of their commercial capital.

7thly. That since the commencement of the present charter, an improvement has taken place in the financial situation of the Company, territorial and commercial, abroad and at home, to the extent of near three millions sterling, notwithstanding our having been engaged intermediately in several expensive wars.

With this result before him, Mr. Tucker, still confining himself to financial views, briefly touches upon the constitution of that mode of government under which it has been secured. He shows that it is a government of law and responsibility; that it acts under numerous and salutary checks; and that it is subject to a chain of superintending authorities subordinate to the British Parliament, the Crown, and the people. In answer to the suggestion of the pseudo-philanthropist, who would destroy the subjection in which the Hindoo people people live, in order that they might be free and happy, Mr. Tucker appeals to the pages of Sir John Malcolm's history to show the probable results of such a measure. He adds :

Whatever may be our qualifications as foreigners, we govern them better than they could govern themselves; and our dominion, if it avert no other evil than the sanguinary struggle which is likely to take place whenever our authority may be withdrawn, must be regarded as eminently calculated to promote the great interests of humanity.

We concur with Mr. Tucker in thinking of the Company's government, that, "sem plurimas tribuit Jupiter hyemes, sive hanc ultimam, a heavy responsibility will rest with those who subvert it, without clear and satisfactory grounds for presuming that a more perfect system of administration will be substituted in its place."

Our analysis of this work is designed chiefly to show the nature and extent of the information it contains. Our thanks are due to Mr. Tucker for his candid and luminous exposition of East-India finance, which we hope will be the means of preventing and obviating the misconceptions which have heretofore prevailed upon this very important subject.

Whilst we were engaged in the perusal of this work, an angry and somewhat contemptuous letter of expostulation reached us, signed Munsif, in regard to the opinions we have expressed of MM. Say and Sismondi. If we believed (as we do not, and never did) that a conspiracy exists against the East-India Company, we should include Munsif among the conspirators; for he writes with all the vehemence of a partizan: his letter is a tissue of intemperate declamation. The only propositions mooted by the writer in the way of argument are these: he says "M. Say has few errors except of financial detail, and those errors do not materially affect any leading principal (principle) or important deduction;" and "as to the financial situation of the Company, a very recent account, published indeed within these few days, by Mr. Tucker, is the most to be relied upon; the result of the whole account, according to Mr. Tucker, is a surplus of £500,000 a-year in peace:" of the accuracy of both these statements our readers will judge.

As to our alleged insults towards MM. Say and Sismondi, we defy the writer to point them out. We have exposed their mistakes, but expressly ascribed them to their being deceived by others.

Munsif expects that we shall spurn him: no such thing. If he will transmit to us a defence of his view of the question, it shall appear in this Journal; for we are earnest only after truth, and have neither patrons to conciliate, nor prejudices to gratify. We recommend him to read, previously, Mr. Tucker's work somewhat more attentively; and we beg of him to adopt a more temperate style, his present tone being unsuitable to our publication. No man of sense is convinced by a passionate writer; and Munsif should pay some regard to the name he has assumed. Many passages of his letter might be pointed out which are inconsistent with our notion of such a character as مستف, a fair and just man.

The Monumental Remains of Noble and Eminent Persons, &c. Engraved from the Drawings of EDWARD BLORE, Esq. F.S.A., with Historical and Biographical Illustrations. Parts I., II., and III. London, 1825. Imp. 4to.

ALTHOUGH the present age is extremely prolific in works of the pencil, and our artists have exhibited very splendid specimens of their powers of illustration, tion, we do not recollect to have seen a work which displays to much greater advantage the talents of British artists. The biographical sketches are well put together; and the drawing and engraving do credit to the taste and talents of Messrs. Blore and Le Keux.

FOREIGN WORKS.

GERMANY. Ausführliches Lehrgebäude, &c. i. e. Continuation of M. Bopp's Researches respecting the Grammatical System of the Sanscrit Tongue. Part. I. Berlin, 1824. 4to. Pp. 96.

M. Bopp published, some years back, his system of conjugations of Sanscrit, and he promised a grammar of that language. The first fruits of his labours are given in these researches into the writing, reading, and pronunciation of Sanscrit; as well as the radicals, prefixes, and nouns of that tongue.

FRANCE. La Fiancée de Bénarès. Nuits Indiennes. Par Philarète Chasles. Paris, 1824. 18vo.

The author of this little work, who is known by his Eloge on De Thou, which gained the prize at the French Academy, seems to have borrowed the idea, not of its design, but its execution, from Mr. Moore's Lalla Rookh. Poetry and Romance are blended together. Several priestesses, assembled in their temples, sing to the listening throng—one, the devotion of love; a second, the devotion of filial affection; a third, the devotion of patriotism. The author has employed prose to recite the progress of the action, and the details of manners; but it is in verse that the priestesses chaunt their hymns. The book is beautifully printed, the paper and decorations are elegant. It seems intended, like certain works published in Germany and England, for presents.

Catalogue des Livres Imprimés et Manuscrits, composant la Bibliothèque de feu M. Louis-Mathieu Langlès. Paris, 1825. 8vo. pp. 558.

A catalogue of books seems little adapted to be the subject of a review; but we cannot miss the occasion it affords us of expressing our regret that so splendid a collection of oriental literature should be dispersed. This library, which consisted, according to the catalogue before us, of nearly 5,000 works, many of them voluminous, was sold in March last at Paris. The catalogue is extremely well arranged, and deserves a place in the library of the oriental student, as a guide to the works he may be desirous of consulting. It contains, besides, a well-written memoir of M. Langlès, from the pen of M. Gauttier; which furnishes us, however, with few facts beyond what were already known, and recorded in an article to be found in our Journal, vol. xvii., pp. 272, 273. M. Gauttier concludes his memoir with this eloquent tribute to the deceased:

"To judge of the extent of sorrow which the loss of this excellent man has occasioned, we should be capable of appreciating all those qualities by which he conciliated general esteem. Devoted to his friends, full of kindness and complacency, even towards those who made no return for them, M. Langlès discovered by his forbearance and magnanimity alone, the superiority of those talents which his modesty made him studious to conceal. A bitter expression never escaped his lips; a look of reproach never clouded his countenance, the constant serenity of which proclaimed the calmness and the purity of his mind. His affability won for him the affection of all who knew him; and his gallery was the general rendezvous of every person of literary eminence in Europe. There, all national prejudices disappeared; there, even private and personal animosities were often extinguished."

VARIETIES;

PHILOSOPHICAL, SCIENTIFIC, AND LITERARY.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF PARIS.

Meeting of March 7. M. Ed. Barth. Diant, pupil of the Royal School of Oriental languages, was admitted a member of the Society.

Mr. (Dr.) Noehden, secretary of the Royal Asiatic Society of London, transmitted to the council a letter accompanying the first part of the first volume of its Transactions presented in the name of that Society.

The work will be deposited in the library; and a letter of thanks from the council is to be addressed to the Asiatic Society of London, with a complete copy of the Journal Asiatique, and the various works published by this Society.

M. du Boissier presented a specimen of the Dovanaguri character, cut under his direction.

M. E. Coquebert de Monthret made a report respecting the Hebrew grammar, transmitted by M. Testard.

It was announced that the Japanese grammar would be printed previous to the ensuing meeting of the council; and that probably the collection of the Armenian Fables of Vartan would be ready before the next general meeting. A statement was made of the measures taken to get the first book of the Sanskrit Episode of Yadjnadatta ready by the same time.

M. E. C. de Monthret communicated a translation of Ibn Khaldoun; and M. de Sacy read two extracts from the same author relative to Historical Criticism.

CALCUTTA MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

This Society met on the 4th Dec. Among the communications made were the following:

A letter from Dr. N. Maxwell, 6th regt. N.I., describing a highly pungent essential oil extracted from a species of grass in Malwa. This oil is employed with great success, as an embrocation in rheumatism, and other affections of the joints. By a letter from the superintendent of the botanical gardens accompanying the communication, the plant appears to be variety of Spikenard, and has been described by Drs. Roxburgh and Blane. Dried specimens of the grass were also exhibited to the meeting.

An Essay on Mercurial Fumigation, containing numerous cases illustrative of the efficacy of the practice, by Dr. A. Gibson, Staff Surgeon, Concan, Bombay establishment.

Observations on the effects of Frost Bites and the mode of treatment adopted; by Mr. G. Simms, assistant surgeon.

The papers selected for reading were Mr. Twining's essay on filaria, and Mr. Simms, on frost bites, which gave rise to some animated discussion among the members. The first of these relates more strictly to veterinary pathology, being an account of that variety of filaria which is found in the eye of the horse. One remarkable fact was stated by Mr. T., that it has been ascertained, by dissection, that worms similar to those in the eye, exist also in the cellular tissue of the horse, and are more particularly numerous about the lumbar region. Hence injury of the spinal marrow may be induced, and thus an explanation is perhaps afforded of the apparently absurd ideas entertained by the natives, who assert that the worm in the eye produces the incurable malady known by the name of "weakness of the loins."

Mr. Simms' essay contains the result of experience acquired during a residence in North America, and is addressed to the Society under the idea, that in the mountainous regions of India, with which our connection has of late become more intimate, a practical knowledge of the subject may be usefully applied.

Mr. Playfair, of Chunar, presented, for the museum, a species of lacerta, known to the natives by the name of bisopra, and believed by them to be highly venomous.

Dr. Haro, the president, exhibited specimens of a poisonous plant called kat bisha, or satugi.

NATURAL HISTORY.

Dr. Tytler has brought from Bencoolen to Calcutta, two very fine specimens of the singular ape, named siamang by the Malays. Also specimens of lemur tardigradus, urus malayanus, and the tailless or Malay cat of the eastern island.

One of the siamangs, a female, is nearly three feet high, and is one of the best specimens of this creature hitherto procured. She is remarkably docile, playful, and gentle in her manners, without any tincture of ferocity, or the disgusting habits that generally distinguish the monkey tribes. Representations of the siamang have found their way into works of natural history, lately published in Europe; but they afford a faint idea, or rather give altogether an incorrect notion, of this animal: we allude particularly to the plate given in a recent publication by Mr. Griffiths. Beneath the lower jaw is a thin bag of skin, analogous to that attached to the adjutant, which the creature expands at pleasure, and most frequently while basking in the sun. This receptacle is not employed for returning any portion of food, which, as in the human species, is at once masticated by this ape, and passed into the stomach.

The lemur tardigradus is a very curious and ferocious animal, of small size; it eats little, and since its arrival in Calcutta chiefly sleeps during the day, and appears considerably affected by the cold.

The Malay or Sumatra bear is the first instance, we believe, of this animal having reached Bengal. It is a remarkable creature, and, we understand, affords an entire new species of the bear kind. The principal peculiarities consist in the shortness of the hair, and a large cordiform white mark on the breast, with extreme docility of temper, and playfulness, which is never interrupted except when the animal is hungry, at which time its docility immediately yields to an ungovernable appetite for food. But when satisfied, the creature becomes gentle, and may as easily be played with, and with as little apprehension, as a little lapdog.

The cat in every respect resembles the common domestic cat of other countries, with the exception of the tail, which is not above two inches in length, and crooked, appearing as if the animal had met with some accident, by which the tail had been suddenly pinched off. This singular caudine conformation, we understand, is also discovered in a race of cats which inhabit the islands of Levant.

TEA PLANT IN AMERICA.

Mr. Geo. Wallace, who lives at Braddock Fields, has raised, during the present season, a considerable quantity of the hyson tea plant. We have frequently drank tea made from a plant which goes by that name, and grows wild on the upper borders of the Kenibac river. It resembles, in flavour, the best souchong, and we wonder it is not more generally known and used. —[American Paper.]

THE OURANG OUTANG.

A correspondent in the Bengal Hurkaru of Nov. 29, states the following extraordinary particulars:

A party having landed on the N. coast of Sumatra, from the Mary Anne Sophia, Capt. Cornfoot, for the purpose of watering, fell in with an animal of the monkey species, of a most gigantic size. It was upwards of seven feet in height, and, after receiving seven shots, was killed. After the fifth shot, it climbed up a tree, and reclined against its boughs, to all appearance in great pain, and vomited a considerable quantity of blood. Its lower jaw, and the skin of the back and arms, which are brought round to Calcutta, I have seen. Some of the teeth of the upper jaw have also arrived here, and are about to be deposited in the museum of the Asiatic Society. These are, some of them, about three inches long. The lower jaw is immense, and the skin, to which I have before referred, is so large, that although cut off from the wrists, each arm is now considerably longer than mine, and I am a man not a quarter of an inch under six feet. The back is remarkably broad, and is covered with long, coarse, brown hair. When the animal made its appearance, it seemed as if it had come from some distance, and, to all appearance, it had been walking through a swamp, its legs, up to the knees, being muddy. Its gait was slovenly, and as it went, it waddled from side to side. It is much to be regretted that Capt. Cornfoot had not means on board his ship for preserving the skeleton, or stuffing the skin, and hence only the parts which I have mentioned have reached Calcutta. I imagine that this sets at rest at once the disputes which have arisen as to the existence of an animal of the uran utan species of this gigantic size, and which has hitherto been considered as one of the wonders which lying travellers have considered themselves entitled to palm upon their more domesticated countrymen. Under all circumstances, I think no doubt can exist but that this was a stray animal of the kind, which had travelled from some of the unfrequented parts of the interior of Sumatra, and thus fell into the hands of the watering party.

[The writer does not appear to have been one of the party.—Ed.]

PERPETUAL FIRE.

In the peninsula of Abeheron (Caspian Sea), in the province of Schirwan, formerly belonging to Persia, but now to Russia, there is found a perpetual, or as it is there called, an eternal fire. It rises, and has risen from time immemorial, from an irregular orifice of about twelve feet in depth, one hundred and twenty feet in width, with a constant flame. The flame rises from the height of from six to eight feet, is unattended with smoke, and yields no smell. The finest turf grows about the borders, and at the distance of two toises are two springs of water; the inhabitants have a veneration for this fire, and celebrate it with religious ceremonies.

EARTHQUAKE AT ALGIERS.

Extract of a Letter from Algiers, dated March 7.—On Wednesday, the 2d inst., this city was visited with a tremendous earthquake, which continued at intervals for the five following days. It has thrown down several houses, injured many others, and totally destroyed the town of Blida, one day's journey from this, burying in its ruins nearly all the inhabitants. Out of a population of 15,000 souls, chiefly Moors, Jews, and Arabs, about 300 only have been saved, and those in a sadly mutilated state.

The first two shocks which occurred, were at two minutes and at forty-two minutes after ten, A.M.; they were extremely violent, and the motion was both circular and perpendicular. On the same evening, two more shocks occurred; on Thursday evening, three; on Friday, two; on Saturday, two; and on Sunday, between the hours of one and three A.M., two more, which, it is to be hoped, may prove the last.

To-morrow I purpose to visit the ruins of that ill-fated town, where I am told a horrible scene of devastation presents itself; 7,000 dead bodies have been already dug out. In one spot, supposed to be a Jewish seminary, the bodies of 250 children were found; and a vast number of persons in the ruins of the mosques, where the people had congregated, the earthquake having occurred at the hour of prayer (ten o'clock).

In the immediate neighbourhood of the town, the earth has opened in large chasms of from eight to ten feet wide, and as many deep; and it is worthy of remark, that the same phenomenon which generally precedes the eruption of Etna and Vesuvius, occurred at Blida—namely, all the wells and fountains in the neighbourhood became perfectly dry.

The troops which the government sent out to prevent plunder have been attacked by vast hordes of the Cobails, and have thus added to the work of death. The Cobails are of a race totally distinct from the Turks, Moors, or Arabs: they are the descendants of the ancient Numidians, and inhabit the mountains of this part of Africa, are perfectly independent, and have never been subdued by the Turks. As an act of grace, the Dey has manumitted all the slaves, and has ordered a public thanksgiving for the salvation of this city.

I have omitted to mention, that an excellent barometer I have, kept gradually falling for some days before the earthquake, whilst the weather indicated no change whatever, otherwise than that, on the day it happened, my thermometer rose suddenly from 58 to 62½ degrees, which is a very extraordinary occurrence.

LOCUSTS.

Extract of a Letter from Graaf Reinet (S. Africa), dated 26th March, 1824.—“This morning several of the inhabitants were attracted by a cloud, which had made its appearance about a mile eastward of the town; and it was soon ascertained that this phenomenon was occasioned by a vast swarm of migratory locusts, the first which have made their appearance in this neighbourhood since 1808. They are still young, and are, therefore, vulgarly called ‘voetganger;’ and although their numbers, in comparison with the immense swarms with which some of us have had to contend, may be termed few, they are sufficiently numerous to astonish the young people and those who have lately come among us; and they cause no small degree of anxiety to the farmer, who knows, by experience, what they may become in a season or two, if Providence be not pleased to arrest so dreadful a visitation.”—[South African Advertiser.]

[Another letter in the same paper describes the column of locusts as about two miles broad, and at least six miles in length.]

FEAT OF A VULTURE.

The following transaction is recorded in a Bengal paper of Nov. 27, the Editor of which declares the relator to be a person of credit:

“Some weeks ago one of the feathered tribe, rudzo an adjutant, so frequently seen perched about the Government House, pounced upon a favourite kitten belonging to a lady of my acquaintance, and would shortly have put a stop to its mewling, were it not for the courage of a slave girl, about ten or eleven years of age, who happened just to appear in ‘the nick o’ time.’ The kitten’s head was in transitu when she seized it; and upon the adjutant attempting to ‘be off,’ she laid hold of him also, and sturdily kept her hold, till the adjutant had winged his way to a neighbouring terrace, where, finding his incumbrance rather heavy, he reluctantly abandoned his prize, and the girl was left victorious with the kitten in her hand. The flight was about fifteen yards, and the girl apparently is from four to five stone weight.”

TRAVELLERS IN INTERIOR AFRICA.

A letter from Tripoli, of Barbary, of 7th January, says: “The French traveller, M. J. R. Pachon, after traversing Egypt, has just arrived at Derna provided with a recommendation from Mehemet Ali Pacha for the Chief of this Regency, and with a letter from M. Drovetti, for the French Consul-General, who has procured all the necessary means to examine in details and in safety, the ancient Cyrenaica, the coast of the Syrtis, and the interior of the kingdom of Tripoli. The English travellers, who have penetrated to Bornou, have just arrived here. It appears that these travellers have met with many difficulties, in consequence of the deaths of Dr. Oudney and Mr. Tool. Mr. Clapperton has penetrated a considerable way into Nigritia, and been very successful there. His arrival with Major Denham is announced. M. Teret (Mr. Tyrihwitt), the youngest of the three travellers, has remained at Bornou alone, not having even a Christian servant with him."—[French Paper.]

MAJOR BENNETT.

The Royal Society of Literature have presented to this venerable gentleman one of their gold medals. On the 5th May, a deputation waited upon him at his own house, in Nassau Street, consisting of the President, the Bishop of St. David's, Sir Wm. Ouseley, Archdeacon Nares, &c., when the medal was presented by the Bishop. The other medal has been adjudged to Dr. Wilkins, for his eminent skill in Sanscrit.

PHRENOLOGY.

Some time ago, a very interesting memoir was read to the Phrenological Society in Edinburgh, communicated by Dr. Putterson, of Calcutta, with a donation of twelve Hindoo skulls. In human heads (it was stated) which are not deceased, the size of the head indicates power of character. The Hindoo head is to the European as to about two to three, or as the head of a boy of fifteen to that of a man of thirty.—The phrenologist ceases to wonder that 20,000 Europeans keep in subjection one hundred millions of Hindoos!—[Edinb. Rev.]

LUSUS NATURÆ.

The Bomhay Summachar has an account, which seems to be well authenticated, of an extraordinary instance of unnatural birth in the human species, that took place at Yezd, in Persia. This lusus nature, from the description, and the original pen and ink drawing that accompanies it (of which a rough engraved copy is introduced in the Summachar), appears to come under the class of "monsters with an imperfect portion of another body attached to a perfect one;" the abdomen of the former being united to that of the latter. The form of the one is complete from the head to where the adhesion takes place; the lower extremities are wanting: the other is nowise defective. There appeared to be no sympathetic feeling between the two, as while one appeared to sleep, the other had its eyes open; and from the circumstance that one lived twelve hours after the other had expired. This occurred the seventeenth day after birth. It is to be regretted that no other circumstances are detailed.—[Rom. Gaz., Dec. 8.]

PARROTS.

The Greeks originally were acquainted with but one species of parrot (or paitacus), which was imported from the East by Alexander's captains. The Romans knew no other species but those from India, till the time of Nero, when they were brought from the island of Goganda, far up the River Nile. After the Portuguese doubled the Cape of Good Hope, they became much more numerous in Europe; and now we observe from a recent work on Natural History, this almost inexhaustible and beautiful genus has been divided into no fewer than two hundred and thirty-nine species!

CHINESE LITERATURE.

The Journal of St. Petersburg contains a catalogue of various works, mostly in Chinese, lately brought from Pekin by Hyacinth, the archimandrite, who, after having remained in China for fourteen years, returned to Russia, where he now resides in the monastery of St. Basilam, near Lerdopol. The following are among the principal works enumerated in this catalogue:

1. Tsut-Tun-Tsian-Kang-Mou. Annals of the Chinese Empire, in 8 volumes. (A work already partly known from the translations of the Jesuits.)
2. History of the Dynasty of Ming. 1 vol.
3. Geography of the Chinese Empire; containing the description of China, of Corea, of the country of the Mantchous, of the country of the Monguls, of Eastern Turkistan, of Kulusoor, and of Thibet. 2 vols., with an extensive Chart. (This work is in the Russian language.)
4. History of the Four First Khans of the House of Tchingis. 1 vol.
5. Su Sebow, or the Four Books, with long Explanations. 2 vols.
6. History of Thibet and Tangout. 1 vol.
7. Description of Thibet in its present State. 1 vol.
8. Description of the Mongul Nation Two Centuries before the Birth of Christ.
9. Description of Suggaria and Lesser Bokharia, 150 years before J.C. 1 vol.
10. Description of Pekin, with a Plan of that city.
11. Treatise on the Inoculation of the Small Pox.
12. System of the Universe. 1 vol.
16. On the Fortifications (the causeways) of the Yellow Sea.
17. Code of the Monguls. 1 vol.
18. Chinese Dictionary translated into into the Russian Language. 6 vols.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Saturday, May 7.

THE Society met at the usual hour; Sir Alexander Johnston, Vice-President, in the chair. The proceedings at the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The following donations were reported:—From the Horticultural Society, the continuation of their Transactions; being Part V., Vol. V.—From the Rev. S. Weston, copy and translation of the inscription on the great gun now in St. James's Park, whence it appears that it was cast A.H. 961.—From Major Tod, a native drawing representing a Hindoo deity.

Thanks were voted to the respective donors.

The following gentlemen were introduced and admitted:—John Melville, Esq.; John Disney, Esq.; and Capt. M. Grindlay, Esq.

M. Julius Von Klaproth was introduced by Sir George Staunton, and presented with his diploma constituting him a Foreign Member of the Society. The Chairman, in delivering the diploma to M. Von Klaproth, expressed his satisfaction in offering this testimony of respect towards a person who had already so highly distinguished himself in oriental literature, and from whom so much was yet to be expected.

The Secretary then proceeded to read a memoir by Capt. Franklin, on Bundelcund; the conclusion of which was deferred.

Major J. Hunter Littler was elected a member.

Saturday, May 21.

The Society met at the usual hour; the chair was taken by the President, the Right Hon. C. W. W. Wynne.

The proceedings at the last meeting were read and confirmed.

Various donations were reported, amongst which were the following:—

By Mr. Disney, an ancient Etruscan vase, found in Italy, bearing figures evidently of an Asiatic character.—By Dr. Whitelaw Ainslie, a copy of his work on the Cholera Morbus.—By the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., the last volume of its Transactions.—By Sir John Phillipart, a copy of his East-India Military Calendar.—By Messrs. Bazett and Colville, of Calcutta, a Burmese sabre, taken by a sentinel of the 3d Madras Light Infantry, at Rangoon. This weapon is of a very rude and awkward shape; the blade is scarcely broader than a carving knife, and the handle is nearly as long as the blade. The same gentlemen transmitted, likewise, a copy of a very curious Burmese book, the letters of which are in mother-o'-pearl. It is of an oblong shape, and composed either of wood or pasteboard, lackered.—By Mr. Anderson, a Burmese book, consisting of several oblong leaves (like the last-mentioned) enclosed in external boards of the same form. The leaves are ornamented with gilding, &c.; the subject is supposed to be religious, as the characters are of the sacred kind. It is but a fragment of a larger work, which endeavours have been made at Rangoon to obtain.

Thanks were voted to the respective donors.

— Smith, Esq., was introduced and admitted.

The Secretary proceeded to conclude the reading of Mr. Ross's Essay on the Life and History of Firdousi.

Members elected at the present meeting: Colin Campbell, Esq.; Edward Parratt, Esq.; M. Saint Martin was also elected a Foreign Member of the Society. Adjourned till June 4.

CALCUTTA.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

LOANS TO CIVIL SERVANTS.

Extract from a Letter from the Accountant-General, dated 28th Oct. 1824.

Para. 2d. I have ascertained from the houses of agency in Calcutta, that they charge eight per cent. per annum on sums advanced to individuals on the security of their lives, and that life insurances, in the different offices, may be obtained on one life to the extent of two lacs of rupees.

3d. If the Government were to advance the amount of the debt due by each of its servants at the rate of interest it is now obtaining money for, or four per cent., the saving in interest alone between four per cent. and eight per cent., the interest charged by the houses of agency, if annually paid towards the liquidation of the principal of a debt, would nearly extinguish one-half the debt in ten years; for an annual saving of £1 at compound interest of four per cent. yields £12,006,107.

4th. It is not probable that the debtor will be able to obtain money on more favourable terms than the houses of agency are willing to make advances for, on the security of a life insurance, now that the regulations prevent natives from seeking the advancement of their families, through the influence of their debtors, and the high rate of interest charged by the houses of agency, in addition to the cost of the insurance, must considerably prolong the period which, under other circumstances, a civil servant would be able to get rid of the debt he may have imprudently incurred.

5th. The Government will run no risk in advancing the amount of the debts due by its servants, to the extent which the life insurance of each may cover, provided they make over the insurance to cover the sum advanced; and I would respectfully beg to recommend that, in cases similar to the salt agent at Jessore, that the Government may advance the amount of the debt at four per cent. interest, on the parties covering the advance with a deposit of an insurance on their lives, and on their agreeing to pay out of their monthly allowances a sum sufficient to cover the annual interest and ten per cent. of the principal, which will be only six per cent. in addition to the sums they are now charged by the houses of agency, without being able to diminish the principal of their debt.

Territorial Department, the 26th Nov. 1824.

Resolution. — The Governor-General-in-Council deems it almost superfluous to repeat, on the present occasion, his persuasion of the mischievous effects which must result, from the pecuniary embarrassments of men employed, as almost all the civil servants of the Company are employed, in situations of great responsibility and trust. Since the rules, enacted by Regulation 7, 1823, were first proposed, several cases have unhappily confirmed the sentiments which his Lordship-in-Council then entertained: it appears, therefore, to be an object of the highest importance to guard, as far as possible, those who have lately entered, or are now about to enter the service from such a pernicious entanglement; and at the same time to afford to those who have been awakened, though late, to a sense of its evils, an opportunity of retrieving themselves from the thralldom.

2d. The regulation in question will, the Governor-in-Council trusts, have a considerable effect in diminishing the readiness to lend, which has been, at least, one of the causes of the unhappy prevalence of the practice of incurring debt. The comparatively early emancipation of the students from college affords a further security against the danger of their being deeply involved by the expenses of the capital.

3d. The establishment of a retiring fund, which there is reason to think the hon. Court are likely to approve, will also, it appears probable, have a tendency to induce habits of economy: and his Lordship-in-Council would hope that, warned of the consequences of debt, and satisfied of the determination of Government to regard extravagance as an essential drawback from the claims of all candidates for offices of trust, the junior members of the service may be brought to regard the practice with a just abhorrence.

4th. Those who are incapable of exercising, in the commencement of their career, that degree of self-denial which every man of a well-regulated mind would be expected to exercise if placed in a similar position of society at home, will have themselves to blame if they are denied that confidence in the force and integrity of their character, which every one seeking important public trusts is bound to cultivate; and Government cannot sacrifice the duty which it owes to the people committed to its charge, through any consideration for the interests of incautious servants.

5th. Whether any further direct means can be adopted with the view of preventing the civil servants of the Company from incurring debt, either by some modification of the wife of allowance, or otherwise, will be more fully considered in the General Department, whence a copy of such part of the Accountant General's report as refers to the College of Fort-William will be transmitted to the College-Council, with such instructions as may appear necessary.

6th. For the relief of those gentlemen who are now involved in debt, his Lordship-in-Council is entirely disposed to adopt the proposition of the Accountant-General; by authorizing advances to the extent, which may be covered by life insurances, subject to the payment of interest at the rate of four per cent., and to an annual repayment of one-tenth of the principal sum, in addition to such amount as may be necessary to ensure the life of the party. The details of the arrangement may in each case be adjusted by the Accountant-General and Sub-Treasurer, to whom the amount to be deducted from the allowances of the several parties may be made payable by the Civil Auditor.

7th. In the case of those whose allowances are such, as that the above-mentioned deductions would not leave them an adequate annual income, his Lordship-in-Council will be prepared to consider the expediency of adopting some special arrangement, and it must of course be expected that gentlemen so situated, and whom the Government thus come forward to relieve, will consider themselves bound in honour, if possible, to live within, and in no case, to exceed the limitation appointed.

8th. Before, however, coming to a final resolution, it is necessary to ascertain the probable extent of the demand; and for this purpose his Lordship-in-Council resolves that a copy of this resolution, with a copy of the 2d and three following paragraphs of the Accountant General's report, be circulated to the members of the civil service, with an intimation that those who may desire to avail themselves of the resolution, will be expected to intimate their wish to Government within two months from the present date, submitting at the same time a schedule of the debts which they may respectively owe.

VICTORY AT RANGOON.

Secret Department, Dec. 24, 1824.—The official despatches already published in the Extraordinary Gazette having announced the late brilliant achievements of the British arms at Rangoon, the right hon. the Governor in Council now proceeds to the discharge of a most gratifying duty, in signifying, in the most public and formal manner, his high admiration of the judgment, skill, and energy manifested by Brig. Gen Sir Arch. Campbell in directing the operations of the troops under his command on that important and arduous occasion.

The Governor-General in Council requests Brig. Gen. Sir Arch. Campbell to accept the cordial thanks of the government, and to notify, to the brave officers and men under his command, the sentiments of admiration with which it regards the gallantry, spirit, and enthusiasm evinced by them throughout the severe and protracted conflicts with the enemy, which terminated in his entire rout and dispersion, with great slaughter, and the loss of 250 pieces of artillery and most of his military stores. His Lordship in Council has remarked, with particular approbation, the recorded instances of meritorious conduct displayed by Lieut. Col. Miles, second in command, and Lieut. Colonels Mallet, Parfhy, and Brodie; Majors Evans, Sade, Frith, Yates, Dennie, Thornhill, Gore, Wahab, Farrier, and Basden; and Captains Piper, Wilson, and Ross. The Governor-General in Council entertains also the highest sense of the efficient services and honourable exertions of Captains Murray, Russell, Timbrell, and Montgomerie, of the Artil.; of Capt. Cheape, commanding Engineer; Capt. Wheeler, of the Madras Pioneers; Lieut. Col. Tidy, and Major Jackson, Dep. Adj. and Quarter-mast. Generals; and of Captains Snodgrass and Campbell, Personal Staff to Brig. Gen. Sir Archibald Campbell.

The Governor-General in Council seizes this opportunity of expressing his warm acknowledgments to Capt. Chada, of H. M.'s ship Arachne, the senior naval officer at Rangoon, and to Capt. Ryves, of H. M.'s ship Sophie, for their distinguished personal exertions; and requests the former to convey to the officers and crews of H. M.'s ships, of the H. C.'s cruisers, as well as the officers and men of the transports who volunteered their services, the sense which government entertains of their gallant conduct in the several actions with the enemy's war-boats, when they so conspicuously displayed the irresistible and characteristic valour of British seamen. On these occasions his Lordship in Council observes that Lieut. Killet, of H. M.'s ship Arachne, and Lieut. Goldfinch, of H. M.'s ship Sophie, particularly distinguished themselves.

The high encomium bestowed by Brig. Gen. Sir Arch. Campbell on the conduct of all the troops under his command—in which he states that their valour was only equalled by the cheerful patience with which they bore long and painful privations, and that whilst his European troops fought like Britons, and proved themselves worthy of the country that gave them birth, the gallant sepoys successfully obtained the palm of honour in rivalling their European com-rader in every thing that marks the steady, true, and daring soldier—has been perused by the Gov. Gen. with peculiar gratification; and his Lordship in Council requests the Brig. Gen. to take the most effectual means of making known to his troops at large the high estimation in which their valorous deeds and exemplary fortitude are held; and especially to mark the admiration of government of the heroic manner in which the native troops have so nobly sustained the long and well-earned fame of our Indian army.

The Governor-General in Council deeply laments the loss of Major Walker, of the 3d Madras N.L.I., emphatically styled by Sir Arch. Campbell "one of India's best and bravest soldiers;" of Brevet Capt. and Lieut. O'Shea, of H.M.'s 15th L.I. Inf.; and of the gallant soldiers who have fallen in the service of their country. His Lordship in Council trusts that the brave officers who have been wounded in the several actions with the enemy may soon be restored to the public service.

Fort William, Dec. 23, 1824.—A royal salute and three volleys of musquetry to be fired at all the stations of the land forces serving in the East-Indies in honour of the signal and decisive victories achieved at Rangoon, by the British force under the command of Brig. Gen. Sir Arch. Campbell, K.C.B., over the grand army of the Burman empire, in the several successive actions fought between the 1st and 9th inst., in which the enemy were completely defeated and dispersed, with the loss of 5,000 men killed and wounded, of 250 pieces of artillery, and the greater part of their military stores.

Fort William, Dec. 23, 1824.—The Governor-General will attend in state this evening, at five o'clock, the parade of the royal regiment, when a feu de joie will be fired in honour of the victory at Rangoon.

LAW.

SUPREME COURT, DECEMBER 7.

In an action brought against the Sheriff of Calcutta for a false return of nulla bona to a writ of execution, one Mulladar Doss, being produced as a witness, refused to be sworn, alleging no other reason than that he was his father's only son: he was accordingly committed to gaol for contempt. We understand he is not of the Bramin caste, which is well known to entertain an almost invincible repugnance to the form of judicial swearing required by the English courts; and it is therefore probable enough, that the motive of contumacy in this instance may have been pride, rather than serious scruples of a religious nature. But the circumstance recalls our attention to a matter of the highest moment, and one that demands the interference of the Supreme Government and the Supreme Court, either by their own authority, or by a resort to the imperial Parliament.

Our own experience has supplied us with repeated instances of the impediment, which this prejudice or scruple raises in the way of the investigation of truth in courts of judicature, both civil and criminal. Not only Bramins, but respectable and well-disposed natives of other castes, have been known to brave the utmost terrors of the law, to abandon home and business, to hazard liberty and property, to endure every extremity, rather than submit to the real or imaginary degradation, involved in a compliance with the requisite ceremonial. Nay, so well is this resolute aversion understood by the rest of the native community, that suits are said to have been got up as the indirect, if not the direct, means, of extorting large sums by the terror of the process of subpoena. Thus, the better portion of society is placed at the mercy of the worst—the most credible evidence disqualified or banished,—and the forms of British jurisprudence rendered equally odious and oppressive to the native population.—[Cal. John Bull.]

SENTENCE ON WILLIAM MUIRHEAD, AND BENJAMIN PICKEN, FOR MURDER.

The prisoners being put to the bar, the Senior Justice addressed them nearly in these terms:—They had been indicted for the murder of a native. After a most patient trial, and great deliberation on their innocence or guilt, a jury of their countrymen had found them guilty. They now owed their lives to the humanity—perhaps, mistaken humanity,—of the court. Their Lordships had taken the matter into their most serious consideration, and have determined on not ordering the execution, which the public in general expected.

There were witnesses to prove the murder generally, but not enough to shew wilful and premeditated malice. They have, therefore, received a favourable consideration; and his Lordship trusted that, during their future lives, by their labour and good conduct, they will make amends in another community, for the crimes they have committed in this. The sentence of the court is, they be both transported to Botany Bay, for the term of their natural lives.—[Beng. Hur.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

NATIVE FEMALE SCHOOL.

The examination of the Native Female Children took place yesterday morning. About a quarter past ten, Lady Amherst, with the Hon. Miss Amherst, escorted by Captain Feudall, aide-de-camp, entered the room, which was previously crowded with ladies. Among them was Mrs. Heber, the Hon. Mrs. Lindsay, Mrs. H. Shakspear, Mrs. Pearson, and many other ladies in the first walks of society. The sight was indeed truly gratifying. One hundred of the girls had been selected from three classes, on account of their proficiency in each, respectively. The junior class was first examined in reading elementary tracts in Hindoostanee, highly to the gratification of the ladies; as the children evinced a thorough proficiency, to the extent which it was thought proper to examine them. Indeed, they shewed the greatest confidence in their powers, and were wholly unconstrained, and evidently happy at the delight which they afforded. The second class was also examined in reading Hindoostanee books, but of a higher character. The third and last class was examined in Geography and the New Testament, also in Hindoostanee; and both these evinced the same proficiency and self-confidence as the first. After the examinations were over, samples of the children's abilities in plain needle-work were handed round, and evidently afforded the greatest satisfaction. When the whole was finished, a display of elegant fancy articles, the benevolent work of ladies in England, and sent to this country for the benefit of the Institution, took place—when, we believe, few—if even a single lady did—left the room without making a purchase.—[Cal. John Bull, Dec. 17.

JYEPORE.

Lieutenant-Colonel Raper, the political agent at Jyepore, returned to Mahjeek-Bagh, the residence of the British Mission.

at that court, on the 10th ultimo, where he was received by a deputation on the part of the Regent Rane, and had resumed his official duties. The mutinous battalions of the state of Jypore, whose sudden advance upon and occupation of the city threatened for a time to produce the most serious commotions, had previously separated, and retired to their several stations in the interior. A change of ministry was expected as the result of the late agitation and discussions at that capital.

A division order, of which the following is a copy, was issued by Major-General Sir D. Ochterlony, Bart., G.C.B., commanding the Western Division of the Army, on the 14th ultimo :

"The political agent at Jypore having reported the further detention or assembling of troops unnecessary, the Major-General directs their return to their respective cantonments, and such corps as have been ordered to diverge from their several march routes, will proceed to their respective destinations by the most direct course from their present encampment.

"In publishing this order, the Major-General deems it an act of justice to Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant Hettler, and the officers and men of the advanced light detachment, to offer to them his best acknowledgments for the zeal, exertions, and attention to the public interests exhibited in the rapidity of their march when called upon by the political agent ; and to Brigadier Knox he feels indebted for the promptitude shewn in pushing forward this advanced corps, as well as in directing the preparation of the train, and requiring the services of such corps as had come within the reach of his requisition by their progress, in effecting the relief directed by the general orders of his Excellency the Commander-in-chief."—[*Heng. DISTURBANCE IN KOTAH.

Rajah Bulwunt Singh, uncle to the reigning prince of Boondee, having been detected in fresh intrigues, with the view of creating disorder in the state of Kotah and adjacent country, Colonel Burgh, with the 15th N. I., on its way from Mhow, was employed, at the request of the administrations of Kotah and Boondee, and with the concurrence of the political agent at Harowtee, to put a stop to Bulwunt Singh's intrigues ; the Rajah was accordingly required to repair to Kotah : he refused, and fired upon the party, hearing the summons. The result as detailed in the Calcutta Government Gazette, Dec. 6, is as follows :—At the requisition of the political agent, Captain Caulfield, four companies of the 55th regiment Native Infantry, were detached at 2 A. M., of the 7th ultimo, under the command of Capt. Kiernander, to support the troops of the Rajah of Kotah in their attempt to secure the person of Rajah Bulwunt Singh. The detachment arrived in front of a pukka upper-roomed house, occupied by the Rajah in the town of Keshorajee Patun before the dawn of day, and found the gate shut. Upon an attempt being made to persuade the Rajah to surrender, he opened a smart fire of matchlocks on the party from the windows above ; which was returned with musquetry. Captain Kiernander then endeavoured to blow open the gate with the tumboors belonging to the Kotah troops, but the artillerymen being killed, and the sepoys dropping fast, he placed them under cover round the house, and sent into Kotah for guns. On their arrival, the gate was blown down about sunset ; but the entrance and staircase leading to the upper apartments being very narrow, it was determined to make the entrance broader to admit a section. At about 10 P. M., Rajah Bulwunt Singh rushed out sword in hand, and attacked the party. Several of his attendants were killed on the spot, but the Rajah himself, with about eleven men, got away from the building. He was pursued by a small party of the British sepoys, under the command of Sheik Scobhan, jemadar of the 2d grenadier company, and fell during the pursuit, with his principal adherents. The officers present, besides Captain Kiernander, were Lieuts. Troup, Evans, and McNair. The detachment of the Kotah troops suffered severely. Our loss was one naik and three privates killed, and 18 wounded.

STEAM NAVIGATION.

We are most agreeably surprised at learning, a few days since, that very nearly the whole subscription, in aid of steam navigation between India and England, has been realized, and invested in Government securities. The amount collected is within a trifle of Sa. Rs. 70,000, and only about Rs. 2,000 remain yet unpaid. The public are highly indebted to the permanent committee for the attention they have bestowed on this most essential part of their duty ; and the readiness with which the subscriptions have been paid evinces that, although the subject has ceased to be one of very frequent notice in the papers, the spirit which induced the subscription still exists. The investment of this sum in Government securities, while it secures it from all possible risk—will, by the operation of interest, bring it up nearly to the amount originally proposed, viz. one lac, before it can be claimed ; and we doubt not that when that period arrives the full sum will be easily obtained. On this point we may be allowed to express a little surprise and regret that the fund has not received any aid from either of the sister presidencies.

It must be apparent that the practicability of the navigation being proved by the experiments required by the regulations of the committee, and its advantages felt, the other presidencies would not be long without steam vessels; they might, therefore, consistently aid in originating the attempt. We inserted some days ago a letter from the Madras Government Gazette, in which the writer urged a separate subscription for that presidency, with a view, we imagine, to establish a steam vessel, by means of the capital so raised. Of course it is competent to either presidency to do as they please; we should however have been happy to have found them disposed to unite with us. We believe a statement of the funds will be shortly submitted to the subscribers.—[John Bull, Dec. 9.

GOVERNMENT STAGING BUNGALOWS.

We understand that no less than thirty-two staging bungalows, with proper out-offices, and as many serases, at the average distance of less than fourteen miles, have been built and completed on the new military road from Calcutta to Benares, by the several resident postmasters, under the immediate superintendence of the postmaster-general.

The bungalows are all furnished with tables, chairs, and couches, and have double apartments for the accommodation of two families meeting at the same time. Servants are also posted at each.

This arrangement, so liberally granted by Government, both to Europeans and native travellers, will afford them the greatest comfort and convenience, without any expense of tent equipage, and many will now prefer travelling pleasantly and economically by land, through a fine country and climate, in preference to the tedium of a budgerow.

Applications for the use of the bungalows must, however, previously be made to the postmaster-general, or any of his deputies on the great road.

The first bungalow is conveniently situated, just clear of the village of Sulkea, on the banks of the Hooghly, crossing from Calcutta at Hautkohah ghaut. The last bungalow is at Benares, near the boundary of the military lines.

We understand further that the periodical repairs of this fine road will be finished, as usual, about the 15th instant.—[Cal. Gov. Gaz., Dec. 2.

THE GREAT PAGODA NEAR RANGOON.

The following extract of a letter from Rangoon gives a curious description of the great pagoda, and the uses to which sacred places are sometimes applied by a conquering enemy:

"This pagoda, and the grounds about it, are now crowded with European infantry and artillery, being one principal post without the town, which is garrisoned chiefly by Madras sepoy. The scenes that now occur at this extensive and gorgeous temple are of a nature singularly odd and amusing. For want of quarters, the men and officers thrust themselves into every little shrine and niche. Some of these are sufficiently spacious to admit a table and chair, or a cot; others serve as receptacles for boots and shoes, beef and biscuit. Round the neck of one divinity is suspended a belt and bayonet, while another has his lap full of knapsacks and cartridge-boxes. The ears of others offer convenient pegs for a hat or tin pot, and their shoulders for a soldier's jacket. In short, never were a set of poor deities so meanly employed or so familiarly treated. The great Gaudma, in particular, has his hands full of business, and much charge of old clothes. I was particularly diverted with one figure, of a size larger than life, placed in an erect posture, to bestow a blessing apparently upon another prostrate at his feet. The hand and arm, raised for the above purpose, supported one end of a hammock, while boxes and canteens hung round his neck; and the poor supplicant's back served as a good seat for a soldier quietly cleaning his accoutrements and smoking his pipe. Much as I had heard of this celebrated pagoda, it far exceeded my expectations in extent and splendour, as well as in the richness, delicacy, and, I may say, taste of the ornaments and carved work with which the principal temple, and hundreds of others that surround it, are loaded. In the human figure only, taste and execution are very defective."

SIR F. MACNAGHTEN.

A short time since we announced the approaching departure of Sir F. W. Macnaghten and family on board the Carn Brea Castle. We were not in error, but circumstances have, we believe, occurred to make his Lordship change his intention so far as to postpone his departure for England, at least for the present, though we are not able to say for how long a period.—[Beng. Hurk., Dec. 23.

BURMESE PRIVATEERS.

The Nereide yacht had a narrow escape from capture off the mouth of the river at Rangoon; and it appears merchant vessels are now obliged to effect insurances against capture by the Burman enemy.—[Beng. Hurk., Dec. 13.

MR. MOORCROFT.

We understand that private letters have been received from Mr. Moorcroft, dated 27th August last, at Bramin, eighty miles N.W.

N.W. of Cabul. He expected to enter Uzbek Tartary on the 29th of that month. Mr. Moorcroft represents the country of Afghanistan as in a very distracted state, and says that he had experienced great difficulties in his progress.—[Beng. Hurk., Dec. 3.

MUNSEET SING.

By the last accounts the Maharaja was considerably to the northward of the fort of Attock, on his march to Cabul. In the passage of the Indus he lost about 500 horses and men, and amongst the latter were some of his best sirdars; but about 10,000 horse crossed in safety, and the guns were conveyed over upon elephants. It is reported that a severe action has already taken place between the Sikh forces and the Afghans, in which the latter were defeated with great slaughter.—[Gov. Gaz., Dec. 30.

THE PONTOON TRAIN.

It consists of thirty-six whole, or seventy-two half, pontoons, the boats being formed into two parts, for their more easy conveyance by land. They are constructed of thin teak plank, covered with tin plates, carefully soldered together, to prevent leakage, in the event of the seams opening from exposure to the weather. The pontoons are, of course, flat-bottomed, and each half, we should imagine, to be about nine or ten feet long, and five feet broad. The beams and planks which constitute the platform of the bridge are so fitted on their respective carriages, that even over the roughest road no play or motion can take place, and each half-pontoon covers its own beams and planks, by being placed over them, bottom up, with its gunwales resting on the carriage.

The greatest extent to which the bridge can be drawn is 1,500 feet. Over this troops march along in file: for the passage of troops with a front of ten men, it can be extended to 600 feet; and for a larger front and light guns, to 450 feet. For the transportation of heavy ordnance across broad rivers, the pontoons are formed into rafts of three each, which are capable of supporting the heaviest piece of ordnance.

The rafts are exceedingly manageable, and can be rowed at the rate of about four miles an hour. It is needless to say, that the beams and planks are all made to fit with the utmost nicety, and the whole construction reflects the highest credit on the officer who superintended the equipment, and, who, we believe, is to command the train on the service to which it is attached.

The train left Calcutta on the 20th December, to be embarked on boats on the Salt Water Lake, whence it would proceed to the division of the army, under Brigadier-General Morrison, at Chittagong. The bullocks, for its future conveyance by land, left Calcutta some time before.

SUTTEE AT SULKRA.

Sulkra, Dec. 31, 1824.—Yesterday a suttee took place near the godwans of the late Mr. Jones. A gentleman hearing of the circumstance proceeded to the spot in hopes of preventing it, but was unfortunately too late. On inquiry he was given to understand that the victim was a fine young woman about sixteen. No intoxicating drugs were administered to her at the pile, but they had been given at the house of the deceased. She was obliged to walk round the bier of the deceased, and as soon as she fell down exhausted the vile Brahmins secured her with banboos, and prevented the possibility of escape. There was a man present enjoying the sight, with a spear in his hand, and called himself a chowkeydar; by him the gentleman who inquired for the order of the magistrate was referred to the darogah, who was represented to be near at a subordinate police station. Thither the gentleman went, and found the darogah enjoying a chillum; who, on being asked for a sight of the perwanah, said that he had received one authorizing the sacrifice, but that he had left it at Sulkra! It may be proper to mention, that all the Brahmins save one skulked away on hearing the gentleman making inquiries; and it is worthy of remark that the man only died in the morning: nevertheless a report must have been made to the magistrate, permission granted, and intimation thereof sent across the river within the space of about four hours. Credat Judæus!—[*Beng. EARTHQUAKE AT COMILLAH.

The following has reached us in a letter from Comillah, dated 8th instant, half-past seven P.M. We beg of our friend to accept our thanks for his kind information, and hope to see his hand oftener in our Gazette:—"This evening, at twelve minutes before seven, we experienced here four shocks of an earthquake, the last rather severe. I think that the motion was undulating, or, according to others, more like the motion of the pendulum of a clock. It appeared to come from the north-east, and I had observed during my ride in the evening, that the atmosphere in that quarter was unusually hazy, with some light vaporous clouds. The noise of the brahmins and barking of the dogs was most prodigious. The motion of the earth occasioned most unpleasant sensations—something like those that usher in sea-sickness."—[*Ind. MADRAS.

GENERAL ORDER.

NEW COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

Head Quarters, Choultry Plain, Bangalore, 15th Dec. 1824.—Lieut. Gen. Bowser succeeds to the command of the Madras army, with no common feelings of pride and satisfaction; its long established character and increasing fame he has witnessed through every rank. The high principles of military pride and devotion to the service, which have long characterized this army, and which were supported and impressed by the late lamented and distinguished Commander-in-Chief, his Exc. Gen. Sir Alex. Campbell, Bart., and K. C. B., with such energy as justly to mark the value and ability of that gallant soldier, who was so devotedly attached to his profession, and so true a friend to the Madras army; an army in which he had served with such enviable reputation, that the Lieutenant-General cannot but express his hope, that these principles will be strictly attended to, and he pledges his assurance that he will not fail in his best endeavours to unite with Sir Alexander Campbell's professional pride and zeal, his never-ceasing anxiety for the honour and interest of the Madras army, which will long deplore the irreparable loss of such a man and such an officer.

Lieut. Gen. Bowser desires that all orders issued by his late Exc. Gen. Sir Alex. Campbell, Bart. and K. C. B., may be strictly obeyed; and he feels every confidence in the zealous support and uncensured attention of the officers of the army, to maintain its character for discipline, efficiency, and obedience.

The late brilliant successes of the army under the command of Brigadier-General Sir Arch. Campbell, K. C. B., in defeating the Burmese army, in successive attacks on its position at Rangoon, affords Lieut. Gen. Bowser a pleasing opportunity to congratulate his brother officers and soldiers on the gallant conduct displayed by their comrades employed on that service.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

The annual examination of the several schools of the Vepery Mission of the Society

ciety for promoting Christian Knowledge was held on Wednesday the 15th instant, and was honoured by the presence of Lady Munro, the Honourable Mr. Græme, the Venerable the Archdeacon, and several ladies and gentlemen interested in the welfare of these valuable institutions. The Tamil examination was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Rottler, and that of the English scholars was obligingly and ably performed by the Rev. W. Boy. The children acquitted themselves with great credit, shewing a readiness in replying to questions on the subject of their lessons, a correctness in reading, and a quickness and accuracy in their arithmetical exercises which evinced at once the aptness of the scholars and the diligent exertions of the teachers.

The institution having lately lost one of its valuable instructors by the death of the Rev. E. A. G. Falcke, a man devoted to the duties of his holy office and the service of his God; all the children wore a badge of mourning as a mark of respect to their affectionate teacher and revered pastor.

As the conclusion of the examination, Lady Munro was kindly pleased to honour the school, by placing silver medals round the necks of the most deserving of the boys and girls, and presenting to many of the diligent children rewards of books; and her Ladyship, who has always favoured with her patronage these excellent schools, was further pleased to bestow a handsome donation in aid of their funds.—[Mad. Gov. Gaz., Dec. 23.

THE WEATHER.

The weather about Thursday last reassumed a monsoon appearance, and some rain fell on that and the following day, making the whole fall of the season 26½ inches: a change has since taken place, and the atmosphere is again clear; the mornings cool, with a dew on the ground, and the weather extremely pleasant.—[Mad. Gov. Gaz., Dec. 23.

The weather at the presidency after our report of last week was very boisterous, and at times threatening; boats were unable to proceed through the surf to the ships, which has occasioned delay in the sailing of the latter. The atmosphere contained more moisture than at any time during the regular period of the monsoon; very little rain however fell, and the barometer continued very high the whole time: a storm seems to have been apprehended by the appearances assumed two or three times during the continuance of this unsettled weather; but the masses of clouds thinned and separated as they rose, followed generally by mist, and a fresh wind. The weather became more clear and settled again on Tuesday morning, the wind however continues rather fresh. At Simlipattana we learn, by private letters, that the weather was also boisterous towards the close of the year, and had not assumed a more settled state on the 31st; the wind latterly was accompanied by rain, which had fallen in some quantity.—[Ibid., Jan. 6.

GAITIES OF MADRAS.

The old saying that "it never rains but it pours," is about to be exemplified. Madras, which for many months has been as dull and as stupid as any place could be, has all at once resumed its character for gaiety and pleasure. The past week has been celebrated by a ball and supper given by the officers of the artillery at St. Thomas's Mount, which we noticed in our supplement of Friday. The present week has been ushered in by the monthly Assembly, which took place last evening, but the early hour at which we are obliged to send our paper to the press prevents our giving a description of this entertainment. Judging however from the way in which former balls have gone off, and from the names of the stewards on the present occasion, we doubt not the votaries of Terpsichore were amply gratified. A bachelor's ball is now talked of, and we understand it is to be given on a scale of elegance not surpassed by any which has ever taken place at this presidency. Besides these, there are no less than two dramatic performances in embryo: the characters, we hear, are already cast, and if the reports which have reached us from the green room be true, we are convinced the performances will afford a rich treat to those who are fond of the drama. The spirited individuals, who are exerting themselves for this purpose, are gentlemen amateurs. We hope their endeavours to gratify the public will be crowned with success; that will not only be rewarded with the smiles of the fair, but with the applause of all.—[Mad. Gaz., Dec. 9.

SHERWADIA HILLS.

These hills are quite healthy; not a single case of sickness of any kind. The cold is extremely severe and fires are indispensable all day.—[Ibid., Dec. 9.

TEMPER OF THE SEPOYS.

On the 5th Jan., a detachment of about 600 sepoys in charge of Capt. Norman, embarked on the Charles Forbes for Rangoon. It must be gratifying to all who are connected with the Madras army, to hear of the zeal and anxiety evinced by the native troops serving under this presidency, to proceed on foreign service. We understand that when the detachment above alluded to were inspected, many fine spirited young hands, who had not attained sufficient age and strength to qualify them to carry the musket, underwent a descriptive the inspecting officers and to pass muster; muster; the feeling of disappointment manifested by those who were rejected can scarcely be described. This is another proof, that although the Madras sepoy may not equal the British soldier in muscular strength, yet, in enterprise and bravery, he is not inferior to any soldier in the world.—[*Mad. “4 (40 to 44) A quantity of fire-arms, brought but by Capt. Walker of the Company's ship Esqueneen, having been declared clared to be applicable to military purposes, government gave directions for their being confiscated."]

"Parn. 28th. We approve of your proceedings in this instance. It has been notified to Capt. Walker, that we were satisfied he had no sinister or improper views in shipping the fire arms, but that he should have been more cautious in his selection of such articles; and we have no doubt, that the loss which he sustained on this occasion will cause him to be more circumspect in future."

EUROPEAN SOLDIERS APPLYING FOR THEIR DISCHARGE.

Bombay Castle, Oct. 25, 1824.—The hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to notify, that in future, when European soldiers in the H.C.'s service may apply for their discharge prior to the completion of the period for which they may have enlisted, they shall, in case the application be complied with, be required to pay, to the military paymaster, the sum of three hundred and twenty (320) Bombay rupees, instead of finding substitutes as heretofore.

N.I., and wounded in the action of Corygaum, to the charge of this pillar, and to declare the trust to be hereditary in his family for ever; but, in case of the failure of any male issue to the person enjoying the grant, it will rest with the government to appoint a successor.

PRICE OF PROVISIONS IN THE DECCAN.

Bombay Castle, Dec. 16, 1824.—The very enhanced price of provisions in the Deccan, consequent to the late unusual season, having rendered it necessary to cancel the regimental contracts, and to transfer the provisioning of the European troops at Poona to the commissariat, the hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to establish it, as a general rule, that officers in command of divisions shall consider themselves empowered to transfer to the commissariat the provisioning of the European troops, whenever the daily ration shall cost the soldier beyond seventy (70) reas.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF DORILEA.

On the 7th Nov. last, the most Rev. Fred. Maurelio Maria Stabellini, was consecrated Portuguese Bishop of Dorileia, and Apostolical Vicar-General, in the dominions of the Great Mogul, Idulshaw, Golconda, and in the island of Bombay, at the Mother Church of N. S. de Espérance, at Bombay. The ceremony was performed by the Bishop of Antiphila, and two Vice-Bishops, there being no other Bishop on the spot.

This was the second ceremony of this nature that has taken place on this Island, the first having been performed on the 10th January 1808, in the instance of the consecration of the late Right Rev. Monsignor Raymundo, Bishop of Malabar: the Bishop of Antiphila having also been his Holiness's delegate on the occasion.

PIRACY.

An act of piracy of rather a novel kind, occurred a few days since to the northward, on board a battellah belonging to a Bannan merchant of this place, bound from Billamore to Surat. It appears from the report of the tindal, that as the vessel was leaving the former place, three persons came on board and requested a passage, each having a small bundle, apparently containing clothes. On their arrival off Damaun, the three men, who had concealed weapons in their bundles, armed themselves, and, after wounding the tindal and one or two others, forced the crew and passengers below, where they were secured. They then took the boat to Craunshaw Bunder, and offered the cargo for sale; but their manner of trading having excited suspicion among the merchants, a report was made to the Rajah, who sent off a party to seize them, and subsequently confined them in irons until the owner could be sent for to investigate the business.—[Bomb. Gaz. Dec. 22.]

SURVEY OF THE ARABIAN COAST.

Private letters from Muscat mention the arrival of the H. C. surveying brig Psyche, Lieutenant Brucks, after a tedious passage of thirty-one days. Colonel Stannus, C. B. had returned to Bushire, from Shiraz; and the Benafel was to proceed to Bushire to convey him on his tour of the Arabian Coast.—[Bomb. Gaz. Nov. 17.]

GAJETTES OF BOMBAY.

On Monday evening last, Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy entertained a numerous assemblage of the Society of the Presidency with a ball and supper, at his mansion in Mazagon; on which occasion the Honorable the Governor, the Honorable the Chief Justice, and many other distinguished guests were present.

We have seldom had an opportunity of witnessing, even in the houses of the first European gentry in the island, an entertainment so agreeably and judiciously arranged as this of Jamsetjee's. The gardens in front of the house were tastefully decorated with rows of lamps; and the public entrance, as well as the dancing and supper-rooms, exhibited all the neatness and good taste of an elegant English residence; while the pleasing attention and hospitality of the highly respectable entertainer, were every where conspicuous. The zeal with which the merry dance was kept up by our fair country-women, and the general good-humour that prevailed among the party throughout the evening, shewed that Jamsetjee had been eminently successful in his efforts to please.

About midnight the party assembled round the supper tables, which were amply covered with all the delicacies that the island affords. The health of the hospitable landlord was proposed by James Henry Crawford, Esq., and justice was done to it in a bumper. The Advocate General, on the part of Jamsetjee, returned thanks, and at his request proposed the health of Mr. and Mrs. Crawford. This toast was drank with three times three, and replied to in suitable terms by Mr. Crawford.

The dance was renewed for a short time after supper, and the company separated apparently much gratified with their evening's amusement.—[Bomb. Cour. Nov. 27.]

The first day of the new year was commemorated at Farel House by a ball and supper in the evening, to the Officers of His Majesty's and the Honorable Company's services, and most of the Society of the Presidency. The company began to assemble about nine o'clock, and before ten the principal part of the beauty and fashion of the Settlement had arrived, when the evening's amusements commenced with country dancing; quadrilles succeeded, which were kept up with great spirit. At eleven the company were conducted to the saloon, where an elegant supper was provided; after which dancing was resumed and continued until it was announced that Sunday morning had been encroached upon, when the party separated, highly delighted with.

with the entertainments of the evening, and the polite attentions they had received.

Most of the respectable natives of the Presidency were among the visitors, as well as several distinguished foreigners; the brother of the present King of Cabul, the nukeeb of Macullah, with his family and several vakeels from native governments, we noticed among others.—[Hon. Gaz. Jan. 5.

MAD ELEPHANT.

The following is an extract from a letter from Baroda, dated on Christmas-day.—“We had a shocking mischance some days ago; one of the Guicawar's elephants which had been made mus to hunt, when intoxicated to madness with drugs, and goaded to frenzy by the sht mers, or hunters, broke loose and was ranging the town uncontrolled, no one daring to go near him for sixty hours. Six unhappy creatures were killed by him, and a great deal of damage was done in the bazar.”—[Bom. Cour. Jan. 1.

SHIP LAUNCH.

A fine new ship, of 700 tons burthen, for the house of Forbes and Co., was floated out of the Bombay dock, on the evening of the 21st Dec., and named the Caledonia. She is reported to be an uncommonly fine vessel, and judges consider her to be one of the best constructed of any that have been built for the merchant service in Bombay. Her keel was only laid about six months ago.—[Bom. Gaz.

REFRACTORY COOLIES.

By a late account we learn that the Coolies are still giving considerable annoyance in the districts about Ahmedabad. A detachment from the force stationed there, under Captain Schuler, of the Artillery, was directed to proceed against three villages where some of the most refractory had sheltered themselves; but, on the arrival of the troops, they were found deserted. It was expected, however, that they would soon return to their more peaceful occupations, as the cause of their turbulence was fast disappearing in the progressive improvement in the face of the country. Grain and provisions of all kinds are stated to be plentiful, and sold in the bazaar at moderate rates.—[Bom. Cour. Dec. 15.

My accounts from Ahmedabad, received on Monday last, we learn that the two principal chiefs of the refractory Coolies, who headed our force at Dudhna, have been taken by Colonel Miles, near the district of Pultan, and which circumstance, it was supposed, would lead to the surrender of the rest, without a resort to further coercive measures.—[Bom. Gaz. Dec. 29.

IMAM OF MUSCAT'S MARINE.

We are informed that the Imam has sent the Liverpool to Bombay for the purpose of being broke up, as she is rapidly decaying. His Highness, we believe, intends requesting permission from Government to construct another vessel, in the Bombay Dock-yard, nearly after the same model, though somewhat larger. He appears very desirous of keeping up his marine force, which has become rather formidable; at least it is so in the estimation of the native tribes on the Arabian coast; and this is an object which he has been always desirous of attaining, as it gives a security to his power in the possessions held by him on the coast of Africa, from whence about one-fourth of his revenue is derived.—[Hon. Cour. Dec. 15.

COTTON CROP.

The crop of cotton is said to be so short that there will not be more than what is required for supplying the regular demand for the China market.

WEATHER.

We never recollect the weather being colder in Bombay than it has been for the last three days. Yesterday, at 2 P. M., the thermometer was at 74° (?) in the Fort.—[Hon. Cour. Jan. 1.

MISSION FROM THE KING OF BORNEO.

On the 8th instant, a proa, belonging to the King of Borneo Proper, anchored in the roads. This vessel, which is of the unusual size of from 2 to 300 tons, and in form and outfit of the usual grotesque fashion of the vessels of that country, has on board a diplomatic deputation from the King of Borneo, at the head of which is the Orang Kaya Kayong or Lord of Kayong, a person of high rank and great respectability in his own country. The deputation landed on the 10th, and the procession exhibited a barbaric splendour not often presented at this place. The proa of the ambassadors was hung with flags and banners. A long line of twelve boats towed the galley which conveyed them from their vessel to the shore, and the whole of the Bornean traders in the harbour to the number of sixteen, saluted the procession as they passed. On landing, the ambassador received a complimentary salute from the garrison, and proceeded forthwith to the Residency House, accompanied by a train of followers of from two to three hundred men.

The country of Borneo Proper is not only the largest principality of that immense island, but as far as geographical limits may be considered, one of the most extensive kingdoms in Asia, having perhaps little less than 700 miles of sea-coast. Of this unexplored and little known country we shall be happy to take an early occasion of giving our readers such a sketch as recent opportunity as placed us in the way of furnishing.—[Sing. Chron. Oct. 29.]

SLAVE TRADE.

Since our last we have received more correct and detailed information respecting the two French slave ships which were stated to have been upon the coast of Bali. One of them had already taken on board 200 slaves, and both intended to make 600 in all. A prahu from Bali, on her way to this place, spoke at Besuki in Java a Dutch cruiser, of fourteen guns; the commander of which informed the people of the prahu, that he was so far on his way to the straits of Bali, for the purpose of intercepting the French slave ships.—[Ibid.]

MR. THORNTON.

It is now ascertained that this unfortunate gentleman was deliberately murdered, along with the whole of the crew of the General de Kock, by the pirates of Lorneo.

LOSS OF THE BRIG AMBOYNA.

We have just received accounts of the loss of the Amboyne, Waddell, bound from China, with a full cargo, for this port. A letter from the commander to a house of agency at Canton has been shewn to us, by which we learn that the Amboyne left Canton in the end of October, and was stranded on some part of the coast of Hainan, in a heavy gale, which she encountered on the 3d of November. The whole of the crew, we are happy to state, reached the shore in safety, and succeeded in saving a few chests of raw silk from the wreck. Captain Waddell complains bitterly of the inhospitable treatment which they experienced from the natives. The mandarins would not permit any boats to go near the brig to assist in saving the cargo, and the lower orders collected in numbers for the purpose of theft, for which this great people have always been notorious.—[Ibid. Dec. 9.]

BORNEO.

By the last arrivals from the west coast of Borneo, the Chinese gold miners it is ascertained are in a state of formidable insurrection against the Netherland authorities. The cause of the resistance is said said to be a demand made by the European government, to be put in possession of a certain fortified position held by the Chinese, which the latter refused to surrender; making an appeal to arms. It would appear that 300 regular troops, and about 400 or 500 irregular auxiliaries had proceeded against the refractory Chinese, who were assembled at Sinkawang to the number of 4,000 men. Here, a long but fruitless negotiation took place, which was terminated by an attack made by the Chinese on a reconnoitering party of the Dutch forces, amounting to 100 men. This party, by a feint of the Chinese, was detached from the main body, and in this situation was routed with the loss of eighty men, including two Malay rajahs. While the negotiation was going forward, the Chinese felled trees and blocked up the river with them, which is a small stream capable of admitting boats only. The Dutch detachment was in this manner cut off from all communication with their shipping in the road; and the place affording no fresh water, the troops were reduced to great extremities. Having waited for twelve days for relief, they took the resolution of quitting their stockade in the night-time, making the best of their way to the boats and vessels, by crossing the neck of land between the stockade and the mouth of the river. To effect this they were compelled to abandon their cannon, arms, ammunition, and baggage, and wading to the shoulder in the marsh, they reached the boats with the loss of twenty men, and were conveyed to Sambas.

Reinforcements had been requested from Batavia. The Chinese were preparing to attack the Dutch at Mampawa, where the Dutch troops were concentrated. The Chinese must in the end be overpowered, and this will be attended by the destruction of the most productive gold mines of Asia.—[Sing. Chron. Oct. 29.]

SUMATRA.

Batavia papers of the 18th December contain despatches to the government, from Mr. Reynat, Resident at Palembang, of a most unexpected but unsuccessful attack made by 400 natives of Palembang, under the command of the young Sultan, on the post occupied by the Netherland troops. It appears that accounts had been received in October, that the introduction of the new land tax had met with more difficulty in some parts of the interior than was expected. They were defeated in their attack on the post and had above thirty killed. We had twenty-three wounded, of whom two are now dead. We expect further explanation of the cause of this absurd attempt. His Majesty's corvette, the Dolphin, is gone to Palembang: so that there is no reason to have any apprehension for the safety of that place.—[Dutch Paper.]

CELEBES.

Advices from Batavia, dated October 28, give a long account of an incursion made into the Macassar territory by the people of Bona. The failure of the crops of the barbarians is stated to be the cause of this outrage. It was hoped that the timely arrival of reinforcements, with the assistance claimed under existing treaties, from a friendly native state, would enable the Macassar government to repel the invaders.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The following are extracts from the Madrid Gazette:

We learn by authentic despatches from Manila, that on the 13th November last there appeared before that port a corvette of 28 guns, coming from Guayaquil to surrender to the government of the legitimate king. There was not a single Spaniard on board of this vessel which was part of the revolutionary navy of Peru. The government of the Philippines had given orders for the corvette to sail for Cadiz in the month of January, under the command of Don Benito Ortiz, an officer of the royal navy.

EARTHQUAKE AT MANILLA.

By the Hope, the latest arrival from the Philippines, we are concerned to hear that these countries have lately been visited by a dreadful earthquake and hurricane, which have caused much distress amongst the inhabitants, and laid a considerable part of the city of Manila in ruins.

Several slight shocks of the earthquake had been felt throughout the island of Luzon during the month of October. On the 26th of that month a most severe shock was experienced in the town and suburbs of Manila, which demolished several of the churches, one of the bridges over the river, and many of the private houses. About four miles above the town and close to the river, the earth opened with a tremendous explosion, and shortly afterwards shoals of dead fish were seen floating down the river into the sea. All the respectable inhabitants of Manila removed into the country, and left the town quite deserted. The military barracks having been laid level with the ground, tents were pitched for the soldiers on a plain at a short distance. This encampment was totally destroyed by the hurricane which came on the 1st instant. The roofs were blown off many of the remaining houses, and six of the vessels in the roads were stranded.

This is the most severe earthquake which has been experienced in Manila since the memorable memorable one of 1796, and the loss of human life, although not correctly ascertained, was generally believed to have been very considerable.—[Singapore Chron. Nov. 25.

SIAM.

By the latest accounts from Singapore, it appears that authentic intelligence had reached that settlement of the death of the King of Siam on the 20th July, after an illness of six days' continuance. His eldest but illegitimate son, the Prince Kromma Chiat, ascended the throne the following day without experiencing any opposition whatever, and apparently with the general consent and approbation of the Siamese chiefs. This change in the government, as the prince is unquestionably the most intelligent and enlightened individual of his nation, will probably infuse some portion of activity and even liberality into the Siamese Government. It is stated also that the Prah Klang, or minister for foreign affairs, through whom the English have always conducted their intercourse with the court of Siam, has been raised to the highest rank in the kingdom, and enjoys the entire confidence of the king.

Contrary to the usual order of events in Siam, the present succession to the throne has not been accompanied by any disturbances, or by any of those executions and proscriptions which, in that country, have usually marked the commencement of a new reign.

It is stated that one of the first acts of the new king was to issue an order abolishing all those vexatious restrictions which have hitherto fettered the foreign commerce of Siam, and allowing perfect freedom of trade and barter without any interference on the part of the government officers, subject only to the payment of the regular duties of eight per cent.—[Cul. Gov. Gaz.

WAR WITH AVA.

Letters from Singapore state that the Siamese troops were speedily expected to take measures for attacking the Burmans, and add, that the king of the latter people sent an embassy to Peking to ask for help from the Celestial Emperor, but this was refused.—[Cal. John Bull.

CHINA.

Extract of a letter from Canton dated Oct. 28.—“Every thing here is going on quietly with the Chinese. The Lintin question has been entirely set at rest, the Chinese themselves having given up every point. By the arrival of the direct ships from England, Mr. Urnston, the chief of the British factory, received accounts of his Majesty having been graciously pleased to confer on him the honour of knighthood by patent, for his conduct during the long and anxious discussion in which he was engaged with the Chinese authorities, relative to the affairs of the Topaze frigate at Lintin. This will no doubt have a proper effect on the Chinese of all classes here, as showing them that the British authorities in this quarter are supported in a just cause by their king and country.”

Advices from China to the end of December state, that the edict promulgated by the Chinese Government, for the importation of rice into China, duty free, was in force at the beginning of November. The quantity of that article sufficient to exempt a ship from duty, was 4,050 pekuls. The recent embassy from the Burmese to the Chinese Emperor had excited considerable attention at Canton; the court of Peking, however, was decidedly hostile to that of Ava. The principal objection urged by the government of Cochin China, in answer to a late application from the Burmese for aid, was the apprehension of giving umbrage to the court of Peking.

ARAB TRADERS.

It appears there is some demur on the part of the Chinese Government officers as to the propriety of admitting a vessel under Arab colours to pass the Bocca Tigris, and an express had been sent off to the court of Peking requesting its decision. [Bom. Gaz. Dec. 29.

BURMESE EMBASSY.

A Peking Gazette of August announces the approach of a Burmese envoy, the object of whose mission is stated to be to solicit assistance from the Chinese in the warfare in which the King of Ava is engaged with us. The grounds on which this interference is solicited, is artfully represented to be “that the English had without provocation, and most unjustly, invaded the Burmese empire, and that therefore no security existed against such an act of aggression being next followed up by a similar attack on the Chinese empire.”—Another Peking Gazette (the latest received at Canton) observes, that the Mandarin in command of the south-western frontier had reported to his
5 R Imperial

Imperial Majesty that, being exceedingly occupied in constructing fortifications, and a line of defences on that frontier of the empire, with a view to resist any aggression on the part of the Burmese, or other foreigners, with reference to the state of hostilities in which that country is involved, he felt assured, in advertence to the importance of the duty in which he was engaged, which could not be left to inexperienced hands, that his Imperial Majesty would on the present occasion dispense with his visit at court, which is known to be expected and required of Great Mandarins, commanders of a province, once in three years. This intelligence is chiefly important as it tends to shew that the Chinese are not indifferent to, nor unapprized of, what is going on, upon our eastern frontier.

Whether his Celestial Majesty will give his aid to his golden-footed brother, remains to be seen. Any attempt to speculate on the probable politics of the court of Peking is perfectly vain. It is however, fortunately, a matter of not the smallest consequence as it affects the Burmese war. Should his Imperial Majesty determine to countenance the Burmese, the usual prohibitory system will no doubt be adopted at Canton. For our own part, we think that, however annoying these stoppages of trade are for the time, they work good in the end. During the late war we were obliged from strong political necessity, to adopt a strictly conciliatory line of conduct with the Chinese; and the manner in which the difficulties in maintaining our commercial intercourse, without sacrificing our national character, were surmounted, reflects the highest credit on all concerned in the administration of British affairs in China.—[Cal. John Bull.

PERSIA.

Letters have been received from Tabriz, dated the end of September, announcing the arrival there of the Persian Prince Futeh Dollah Khan, who, our readers may remember, visited India some months since. He has perfectly recovered from the indisposition he was labouring under, which he attributes to his having followed the prescriptions of the medical gentleman who attended him when at this presidency. The letters mention that he is profuse in his expressions of gratitude for the great attention he received during his stay at Bombay, and has impressed the whole court of the heir-apparent, where he was residing, with the most lively feelings of regard towards our Government; which will, without doubt, powerfully aid in strengthening our political relations with the Court of Persia. Indeed letters have been received from his Highness to that effect, and which express, most feelingly, the high sense entertained by the Prince, Abbas Mirza, of the distinguished courtesies paid to one who has become, by marriage, a member of his family. This favourable impression is not a little to be valued, as it is said the king, on a late occasion during an excursion to the Chumman ul Sultania, assembled the Princes of the blood with the nobles of the court, and announced to them, publicly, his determination of intrusting the future conduct of his government to his eldest son, who, he directed, should be proclaimed regent. Abbas Mirza still, however, holds his court at Tabriz. Futeh Ullee Shah, the present king, is now about sixty-two years of age, and, it is said, his constitution is much debilitated.

Through the medium by which the above has reached us, we learn that the earthquake continued to be felt at times at Haraz. It is a remarkable circumstance, that every three or four days the earth, in the neighbourhood of the city, was considerably agitated, which has created so great an alarm among the inhabitants, that they had not attempted again to rebuild their houses. Great distress is said to be felt; all business was at a stand; and high and low were indiscriminately living in huts in the gardens, outside the ruins of the town.—[Bom. Cour. Dec. 15.

ABDICATION OF THE KING OF PERSIA.

We have been favoured with the sight of a letter from Ispahan, received during the last week, which corroborates the report of the King of Persia having abdicated the throne in favour of his eldest son Abbas Mirza. It is said, he purposes visiting the ruins of Shiraz, and intends having the city rebuilt, and restored to the same degree of splendour it exhibited when it could boast of being the capital.—[Bom. Gu., Dec. 29.

MUSCAT.

We had hoped to have been able to lay before our readers an account of the Imam of Muscat's late pilgrimage to Medina, but some circumstances have prevented our procuring the connected details. All the information we have been able to collect respecting it is the following, as extracted from a private letter.

"His Highness left Muscat in one of his frigates with a part of his family and a considerable retinue. On his arrival at Jidda he was received in great state, and had the most distinguished attention shewn him by the governor and officers deputed by the Pacha of Egypt, who had given directions that no expense should be spared in suiting his reception to his exalted colony, under the new act of parliament, have been for the first time brought into operation. A court of quarter session having been assembled, a doubt arose whether the magistrates should summon jurymen to assist them, and the matter was brought before the chief justice of the colony, who, being of opinion that a jury should be summoned, issued a mandamus to the magistrates. A jury was summoned accordingly, but in the formation of it all persons who had not come free to the colony (the convicts) were carefully excluded. The Australian condemns the policy of this exclusion, as tending to widen that division among the inhabitants which already exists. Sir Thomas Brisbane, anxious to promote the welfare and prosperity of Australia, had fitted out a party to explore the country for four or five hundred miles in the interior, to the southward and westward of Lake George. Sir Thomas had embarked with his suite on board his Majesty's colonial brig Amity, destined to visit the new settlement at Moreton Bay. It is thought his Excellency will be absent on this tour of inspection about three or four weeks.

Murder of a Sealing Party.—Accounts have reached us of an attack recently made upon a party of sealers in Bass Straits, by the natives of Van Diemen's Land, in which attack all the men belonging to the boat, except one, were massacred. It appears that the leader of this party had, about three years ago, got hold of a native girl, with whom he had since cohabited, and that this girl was with them in the boat. When out sealing one day, they resolved to run ashore and amuse themselves in the country. When they landed, they sent this girl to a party of natives to endeavour to decoy some females from their companions. After remaining absent two or three days, she returned, and stated that she expected some of the native girls to join them very shortly. In the night-time she contrived to secrete a musket, the only one they had. Next morning a band of blacks came down and murdered them, without their being able to defend themselves, or make the least resistance. A man who had been left in charge of the boat, contrived to make his escape. He having got some intimation of the fate of his companions, had just time to get away with the boat, when the natives arrived on the beach with the intention of despatching him also. The name of the man to whom the boat belonged was Duncan Bell. Under his protection also was this girl, through whose treachery the party lost their lives. She has a child, of which Bell is the reputed father. The name of another of the sufferers is Samuel Stewart, the son of the well-known Nobly Stewart, who met a similar fate some time ago, having been murdered by natives on the coast of this island. The names of the others are unknown.—[Australian of Oct. 28.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

Letters from Van Diemen's Land have been received to the 28th October. It was proposed that the seat of government should be removed to Brighton. At Bagdad, seventeen miles from Hobart Town, the increase and improvement of the quality of Wool appears to attract attention, and the wool transmitted to England had been returned in cloth with the most favourable reports of the quality by the Yorkshire manufacturers. Specimens of timber of the colony had also been sent off—other merchants advertising that they may be seen at different stores. The reports are favourable as to their quality and value. An Agricultural Society was about being established.—[Telescope.

We have received Papers from Hobart Town, Van Diemen's Land, to the latter end of December. The colony is rapidly advancing in civilization. A plan for supplying the town with water, by iron pipes, and the establishment of a bank, distillery, and brewery, give proof of the rapid progress made in the comforts and conveniences of Europe. Wool and flax will, in time, both be numbered in the native products of the colony. To these will also be added sugar; in the culture of which a successful experiment has been made. A subscription has been entered into for importing game alive from England; pheasants, partridges, snipes, and woodcocks, are to be conveyed a distance of twelve thousand miles, for the amusement of the colonists.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The following statement has been put forth, we believe, by a joint stock trading company, the details are therefore to be received with caution:

The position of the Sandwich Islands, so inaccurately laid down in most of the maps hitherto published, lies exactly between 18 deg. 37 sec. and 23 deg. 11 sec. North latitude; and between 155 deg. 7 min. and 158 deg. 30 min. longitude West of Greenwich. They consist of eleven, of which nine are inhabited, and in a state of prosperous cultivation. Owhyhee, the largest, has a circuit of 300 English miles, and contains 150,000 inhabitants. Wahoo is 160 miles in circumference, with a population of 110,000 souls. This is the residence of the king, and seat of government. He resides at Hunnarooru, a town of 8,000 souls, and having a good port. Mowee is 160 miles in circumference, and contains 100,000 inhabitants. Motokoi has a circuit of 74 miles, and 25,000 inhabitants. The other islands, of which the extent and inhabitants are much more limited, are called Ranai, Niaoow, Touraou, and Mocomanow. The whole population may be estimated at 490,000 souls.

The climate of these islands is one of the most salubrious in the whole Pacific Ocean, nor have they ever been visited by any epidemic diseases, except those introduced by European visitors.

In alluding to the soil, M. Rives describes it as being almost unequalled in fertility, and capable of producing many of the productions both of tropical and more northern climes. Coffee, sugar, ginger, cotton, and tobacco, as also balsams and drugs of various kinds, are cultivated with the greatest success. Its celebrated sandal-wood, of which several cargoes are annually exported to China, has hitherto been chiefly bought up by American speculators, who have in many instances sold it at the enormous profit of 500 and 400 per cent.

Although, from the fact of these islands lying in the same parallel of latitude with those points of Mexico in which the richest veins of gold and silver are found, it was supposed they also contained the precious metals, this fact was only placed beyond doubt in 1817, when a Russian naturalist visited them, for the purpose of exploring their mineral treasures.

Besides improving the large tracts of land already tilled to the new company cutting sandal-wood, of which it possesses the exclusive right, and working the mines, an active commercial intercourse will be opened with the North-west coast of America, California, the whole coast of the Southern hemisphere, the East-Indies, the Philippines, and Japan.

M. Rives, to whose enlightened views and indefatigable exertions the present Association owes its rise, represents the natives of his adopted country, and among whom he has lived eighteen years, as being extremely docile, industrious, and most anxious to acquire civilization, in which they have already made a surprising progress. It was indeed at the earnest solicitation of the leading chiefs that the late king came to this country, in order to carry the foregoing objects into execution.

Postscript to Asiatic Intelligence.

The following documents respecting the capture of Kittoor, appear in the Bombay Courier.

POLITICAL DEPARTMENT.

Bombay Castle, Dec. 16, 1824.

The following despatches, addressed to Col. Fred. Pierce, have been received from Lieut. Col. Deacon, C. B. of the Madras establishment, commanding, in the absence of former officer from severe indisposition, the combined force of Madras and Bombay troops, assembled in the Southern Mahratta country for the suppression of the insurrection of the state of Kittoor.

The Governor in Council has great satisfaction in expressing his entire approbation of the measures adopted by Lieut. Col. Deacon, for the reduction of this fortress, when all endeavours to bring back the deluded and infuriated people, by whom the fortress was held in opposition to the British Government, to a spirit of obedience for forbearance and conciliation, had entirely failed.

The conduct of the officers and soldiers under the Lieut. Col.'s orders, is also entitled to the fullest approbation of Government, which views with particular satisfaction the exertions of the several corps to reach their destination from distant points, under circumstances of great difficulty attendant on the late unusual season, and the great want of carriage in the country through which they had to pass. In this respect the 2d Regt. of Madras Wallajahbad L. A. Inf., under Lieut. Col. Conry, stands particularly distinguished; this corps having effected a very rapid march from Sholapore, notwithstanding the impediments of several wide and rapid rivers, for the crossing of which they had to seek their own means.

Camp before Kittoor, Dec. 6, 1824. Col. Pierce, commanding, Madras, Hyderabad, &c.

Sir: On my arrival at Kittoor on the 2d, with the detachment you did me the honour to place under my orders, I had the gratification of finding the prisoners, Messrs. Stevenson and Elliott, had just been surrendered, and were at Mr. Chaplin's tents. Soon after this, having an opportunity of seeing Mr. Chaplin, I was informed that the enemy had, nevertheless, no intention of delivering up the fort; and as I required some hours to visit the several posts for the purpose of reconnoitering, no time was lost in allowing four and twenty hours for the consideration of the terms offered by the Commissioner. This period expired, and an answer was received, decidedly refusing the terms. On this some guns were advanced from the park, to a position fronting the enemy's fortified post of Kummumunty, with the idea of attracting their attention during the advance of a party of infantry, as per margin,* from Lieut. Col. M'Leod's post on my right, to storm the enemy's position on their left flank. The guns opened about half-past five o'clock, with shells elegantly directed by Major Palmer; and in fifteen minutes after (the preconcerted time) Lieut. Col. M'Leod, who had himself taken charge of the advancing party, was seen approaching a hill, within 150 yards of the point of attack; this hill was in a moment cleared of all the match-lock men upon it, and they were so closely pursued to their strong-hold, that the colonel, with his gallant little party, entered the works along with them, which they instantly abandoned, and fled with great loss to their upper fort, distance 1000 yards. Thus this position, so favourable for future operations, was gained by this spirited and well-conducted advance, without the loss, on our side, of a man either killed or wounded; but I am concerned to relate, that Mr. Munro, a gentleman of the Commissioner's suite, having advanced, was wounded severely in the breast. The enemy's loss I do not exactly know, but I am inclined to think it was severe, though they got out of the way as quick as they could. This operation was most spiritedly supported by the rapid advance, across the plain from the batteries, of the 2d Regt. L. A. Inf., under Lieut. Col. Conry. The remainder of the night was occupied in strengthening the post; and by day-light in the morning, an excellent battery was prepared for eighteen-pounders, which commenced about nine A. M. to effect a breach in the wall of the upper fort, aided by some six-pounders on an esplanade to the right, which Lieut. Col. M'Leod passed over, in approaching the post the night before. This fire, assisted by a brisk one of Shrapnell-shells from Major Trewwin's post on our left, produced a very serious effect, so that at half-past 3 p.m. a person came out to Mr. Chaplin, to request permission to send a Vakeel. Mr. Chaplin instantly referred the messenger to me, and he was then sent back to inform the enemy, that if they were inclined to surrender the Fort, to lay down their arms, and to deliver over certain persons as prisoners, they should hold a white flag, as a signal that they were ready to do so; the flag was soon visible, and all hostilities ceased. Some demur afterwards occurring, it was necessary to be prepared to recommence firing with renewed vigour; to which effect, I supported the advanced parties by moving forward H. M.'s 40th Regt., under Lieut. Col. Williams, and the 3d Bombay N. I., under Lieut. Col. Seely; the batteries were several times about to re-open, when a little further delay by negotiation occurred; the persons were at length brought out, and the forts were surrendered, about 3 o'clock, on the morning of the 5th inst.

In detailing these operations, it is evident that the spirit and determination of the troops was of the best description, and never did I observe duty more willingly and cheerfully performed. Lieut. Col. M'Leod conducting his advance on Kummumunty in a manner that excited the praise of all who beheld him. The fire from the batteries under Major Palmer had the most decided effect, and the conduct of the artillery during the siege merits much praise. A part of the troops was kept in reserve, for some decisive effort if necessary; and Major Trewwin, with a detachment on my left, kept the enemy constantly on the alert by his active operations, and finally closely invested the forts, by driving the enemy from the petty immediately under the walls. The useful and indispensable corps of Pioneers, under Lieut. Gordon, were most actively employed throughout.

In the operation of reconnoitring I was ably assisted by the abilities of Capt. Pouget of the Bombay Engineers, and his decided exertions and operations, as well as those of Lieuts. Lowe and Outram of the same branch, were of the greatest use to me; and I am convinced that Capt. Pouget would have been entirely successful in filling up the ditch of the upper fort, by the dispositions he was making for the same. It is my particular duty to notice the information and assistance I received from Lieut. Col. Walker, who commanded the troops which invested Kittoor, previous to my arrival; and in noticing the arduous duties which the Assist. quart. mast. gen. Capt. O'Donnoghue has had to perform, by having also charge of the Assist. adj. gen.'s department. I can hardly do justice in proportion to his great exertions; and with every department I have the greatest reason to be perfectly satisfied. The services of a party of Capt. Spiller's horse, and the squadron under Capt. Jameson of the 3d Bombay L. C., both of the Commissioner's escort, in completing, as much as could be, the investment of the places was particularly serviceable and cheerfully performed.

As there are many experienced infantry officers in camp, it may be necessary to mention, that the employment of Lieut. Col. M'Leod in leading the party of infantry to the attack of the fortified hill was accidental; but it has afforded him, I am happy to say, an opportunity of showing that he is as good an infantry officer as he has long been known to be, an eminently distinguished one, in the line to which he belongs.

I cannot conclude this despatch without noticing the very great benefit I have derived from the information which the Commissioner Mr. Chaplin has afforded me, from the moment when all negotia-tiation on his part ceased, and the reduction of the place by force became necessary.

I have, &c.

CHARLES DEACON, Com-detach.

Colonel Pierce, commanding field force Doonab, Camp Belgaum. Head-Quarters field detachment, Camp before Kitteroor, Dec. 8, 1824.

Sir: I have the honour to transmit a copy of a letter from Major Trewman, who commanded the most advanced post, and was nearest to the fort gate of Kitteroor during the latter part of the siege, containing an account of some events not detailed in my original despatch, which, however, marks some difference as to the mode in which the fort of Kitteroor came into our possession, with which I was not acquainted at the time my first letter on the subject was despatched from camp.

I have, &c.

CHARLES DEACON, Lieut.col.
Commanding field detachment.

Camp before Kitteroor, Dec. 8, 1824.—To the Acting Assist. Ady. Gen., field-force, camp Kitteroor.

Sir: Having heard a report that the fort of Kitteroor had surrendered by capitulation, I take the liberty to submit, for the information of the officer commanding, that I advanced repeatedly close to the crest of the hill: and, according to the instructions of Lieut. Col. Deacon, C.B., summoned the enemy to surrender the fort, and to open the gates, that the troops might take possession, which I told them would be the means of saving their lives. They repeatedly refused to open more than the wicket for the admission of myself alone, as they had done once before, early in the morning, when receiving a note from Col. Deacon: to be guarded against treachery, I effected my retreat out of the fort. In reply to my last summons and threat to blow open the gates by a fire from the twelve-pound battery, close within their view, they again decidedly refused to surrender. The defences over and around the gates were, at that time, crowded with armed men; and I had my guns loaded with canister and pointed at them, ready to open, when they disappeared; and in a few moments the Wallajahbad Lt. Inf. appeared on the defences of the outer gate, where the enemy had several guns mounted to enfilade the principal street which I occupied. Col. Conry, with his corps, had entered the works by escalade, between the upper and lower fort, and penetrating to the gates, opened the wickets and let me in.

The keys of the gates were not delivered up till we were in possession of the palace.

I hope I may be excused the liberty I have taken in making this report, which I now have the honour to submit for the consideration of the commanding officer.

I have, &c.

J. T. TREWMAN, Major,
Commanding advanced post.

No further official advices have been received respecting the operations in Ava. The report of a revolution in the government is contradicted; although it would appear that the King of Ava had, by way of experiment, placed his son for a time upon the throne, in order to dispel the influence of ill-luck. The grand army before the late engagements consisted of about 50,000 men, including 1,000 invulnerables.* The forces of the kingdom are dispirited and dispersed; not a soldier is seen near Rangoon. A detachment of the British army was to move up the river on the 15th January.

A private letter mentions with enthusiastic praise, the conduct of all the troops during the late actions. Never did the sepoys (the writer states) acquire more fame than those of the Madras army have upon this occasion. Major Yates and his corps, the 25th N. I. (the old 13th), were particularly distinguished: they defended the post of Keimendine for seven days and eight nights. During the last two days and nights the enemy's attacks were so desperate and repeated that the men had no time to cook their victuals, but ate the rice dry. On one of their officers, while he praised their determined valour, lamenting the privation they suffered from want of food—"We want no food, but ammunition enough," was the general reply of these fine fellows.

The fire at Rangoon appears to have occasioned much mischief. The property consumed is of considerable value; the Commissariat-office and papers were destroyed.

Letters from the Sylhet and Chittagong districts mention, that the troops are about to advance into the interior, and that important intelligence may soon be expected. The sepoys are represented to be in the very highest spirits and finest order, though reduced in numbers by sickness. The Bundoola is reported to have arrived in Arracan.

Among the enemy's baggage taken in the stockades during the last action were found some curious memoranda and documents, containing various details of petty expenditure, such as disbursements for shrimps, and a dish for the Bundoola to eat from; tamarinds for the same; and one tickal-worth of pureils (a species of insects much relished), and some tea-leaves for ditto. There is also an order from the King, dated 15th Natch 1186 (4th or 5th Dec. 1821), directing Neimee Noortu to copy a long invocation of the deities, and bind it on his arm as an amulet!

The Siamese seem to act as friendly auxiliaries to us. A passport or letter from the British is an effectual security to the Peguers who chance to come in contact with them.

* * We are authorized to state, that the name of Lieut. Wright is printed in the London Gazette of March 25 (see p. 687, col. 1.), instead of Lieut. Andrew Wright.

* These men have acquired this title by practicing tricks (such as firing gunpowder in each other's faces, shooting at each other with clay bullets, &c.) to make the vulgar believe they are invulnerable.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

May 13.—The house went into a committee on the East-India Judges' Bill.

Mr. Hume begged to ask the right hon. gentleman (Mr. C. W. Wynn, why the judges in India were not placed in the same situation as the judges in England? He saw in one of the clauses that they were still removable at pleasure.

Mr. C. W. Wynn said the law with respect to the judges continued the same as it had been since the year 1734; and he considered it right that it should be so, because it enabled the government to terminate speedily any disputes which might happen to arise among the authorities, by removing the offending parties from the colony. The only alteration in the law related to the salaries of the judges at Bombay. The judges of the courts there had been usually paid in pagodas, worth about eight shillings each; but, in consequence of there being now no such coin as a pagoda, and less silver than formerly in the rupee, which had been substituted for it, they had memorialised the government for an increase of salary. The bill now before the house was to enable government to grant that increase which they had determined should be paid, as the better method, in the currency of the country.

Mr. Hume, understanding that the right hon. gentleman intended to continue the judges dependent on the will of the Governor-General, protested strongly against vesting the whole control of the justice of India in any individual. It was common for government to punish jurymen who resisted their desire to punish certain individuals, and he knew no effectual check to such a practice but by interposing the power of an independent judge. He recollected when Sir George Barlow had actually punished some jurymen who pronounced a verdict contrary to his wishes. Under such a system, where jurymen were liable to be punished for doing their duty, and judges to be deposed if they offended the governor, it was impossible for either to do their duty, or that the laws could be justly administered. The hon. gentleman then alluded to the removal of Sir Henry William and the impeachment of Sir Elijah Impey, declaring it to be a great abuse of power to continue such an arbitrary discretion in the Governor-General. It was a system of intimidation which was never suffered to exist but under unqualified despotism. India was at the present moment at the mercy of the Governor; proscription followed upon proscription; banishment succeeded banishment; and there actually was practised in two years, on that continent, more abuses of authority than the Stuarts had ever been guilty of during the whole of the years of oppression preceding their dethronement. He had received a letter during the last month, stating that two indigo planters had been removed from their properties, and sent out of the country, without the slightest previous notice. If such proceedings were to be allowed, and individuals were to be thus removed from their business without trial, he must say that India was placed in a state of the basest despotism. Their object should be to conciliate India; but instead of that the Board of Control rejected all memorials sent to them upon the part of the half-caste to sit on juries, and although an Englishman was not allowed to hold an acre of land in India, and persons of the half-caste might be in possession of any quantity. Englishmen alone could sit on juries, and the half-caste where wholly excluded. In Ceylon they had been admitted, and the results had been eminently beneficial. No argument, therefore, that he could imagine, should prevent them from doing that act of impartial justice to the native inhabitants. He thought that under such a system they were bound to make the judges independent, and place the protection of a jury between individuals and the government.

Mr. C. W. Wynn said the hon. gentleman had argued under a mistake. The judges were not removable at the pleasure of the governor, but by the command of the crown. Every man, who knew the colonies, was aware that disputes were constantly arising between the governors and the judges, and it had therefore been deemed advisable to retain the power of putting a speedy termination to these dissensions. It might be said they could be impeached, but the delay, the bringing of witnesses, and various other considerations, formed insurmountable objections to such a proceeding. The hon. gentleman might, if he pleased, bring in a bill upon that separate subject, but the present one related, as he said before, solely to the payment of the judges. As to the serving upon juries, by the charter all persons were equally liable.

Sir C. Forbes objected to the removal of the judges. He thought the natives of India were quite as fit to serve on juries as British subjects.

Dr. Phillimore said the judges were not removable at the pleasure of the government, and therefore not liable to the objections stated by the hon. member for Montrose. That question, however, had no connection with the present bill. It was solely for the payment of salaries.

Mr. Hume had no objection to the salaries salaries, but he would read an extract from a letter he had received on the subject of juries, which he thought worthy of the attention of the House. In civil actions there were no juries in India. These were the words of the letter. Now he objected strongly to a judge deciding solely in cases involving the properties of individuals. The letter goes on to say, "In criminal cases, none of the natives are ever placed on juries; they are composed wholly of Englishmen." The right hon. gentleman may say the native inhabitants are entitled to sit, but the fact is none are ever summoned, so that the judge decides solely both in civil and criminal cases in India, because he has no jury in the one case, and a jury wholly at his command in the other. The right hon. gentleman ought to consider the dissatisfaction which exists on this subject in India.

Mr. C. W. Wynn said the hon. gent. (Mr. Hume) seemed to assume that the judges in India were totally dependent upon the government. The reverse was the fact; a more independent body of men than the judges could not be found in India. He had never known any body of men whose conduct was so little subject to suspicion or complaint. The judges were not the subservient slaves of government, and the hon. gentleman must know the Courts of Judicature in India were not under the influence of the local government. As to transportation, it was a right given to the company by charter, and held for many years. It was in return for this right that India was opened to British enterprise more fully than it even was before. In his (Mr. Wynn's) opinion, without an infraction of the charter, the present system could not be altered by government until the charter expired. When that event occurs, it will be for parliament to consider the propriety of withholding this power from the local government of India.

Mr. Hume said numberless cases were known in India where the judges had interfered improperly between individuals and the government. Leaving this part of the subject, he would suggest that a proviso should be made in case of the absence, illness, or sudden death of any of the judges, to empower the government to appoint a barrister temporarily to fill the situation.

Mr. C. W. Wynn conceived that the hon. gentleman's proposal would create a strange anomaly. A barrister would sit as a judge, and then sink into a barrister again. Since he (Mr. W.) had the honour of filling his present situation, he had never heard any complaint urged against the practice of the courts or the conduct of the judges in India. He (Mr. Wynn) had never before heard of the case of the indigo planters adverted to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hume) in a former part of this debate.

Sir C. Forbes moved an amendment to the clause containing the amount of the judges' salaries.

Sir C. Cole seconded the motion.

Mr. W. Wynn said the proposed amendment only contemplated an increase of about £200 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Brougham complained that ten years was too long a period to keep judges in India. If the regulation was altered, and the period shortened, government would be much more likely to procure able men, and he had reason to think that any alteration of this kind would be hailed with delight by that body, from which the judges were selected.

After a few words from Mr. H. Sumner and Sir C. Forbes, upon the suggestion of Mr. Wynn, the house resumed, and the Chairman obtained leave to report progress.

May 17.—In a committee of the whole house on the Customs Consolidation Act, Mr. Huskisson declared it was his intention to put the produce of the Mauritius on the same footing as the produce of the West-India colonies, by reducing the duties to the same level in both cases.

Mr. Bennet wished previously for some information as to the slave-trade in that island.

Mr. Huskisson stated that the papers were printing.

May 18.—Mr. Hume moved for some papers relative to the arrest of John D. Rossier at Colombo, in the island of Ceylon, in January 1824.

Mr. Wilmot Horton did not object to the production of the papers. He believed there had been some irregularity in the mode of proceeding by Sir John Campbell, the governor of Ceylon, arising from a mistake of the law officers whom he consulted on the occasion. The individual referred to was a deserter, and might have been arrested under the Mutiny Act.—The papers were ordered.

LAW.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY, MAY 4.

The George Home.—Lord Stowell gave judgment in this case, which was a suit by the seamen of the above ship for wages. They had entered into articles, by which they bound themselves "to navigate the vessel to that port, and back again to its final destination at any port or ports of Europe." These terms were uncommonly vague, and it was utterly impossible that the seamen signing them could know the nature or probable duration of the contract they were entering into; besides which, it also appeared that some of the crew could not read, nor was any evidence given to show that the articles were read to them, or their tenor explained. Upon learning the intention of the captain to proceed, on their return, to Rotterdam, the crew refused to go there, alleging that they had engaged to navigate the vessel to England; and they quitted the ship in a body. The statute required that the final port of destination should be plainly stated in the articles, and communicated to the seamen. The owners in this case had not so done; and the court was therefore of opinion that the seamen were entitled to their wages, together with full costs.

Carmichael v. Baker.—This was a suit instituted by a seaman of an East-India trader against his captain for cruelty and false imprisonment. Lord Stowell said that captains of East-Indiamen had always been allowed to inflict the punishment of flogging and confinement. He thought that in this case the measure was not greater than the offence demanded. His Lordship however deferred judgment.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT, MAY 5.

Money v. McLeod and others.—This was a case of much importance, as it involved the question of the legality of exercising influence to procure for an individual the command of a Company's ship. It came before the court in consequence of a bill filed by W. T. Money, Esq., M.P. to obtain from the executors of the late Capt. McLeod and Mr. Hodson, the commander and purser of the ship Walthamstow, an account of certain joint mercantile transactions in the year 1804. The defendants in their answer alleged, that the plaintiff had given, as consideration for his share of the adventure, his influence to procure the command of the ship for the late Capt. McLeod, whereby the transaction became illegal.

In the course of the argument much stress was laid upon the dictum of Lord Kenyon, who stated that the East-India Company constituted "a limb of the State," and that therefore, and upon principles of public policy, the brokerage and bartering of offices under the Company fell under the statute 5 and 6 Edw. IV., which forbids the sale and corrupt disposal of public offices.

On the other hand, it was contended, that the statute of Edward related exclusively to officers under the crown; which was proved by the act 49 Geo. III. c. 126, which extended the provisions of that statute to the East-India Company; which act passed in 1809, subsequent to the transaction in question.

Many cases and authorities were quoted, but much discrepancy and discord appeared in the opinions of the different judges upon the subject.

The Vice-Chancellor observed, that there appeared to have been an agreement executed between Mr. Money on the one part, and Capt. McLeod and Mr. Hodson on the other, whereby the former was to be entitled to a large share of the profits of two voyages to India, in consideration of his using his influence to procure the command of the ship for Capt. McLeod. There were two questions in this case, one of fact, the other of law, arising from that fact. As to the latter, Lord Kenyon was of opinion, that the East-India Company was not a mere trading company, but partook of a political character; that the officers of the company were similar to those of the crown; and that it was contrary to public policy that commands of their ships should be sold. The opinion of Lord Kenyon has not since been closely adhered to; but Lord Chief Justice Abbott thought, that as the public have an interest that proper persons should be appointed to the command of East-India ships; and, therefore, that a corrupt disposal of them would be void upon the principles of public policy. By subsequent decisions this doctrine has been limited. The point of law must, therefore, be decided by the judges of the courts of law. With respect to the fact, there was so much dispute as to require this court to send the question to a jury. The agreement bound the parties, by an obligation of honour, which was a strange obligation, if the transactions were legal. It then describes the proportion of profits; Mr. Money was to have two-thirds; the others one-third between them. There must have been some powerful secret motive for this unequal arrangement. Mr. Money was to advance no capital, and was, besides, to be taken out to India, with his family, free of charge. Finally, the parties pledge themselves to keep the agreement secret. His Honour thought no man could doubt that one party thought that the engagement, if known, would not be creditable; and, he must conclude, that some grave consideration moved Capt. McLeod to consent, and no other motive is suggested besides the assistance afforded by Mr. Money to obtain the appointment for him. On the other hand, Sir Robert Wigram, in his examination, declares that his reason for nominating Capt. McLeod, was his belief as to his qualifications; and though he admits Mr. Money's recommendation, denies that he knew of any corrupt consideration; but no person could expect that Sir Robert would be told by Mr. Money, the real motives of his recommendation. His Honour directed an issue to try whether the agreement was entered into, either wholly or partly, in consideration of assistance rendered to procure the command of the ship; and if the affirmative was found, he would take the opinion of the judges on the point of law.

PRIVY COUNCIL, MAY 23.

Appeal:—James Silk Buckingham, Appellant; the Hon. East India Company, Respondents.

This was an appeal to his Majesty's Privy Council, against a certain rule, or 5 2 9 discrepancy

dinance, and regulation, promulgated by the Governor-General in Council of Fort William, in Bengal, regarding the Indian press.

The Common Serjeant and Mr. John Williams were counsel for the appellant, and Mr. Serjeant Bosanquet, Mr. Serjeant Spankie, Mr. Brougham, and Mr. Tindal, were for the respondents.

The rules of their Lordships permitted only two Counsel to be heard on either side. Mr. Denman and Mr. Williams spoke for the appellant: Mr. Serjeant Bosanquet and Mr. Serjeant Spankie, for the respondents, and Mr. Denman replied.

The argument lasted the whole day, at the conclusion of which counsel were ordered to withdraw, and the Chamber closed. Their Lordships' decision was deferred till a future day.

[As the speeches were of prodigious length, and would occupy, if reported in full, three-fourths of this month's Journal; and as a curtailment of them might expose us to a charge of partiality, we prefer excluding them altogether. It is to be hoped that this important case will be laid before the public in a complete and authentic shape. All the points of the argument for the appellant, have been fully and repeatedly stated. The speech of Mr. Serjeant Bosanquet, in reply, was decisive; that of Mr. Serjeant Spankie, triumphant.]

EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

On Tuesday, 10th May, a ballot was taken on the following question, viz.

"That this Court confirm the Resolution of the Court of Directors, of the 30th of March last, whereby the Commander and Owners of the late ship Kent are fully acquitted from all imputation of neglect or misconduct in respect to the loss of that ship."

At six o'clock the glasses were closed and delivered to the scrutineers, who reported the question to be decided in the affirmative.

A Court of Directors was held on the 18th May, when General Lord Combermere, G.C.B., and Lieut.-General Sir George Townshend Walker, G.C.B., took the usual oaths upon being appointed; the former, Commander-in-chief of the Company's forces at Bengal, and second in Council; and the latter as Commander-in-chief and second in Council at Fort St. George. They afterwards dined with the Directors at the City of London Tavern.

The Court of Directors have given notice that a Quarterly General Court of the said Company, will be held at their house in Leadenhall-street, on Wednesday, the 22d of June next, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

General Thornton has given notice of the following motion at the General Quarterly Court, viz.

"Resolved—It appearing by the printed Hyderabad papers, that Rajah Chundob Loll sent a letter to Lieut. Barnett, the assistant to Sir C. T. Metcalfe, Bart., the resident, who was acting for him during his absence from Hyderabad on a tour, containing representations and complaints which the Rajah desired might be communicated to the Supreme Government; and, in page 239, that Lieut. Barnett mentioned to Sir C. T. Metcalfe, when he met him on his return, that he had received such a note, and described its contents; and likewise, by Sir C. T. Metcalfe's own statement, in page 241, that he did peruse the original note thoroughly and carefully, after having previously contented himself with Lieut. Barnett's report of its substance, and with looking at particular parts; notwithstanding which, neither Sir C. T. Metcalfe nor Lieutenant Barnett did communicate the contents to the Governor-General in Council, but the Supreme Government was kept in ignorance of any such appeal, until communicated by the Rajah through another channel, when several acts of oppression complained of in the conduct of Sir C. T. Metcalfe were ordered by the Governor-General in Council to be redressed, in instructions inserted in page 224 and the following pages: That it be therefore recommended to the Court of Directors to be pleased to make regulations to prevent in future so improper and dangerous a proceeding as the suppression or interruption of appeal or complaints, whether just or unjust, from the Native Governments to the Supreme Government; that if just, the grievances complained of may be redressed as soon as possible; and if unjust, explanations may be entered into without loss of time, and a good understanding promoted."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Suicide.—An inquest was held at Limehouse, May 7, on the body of Thos. Bill, Esq., of the H. E. I. C. Service, who had shot himself on the preceding evening. The unfortunate gentleman had received a kick from one of the race-horses, at Ascot, last year, which produced a mortification, and rendered amputation necessary. Meanwhile he obtained promotion, with orders to sail for India; and the dejection caused by his inability to profit by his good fortune drove him to distraction.—Verdict, lanacy.

Unitarianism in India.—On 15th May, a sermon was preached at the Unitarian Chapel, Chesterfield, to aid a subscription now raising amongst the English Unitarians, towards enabling Ram-Mohun Roy, and the Rev. Wm. Adam, a missionary (formerly a Baptist, now a Unitarian), to build a chapel at Calcutta.

Military Commands in India.—The following observations appear in the Morning Chronicle of May 4: we are unable either to contradict or confirm the statement:—

The public in general are but little aware of the manner in which the chief command of the army in the three establishments in India is now disposed of. The law places this disposal in the Court of Directors, but it is exercised behind the curtain by those who are no way responsible. His Royal Highness the Duke of York insists upon these commands being given to those only whom he recommends, and these officers must be of the royal army. But his Royal Highness, or the Board of Control, or the Court of Directors, or all these, seem to forget that there is an army of British subjects in India, consisting of about 20,000 men, and another of about 200,000 natives, officered by British subjects, whom these strangers are sent out to command; and that there are not so many as 20,000 of his Majesty's troops serving in that country. Is there no consideration for the feelings of the officers of so large, so gallant, so very respectable a body as those composing the Company's army? Are they always to be considered and treated by his Royal Highness and the government of this country as aliens, unworthy to be trusted; or as an inferior race to those gentlemen of whom the King's army is composed?

Cambridge, May 20.—At a congregation on Monday last, the degree of Master of Arts was conferred, by royal mandate, upon the Rev. Fred. Holmes, B. A., of St. John's College, professor in the Bishop's College, Calcutta.

The Catholic Bill.—The Catholic Question is decided. At half-past five this morning the House of Lords divided on the second reading of the Bill, when the number were—

The speech which contributed most powerfully to produce this result was unquestionably that of the Bishop of Chester.—[Lond. Paper, May 18.

Sir Stamford Raffles.—The family of this gentleman were, on Thursday, 19th May, thrown into the greatest alarm, in consequence of his being conveyed to his house, in Lower Grosvenor-street, in a complete state of insensibility. It appears that as he was walking down Portland-place, alone, about three o'clock, he suddenly, and without any previous symptoms of indisposition, sank to the ground, and continued perfectly insensible until removed to his residence, by the kind assistance of persons who were passing by. Medical aid being called in, animation was at length restored; and Sir Stamford is considered out of danger.

Trade of the Port of London.—From official returns to parliament, it appears that in the year 1794, when the construction of wet docks for the accommodation of the shipping frequenting the port of London was first deemed necessary, the imports and exports of the United Kingdom amounted to 44 millions. In the year 1824 they amounted to 96½ millions.

The value of the transit trade of Great Britain, in 1823, was	£8,588,995
In 1824, it was	10,188,596
Exhibiting an increase in 1824 over 1823 of £1,600,000.
In the year 1823, the value of the transit trade of London was	8,191,777

The increase of the transit trade in the outports during 1824 was.....

In the year 1824, the number was 28,616
Exhibiting an increase of about 10,000 sail of merchant ships, besides upwards of 1,000 voyages made by steam-boats, a species of navigation not existing in the Port of London in 1794, and thus increasing the impediments on the river Thames.

In the year 1808, when the West-India Docks, East-India Docks, Commercial Docks, London Docks, City Canal, and Grand Surrey Canal Docks, were open to the public, the number of merchant ships moored in the Stream, excluding the number that enter the docks was 8,001

In the year 1824, it was..... 15,913

The total number of merchant ships which entered the Port of London in the year 1824,

1824, was, as before stated..... 23,618
Deduct the number accommodated during the like period in docks 9,750

There remained, therefore... 20,968
So that about 21,000 vessels last year discharged and loaded, whilst moored in the stream, obstructing the navigation of the river in such a degree as at times to render it impassable.

The total tonnage of merchant ships cleared outward in Great Britain in 1823, was 2,610,787
In 1824 3,182,776
Exhibiting an increase in 1824, of 571,989 tons.

The total tonnage of merchant ships which entered inwards in the Port of London in 1794, was 1,458,315
In 1823 2,903,267
In 1824 3,170,186
Exhibiting an increase in 1824 over the preceding year of 266,919 tons; and over 1794, of 1,711,871 tons.

Trade of Great Britain.—By the following official statement, which has been laid on the table of the House of Commons, it appears that the gross amount of the exports for the last year has exceeded that of the imports by the sum of twenty-one millions sterling :—

Year ending 5th January 1825.
Total official value of imports into Great Britain £41,729,485 17 9

Total official value of exports from Great Britain, viz.
British and Irish produce and manufactures £51,718,606 17 8

Pacific Ocean, and N. W. Coast of America.—The following copy of a Convention between the British and Russian Governments, respecting the navigation, &c. of the Pacific Ocean, and the limits of the North West coast of America, is of sufficient importance to deserve insertion at length.

Article I.—It is agreed that the respective subjects of the high contracting parties, shall not be troubled or molested, in any part of the ocean, commonly called the Pacific Ocean, either in navigating the same, in fishing therein, or in landing at such part of the coast as shall not have been already occupied, in order to trade with the natives, under the restrictions and conditions specified in the following articles.

Article 2.—In order to prevent the right of navigating and fishing, exercised upon the ocean by the subjects of the high contracting parties, from becoming the pretext for illicit commerce, it is agreed that the subjects of his Britannic Majesty shall not land at any place where there may be a Russian Establishment, without the permission of the governor or commandant; and, on the other hand, that Russian subjects shall not land, without permission, at any British establishment on the North West Coast.

3.—The line of demarcation between the possessions of the high contracting parties upon the coast of the continent, and the Islands of America to the north west, shall be drawn in the manner following:

Commencing from the southernmost point of the Island called Prince of Wales Island, which point lies in the parallel of 54 deg. 40 min. north latitude, and between the 131st and the 132d degree of west longitude (meridian of Greenwich) the said line shall ascend to the North along the channel called Portland Channel, as far as the point of the Continent where it strikes the 56th degree of north latitude; from this last-mentioned point, the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast, as far as the point of intersection of the 141st degree of west longitude (of the same meridian); and, finally, from the said point of intersection, the said meridian line of the 141st degree, in its prolongation as far as the Frozen Ocean, shall form the limit between the Russian and British possessions on the continent of America to the north-west.

4.—With reference to the line of demarcation laid down in the preceding article, it is understood—

First. That the island called Prince of Wales Island, shall belong wholly to Russia.

Second. That wherever the summit of the mountains which extend in a direction parallel to the coast, from the 56th degree of north latitude to the point of intersection of the 141st degree of west longitude, shall prove to be at the distance of more than ten marine leagues from the ocean, the limit between the British possessions and the line of coast which is to belong to Russia, as above-mentioned, shall be formed by a line parallel to the windings of the coast, and which shall never exceed the distance of ten marine leagues therefrom.

5.—It is moreover agreed, that no establishment shall be formed by either of the two parties within the limits assigned by the two preceding articles to the possessions of the other; consequently, British subjects shall not form any establishment either upon the coast, or upon the border of the continent, comprised within the limits of the Russian possessions, as designated in the two preceding articles; and, in like manner, no establishment shall be formed by Russian subjects beyond the said limits.

6.—It is understood that the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely, and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which, in their course towards the Pacific Ocean, may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article 3 of the present convention.

7.—It is also understood that, for the space of ten years, from the signature of the present convention, the vessels of the two powers, or those belonging to their respective subjects, shall mutually be at liberty to frequent, without any hindrance whatever, all the inland seas, the gulfs, havens and creeks, on the coast mentioned in article 3, for the purposes of fishing and of trading with the natives.

8.—The port of Sitka, or Novo Archangelsk, shall be open to the commerce and vessels of British subjects for the space of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention. In the event of an extension of this term of ten years being granted to any other power, the like extension shall be granted also to Great Britain.

9.—The above-mentioned liberty of commerce shall not apply to the trade in spirituous liquors, in fire-arms, or other arms, gunpowder or other warlike stores; the high contracting parties reciprocally engaging not to permit the above-mentioned articles to be sold or delivered, in any manner whatever, to the natives of the country.

10.—Every British or Russian vessel navigating the Pacific Ocean, which may be compelled by storms or by accident, to take shelter in the ports of the respective parties, shall be at liberty to refit therein, to provide itself with all necessary stores, and to put to sea again, without paying any other than port and light-house dues, which shall be the same as these paid by national vessels. In case, however, the master of such vessel should be under the necessity of disposing of a part of his merchandise in order to defray his expenses, he shall conform himself to the regulations and tariffs of the place where he may have landed.

11.—In every case of complaint on account of an infraction of the articles of the present convention, the civil and military authorities of the high contracting parties, without previously acting or taking any forcible measure, shall make an exact and circumstantial report of the matter to their respective courts, who engage so settle the same in a friendly manner, and according to the principles of justice.

12.—The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratification shall be exchanged at London, within the space of six weeks, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Done at St. Petersburg, the 28th (16th) day of February, in the year of our Lord 1825.

* * In the report of Sir G. R. Robinson's speech, in the debate at the East-India House, last month, (see p. 754, col. 2), the crew of the Arct was, by an error of the press, stated as 690, instead of 619.

Great languor has succeeded the late extraordinary activity in most branches of foreign trade. Cotton and Sugar are exceptions. The former still continues in demand, though the sales are not so extensive as during the last month. East-India Sugars are improving. Siamese Sugar is much inquired after; and higher prices are asked for Mauritius Sugars. Spices are dreadfully depressed. At the Company's sale in the middle of the month, Nutmegs fetched 8s. 6d. to 7s. 1d.; they have since been sold at 4s. 3d. to 5s. 3d. This article formerly sold at 11s. to 12s. Few purchases are made in other sorts of spices. Some advance has taken place in Tea. The Coffee market is stagnant; Saltpetre and Silk are dull.
